And just as in 1775, there was in 1933 an uncertainty in the minds of people everywhere. Like the rumble of distant drums, there was an undertone of doubt and it also rose slowly to a crescendo. In 1933 the overture to revolution was in the air. It reached its climax in 1939 when the whole world burst into flames—and we found ourselves the spectators of the greatest revolution history has ever known.

During all of this, the average American was blissfully indifferent to the developments of nis time. He still is blissfully indifferent, and this indifference, if it is not corrected, may cost us our freedom.

We are in a world revolution. We are in the midst of the greatest political and economic upheaval of our long and tragic history. Yet, the complacency of the average American in the face of this revolution would lead us to think that we were being annoyed by only a gentle political zephyr. The fact is that we are squarely in the path of a political cyclone. This cyclone has already devastated a large part of Asia and Europe and right now it is headed straight for America.

Today, now, we are standing face to face with the largest question mark we have ever known. Can we withstand the impact of revolution or shall we, in turn, yield to state socialism and dictatorship? Can we save democracy? This is the most vital question facing American civilization. It is the most vital question facing each of us. It involves everything that we have built through a lifetime of effort. In short, we are in a hell of a fix and we had better do something about it.

What can we do about it? Well, before we start doing anything about any problem, we should be sure that we thoroughly understand that problem and the forces that brought it into being. With this in mind, I want to digress for just 2 or 3 minutes to take you on a little journey far back into history. But bear in mind that on this journey we are taking with us a problem—a problem of 1944 vintage.

We are speaking, remember, of revolution. The question that we are asking of history is, What causes revolutions? With what forces are we dealing? It is not necessary to go into all the contributing factors. For our purpose, it is sufficient to take into consideration only three important facts regarding every revolutionary movement.

The first fact is that throughout all history approximately 95 percent of the people have depended upon the other 5 percent for leadership. History says that 95 percent of the people must have leadership.

The second fact is that no revolution, in all history, has ever occurred unless and until existing leadership failed.

The third fact is that in all history the people—the 95 percent—have never started a revolution. The people, remember, are the followers. It has always been the 5 percent who started revolutions. The people merely participated.

Ninety-five percent of the people of every nation must have leadership. When existing leadership fails, the people in desperation will accept whatever leadership comes along—and that leadership is usually revolutionary.

This pattern has been repeated over and over again since the beginning of history. There is nothing new about this business—it is only new to us. The Old Testament presents an almost endless procession of revolution—and the prelude to each succeeding revolution was the degeneration of established leadership. The golden age of Athens ceased to be golden only when Athenian leadership became selfish and ingrown. The same story was repeated in Carthage, in Rome, and finally in France. In our own day we have had Russia, Italy, and Germany. Here, the design for revolution was the same.

In Russia the reign of the czars had become decadent and imbecilic. Without leadership the people turned to Lenin and Trotsky. In Italy the arm-waving and bellowing of Mussolini succeeded only because the Italian people had no leadership. In Germany the leaders sold their people down the river through inflation—and so the people accepted Hitler.

But in no one of these cases did the people start the revolution. The Russian revolution was thoroughly rehearsed in the minds of Lenin and Trotsky long before the people accepted it as even a possibility. The German revolution was created in the mind of Hitler while he was in prison. The people did not decide upon revolution. In their desperation they merely accepted Hitler—and Hitler did the rest. But they did not even accept him until the leadership of the German Republic had completely failed.

And so, history does tell us something about our problem. It tells us that the failure of established leadership always opens the door for new leadership—and then the people are apt to accept any crackpot savior who comes along. That is history's record of revolution. Now we can end our little journey and return to America.

Let's see to what extent the lessons of history apply to us. Well, what happened in Russia, Germany, and Italy is exactly what happened here in 1932—without benefit of violence. The people said, "We have had enough of Hoover and the Republicans." Then came Roosevelt. Yet the advent of Roosevelt and his New Deal was brought about not by public acclaim but by the default of the old order. It was definitely an escape mechanism on the part of the people. The failure of leadership again opened the door for revolution—and make no mistake about either fact—it was failure of leadership—and it was revolution!

But I'm afraid we can't pin the blame on Hoover or Coolidge or even Harding. No, the fault lies deeper. Or as Shakespeare would say, "The fault l'es not in the stars, dear Brutus, but in ourselves." Because in America when we speak of leadership, we are not speaking of any one man, or of any one political party. We are speaking of our entire economic system and of all of the men who are leaders in that system. In the old days, leadership meant a king or a few proconsuls. A little later Napoleon started the idea of self-appointed dictatorship, but in America there remains at least some semblance of democracy. We are divided into communities of free men—communities just like Altoona. When we speak of American leadership we are talking about ourselves. Here it is—right here. This room is filled with a typical cross section of American leadership.

And it was the failure of typical American leadership—the failure of men just like us—that ushered in the present bureaucratic regime. It was not just Hoover's failure. Actually, the failure of American leadership took place long before Hoover was elected.

This statement, of course, calls for an explanation. In what respect did American business leaders fail? The answer can be given in one word—indifference—indifference to everything except their own immediate interests.

Leadership implies responsibility—not just for one's self but for all who come under that leadership. Responsibility for the people being led is the very essence of leadership. American business has never accepted their responsibility.

Leadership also implies vision—vision to see the effect of forces at work in the present—vision to anticipate their effect upon the future. In this particular case, leadership required that the American businessman raise his eyes from his ledger sheets long enough to see the dark clouds of State socialism gathering. But he didn't do it. The profit-and-loss statement was too interesting.

Leadership also requires interest in the system that has made possible the leadership of the leader. Leadership requires that the American businessman recognize the inherent value of the system under which he functions—the system of free enterprise. It requires that he cherish and protect this system—as he would any benefactor. But American businessmen have not done that. No. They took the profits and left the guardianship of free enterprise to the politicians. As we have said, they were indifferent to just about everything except the profit-and-loss statement and the monthly balance sheet.

Oh yes, there has been a lot of talk, but the trouble was that we talked only to each other. Beyond griping among ourselves, most of us did nothing. I want to use one classic example to show you what I mean.

Most of you, I am sure, remember the talk made in this room by Dr. Judd, some 4 years ago. I doubt if there was a man in the room who didn't realize that Dr. Judd knew what he was talking about. He not only predicted the beginning of our war with Japan—he missed the date by only 6 months. More important, he told us that a complete embargo, if immediately declared, would not only avoid war with Japan but would force Japan to take her armies out of China within a year. He told all of us that—and what happened?

The applause at the end of his speech was loud and long—and we just about shook the poor fellow's hand off. But did any of us do anything about it? No. It was a swell half-day speech. Its effect lasted until about 4 o'clock that afternoon when it was promptly and completely forgotten.

And now, we are at war with Japan. And who's responsible? Cordell Hull? The President? Congress? Our Board of Military Strategists? Yes; all of them are to blame. They all made mistakes. But they are not alone. We're all responsible. We were told the facts as plainly as the English language could convey them. We believed those facts—but we did nothing. The responsibility for the war with Japan rests squarely with all of us—with every man in America who holds a position of leadership.

We are all guilty as hell. The bloodstains of Tarawa and Guadalcanal are on all our hands.

Yes, our own indifference helped us on the road to war. But our indifference left the door open for State socialism long before the war clouds gathered. Let's go back once more for a half century and take another look at our American business system. If we look closely enough we will see two interesting things. We will see, in the first place, that our technological development has been the amazement of the world. We took to the machine age in a big way and, while we were doing it, we created the highest standard of living the world has even known. And when the war came, we converted to wartime production with an amazing speed and efficiency. Mechanically we have done a magnificent job, but I'm afraid our development has been a bit lopsided. While we were becoming the technological wonder of the world we almost completely forgot one other factor—which in the long view, may be even more important than our mechanical genius. We overlooked human nature. Technologically, we have been supercolossal, but psychologically, we have been profoundly stupid.

We have been so busy with machines, inventions, balance sheets, and inventories that we forgot to stop occasionally and take an inventory of human values. We forgot to find out what the average man was thinking—particularly what he was thinking about us and our leadership. Above all, we forgot to sell the American system of free enterprise to our own employees. In true American style we took it all for granted. And when trouble came the door was wide open for the flood of crackpot, bureaucratic doctrines that are slowly but surely consolidating themselves into a design for socialism and dictatorship.

But again, the responsibility does not rest entirely with our present political leaders. They have sown the seed of socialism but with the dull blade of our own indifference we plowed the ground for them. Our indifference to the fireside problems of the rank and file man was an open invitation for Government intervention.

Now, let's pause for a moment and take a look at those fireside problems of the average man. I'm talking about your employee—and mine. Let's go into his home and have a chat with him. Let's see what kind of a fellow he is. Let's take a look at his urges and desires. What does he expect from the system under which he works?

Well, the average man wants a wife, some kids, and a home—even as you and I. In order to have this he must, of course, have a job, just as we must have. You might say, "That's simple. Haven't we supplied these things to the average American? Didn't you just get through saying that we have the highest standard of living in the world?"

Very true. But there is one thing more our average man wants. He wants a plus, over and above the concrete things of life. And this is purely a psychological thing. It's a very difficult thing to explain, but I hope I can do so, because if we understand this psychological plus which our average man wants, we will understand something of what has happened to us and at least one good reason why it happened.

Perhaps the best name that can be applied is ego satisfaction—ego build-up. Our average man wants to feel important. Every man who is worth his salt wants to feel important, wants to feel that he is a worthwhile contribution to something.

We needn't go outside this room for an excellent illustration of what I mean. Why do you belong to the Knights of Columbus, the Shriners, the Rotary Club, etc.? Well, there are, of course, a number of reasons—but you can be sure that one of them is ego lift. Even more important, we get a large part of our ego satisfaction from our jobs as heads of our various business and professional activities. We feel that we are doing something worth while. We feel that we have a definite place in the procession of life. We feel important.

Well, that's just what our average man wants to feel and, next to his wife and his children, he wants it more than anything else in the world.

I have here a copy of a symposium taken from the Reader's Digest for August. The Reader's Digest made a survey to determine what the average American worker thinks about the management of the business with which he is associated. They received thousands of letters from employees throughout the United States—and some of them were brutally frank. I want to read you just one of these letters. I have taken the liberty of paraphrasing this just a little to clarify the thought:

"Bill Smith, a conscientious fellow with a wife and two swell kids, becomes No. 1499. He is hired and fired as such. Management would find that the personal touch pays dividends. Management should learn that men think and would like an opportunity to express their thoughts. Labor should be consulted more often. Years on the job have taught us much—much that we would like to pass on to management. There is a gap to be bridged and management needs to lay a few planks."

That's all we have time for. Suffice it to say that this same theme appeared throughout most of the letters received. In effect, these employees were saying, "For heaven's sake, recognize us as human beings. Let us take a real pride in our work. Give us an ego lift. Make us feel that we amount to something."

That's the plus they want—and in the past we have failed to give it to them. As this one man says, the American employee is too often No. 1462, morning shift, pay rate 64 cents. In other words, we put him on the inventory as we would a bolt of cloth. I know merchants who give much more attention to the dead, inert material that crosses their shelves than to the human beings who work for them. You'll find on the balance sheet of almost every business an item called "goodwill," meaning the goodwill of the public. But I have never seen on any balance sheet an item representing the happiness and good will of employees.

But what has this to do with the onrush of state socialism? Well, our average man does the voting—and how he votes depends upon the state of his happiness. The state of his happiness, in turn, depends to no small extent upon us. We have here much of the answer to the present trend toward socialism. We have done a swell job with machinery—a very poor job with human beings. In our indifference to human values we forgot that our employees are by far the most important factor in our system of free enterprise.

When I say this I am still speaking about psychology, not about physical things. I am not an economist and I don't know whether or not American business in the past could have given its employees a higher scale of pay. At any rate, I am sure that higher wages would not have been enough. It still would have been necessary to merchandise the system of free enterprise to our employees—to the voters of America. I don't mean just by talking to them. I mean by taking them into the family circle and proving to them by our interests and our attitudes that we looked upon them as an important part of free enterprise and not as commodities of trade. Instead, we have allowed them to consider us the privileged few and themselves the hirelings.

Here is the ridiculous picture. We have had our own employees right in front of us all the time. Certainly this flesh-and-blood association gave us a definite advantage—an advantage which we recklessly threw away. We let a man talk to them over the radio. We let him do the selling job that we should have done.

Yet, we believe in this system of free enterprise. We want to preserve it. But again we have done nothing except talk among ourselves. I doubt if there is a businessman in this room who has spent as much as one hour convincing his own employees that the system of free enterprise is best for them. I doubt if there is a doctor or a lawyer in the room who has even attempted to sell it to his nurse or his secretary. We just didn't have time to talk to them—but the politicians did. They talked in glowing terms about human happiness and they made a great many promises. Perhaps they were only promises, but even that is more than we offered them.

And to no small extent, this failure to take into consideration simple, every day, human psychology has contributed to the growth of social legislation, the growth of unionism and antibusiness sentiment. We have had our milder revolution here in America for exactly the same reasons that France and Russia had revolutions. Psychologically at least, we failed to supply the necessary leadership—and so, the people looked elsewhere for leadership. And so the unions—and so the bureaucrats.

But that's water over the dam. The important thing is that we have one more chance. This war, if it has brought nothing more of a constructive nature, has offered to American business the greatest political opportunity it has ever had—or ever again will have. What is that opportunity? I'd like to present it to you in a very concrete way. I want to take you across 5,000 miles of water and introduce you to a friend of mine. I want you to meet Corp. Harry Jones of the United States marines.

So far this discussion may have sounded theoretical, but from now on it isn't going to be theoretical at all. We're going to deal with a real human being. Corp. Harry Jones is very real. He went from my organization into the marines about 2 years ago—and he is now stationed somewhere in the South Sea Islands.

Before he left, Corporal Jones was just an average American lad. He was not at all concerned with the great problems we are discussing here. It is probable that he never heard the term state socialism. It is probable that he didn't have any definite ideas regarding Congress or bureaucratic control. In fact, it's doubtful if he even voted. Certainly he wasn't a very important factor in shaping our history but he will be. Corp. Harry Jones is destined to take an important part in the future of America. I mean, of course, he and 10,000,000 other American boys who make up our armed forces.

That being the case, it might be a good thing for us to get fairly well acquainted with Corp. Harry Jones. Unfortunately, we can't do that in the flesh, but we can use our imaginations.

Let's skip a little time. Let's imagine that the war is over. The tumult and the shouting have died away—and Corp. Harry Jones turns eastward toward home. He lands in San Francisco and is whisked over the Union Pacific to Chicago. At Chicago he boards the Pennsylvania with a ticket for Altoona. And now his train is coming in. Suppose we all go down to the station and meet him. Let's see what sort of a chap this Harry Jones is after 2 or 3 years of fox holes, jungles, and Japs. More important, let's find out what he expects of this America he has so valiantly defended—not what he expects of Congress or the New Deal, because Corporal Jones, when he gets off the train, will not be thinking about Congress. He'll be thinking about Altoona—which to him will be America. Let's find out what he expects of Altoona. Let's find out what he wants.

Well, first of all, there'll be an attractive blond in the front row. He'll want an enthusiastic reception from her—and he'll get it. With that greeting over, of course, the next thing he'll want is a bottle of Coca-Cola. (That's my commercial.) Then about the third thing he'll want is a member of the clergy—and after the honeymoon is over—he'll want a job. That's where we come in—and that's where we must be very careful. Because Corporal Jones won't want just a job—not just a job that will pay so much money for so many hours of work. He'll want something more important than that. He'll want the plus we talked about a few minutes ago. He'll want a job that gives him ego satisfaction—a job in which he feels he is doing something worth while. Above all, he'll want to feel that he has come back to friends, and that in his job he belongs. He'll want to feel that he is a worth-while part of the business with which he is associated. In a word, he'll want a job that will yield human happiness.

Is Corporal Jones asking too much? No; I don't think so—and I don't think it will be very difficult to give him what he wants. But it will take more careful planning than we have done in the past. We'll have to do a far better job with Corporal Jones than we did for the soldiers in the last World War. The failure of business leadership to provide for the return of soldiers at the end of the last war was bad. If it is repeated at the end of this war—it will be fatal.

Yes, we'll have to do better with Corporal Jones. We'll not only have to give him a job—we'll have to recognize that we are dealing with a human ego—not a commodity.

We'll have to do just about four things which American business has certainly failed to do in the past. I said a while ago that management had not made a deliberate effort to promote the happiness of its employees. But happiness is a rather general term. In dealing with the case of Corp. Harry Jones let's be more specific. Just what can we do for him? What are these four things?

First, we must be sure that we put Corporal Jones in the right job, that we make him a square peg in a square hole. We haven't done that in the past. We have dumped millions of men indiscriminately into jobs for which nature never intended them—jobs which in many cases they came to hate. We haven't even stopped to ask whether or not there was any way to avoid this almost criminal error. If we had we would have found that science was prepared to help us. Let's not make this mistake with Corporal Jones. Let's put him into a job that fits his natural aptitudes. As leaders that responsibility is ours, not his.

Secondly, we must see that he is properly trained for his job so he can do it well, so he can realize a pride of achievement. Here again we have been weak in the past. We have dumped men into jobs for which they were inadequately trained, and then we have given them hell because they didn't do the job right. I wish time permitted further discussion of this subject. I can only say in passing that American business has been exceedingly stupid in its failure to train its employees. Even in normal times you could find throughout America millions of men and women who had never seen an intelligent analysis of the jobs they had been doing for years. You could have found thousands upon thousands of employers who were paying these employees $1,500, $2,000, $3,000 a year, but who were not spending 5 cents a year to train them.

If it is worth spending $1,000, $2,000, or $3,000 a year to keep a man on the job it is worth spending a small percent of that to train him for the job. If the average employer would spend even 1 percent or 2 percent of his pay roll in a definite, organized training program it would pay him larger dividends than any investment he has ever made. The training of personnel has always been good business, but in the post-war period it will also be good politics. We will have to train Corp. Harry Jones far better than we have trained our employees in the past.

Thirdly, after we have put Corporal Jones in the right job, after we have trained him, we must sell him on that job. We must give him ego build-up. We must cause him to realize that he is making a worth-while contribution to his business and to his community. Which is to say, we must sell to Corp. Harry Jones the American system of free enterprise as his best opportunity to build the good life.

Fourth, and finally, if he does a good job, we must give him credit for it—not just in the Saturday night pay check, but through our attitudes, our words, and our smiles of appreciation. We must, in other words, get on a human basis with Corp. Harry Jones. If we fail to do these four things, it won't very much matter what we pay him. Money cannot compensate for the lack of human, intelligent leadership in handling men.

But if we do these things, what will be the result? Well, we will have a man who is in a job for which his aptitudes fit him. That means happiness. We will have a man who is properly trained for his job—and to whom the job yields pride of achievement. That means happiness. We will have a man who is sold on his job and who, furthermore, is sold on the business with which he is associated—a man who realizes that through that business he is rendering a worth-while service. And when he sees this he will realize that all businesses throughout the United States are doing a job which could never be done under bureaucratic control. That also means happiness.

We will have on our hands a happy man, made happy because his job satisfies his psychological urges—because his job, with the assistance of his blonde, has taken care of the ego of Corp. Harry Jones—now Citizen Harry Jones.

And what does this mean to us? Again, what has all this to do with the onrush of state socialism—the impact of revolution? A great deal. The issue of state socialism versus the American way of life will be decided by what? By votes. And the vote of Corp. Harry Jones and his 10,000,000 fellow servicemen, together with their wives, mothers, sisters, and brothers, will be sufficient to determine any political issue in the United States for at least the next decade.

And so we see that Corp. Harry Jones is a very important man—that he is going to have much to do with this issue of state socialism versus free enterprise. Nothing is, of course, certain, but I have a feeling that the way he votes will depend largely upon whether or not we do the four simple things I have just outlined—put him in the right job, train him, sell him on the job, and then give him credit for the job. In other words, how he votes will depend upon the condition of his ego—will depend upon whether or not he is happy. If the business with which he is associated yields him human happiness he is not apt to vote against it.

But we must remember what every politician has long known—that votes are very human things. Too often we make the mistake of assuming that people are persuaded to vote by logic. They aren't. Votes are guided by emotions. Even a small-town politician knows that. The vote of Corp. Harry Jones will not be cast for American business if American business does a job on Corporal Jones' ego. If American business fails to do that job, then you can be sure the politicians will do it and the vote will go to them. Can we afford to let that happen? If you think we can, let's take one more look into history.

This time let's look at current history. There we will see a gory panorama of government tyranny. In a swift-moving sequence we have seen the enslavement of the people of Japan, the people of Italy, the people of Spain, and the people of Germany. Wherever we look we see the blood-red afterglow of revolution.

We realize that this world revolution in reality centers around one question. Whether government shall be the servant of the people or whether the people shall be the servants of government. We have seen the people in all these foreign countries enslaved by their governments, but that does not tell all of the story. If we could stop the vast, fast-moving mechanism of our own Government long enough to carefully examine it, we would find that today—right now—the people of America, rich or poor, executive or employee, are little more than servants of Government dictate.

Can we afford to take this situation lightly? Do we fully realize that in most of this world the people are slaves? Do we fully realize that the present mechanism of our own Government is sufficient to make us slaves—and that the slave-master in that case would be the very Government under which our sons are now fighting for democracy? Do we realize that the Government that is sending our sons into battle to fight in the name of freedom is at the same time oiling the machinery that may rob them of their freedom when they come back?

I don't mean that this is deliberate. I don't mean that our President is deliberately building a bureaucratic dictatorship. I do not think so. But the trouble with bureaucracy is that it gets beyond the control of its makers. By its very nature, it grows in size and momentum until it gets beyond the control of any one man or group of men. Like the barnacles on a ship it gathers its kind. One good bureau deserves another—until today, no one knows how many bureaus we have. A late report lists something over 2,000 and it does not pretend to be accurate.

No. The growth of bureaucracy is never deliberate. The most sinister thing about bureaucracy is that it grows up like Topsy, until it becomes a monster—always working in the name of charity. Bureaucratic control of our boys in the post-war period, if we permit it, will be of a very charitable nature.

There will be much talk of the generosity of the Government to the returning soldier. It will all have a very patriotic flavoring. Yes, they'll send him to school. They'll get him a job. In short, they'll do everything that will obligate him to his Government—and prevent him from thinking and acting as a free man. The question is, will we let them do it, or will we do the job ourselves? That question may well carry with it the future of American democracy.

Finally, I want to speak of something even more important. Throughout this discussion I have talked of business, bureaucrats and votes. To phrase it in its most vulgar aspect, I have been talking about saving our own skins. If we closed on that theme, this talk might well be considered just a little cheap. But this subject has a much broader aspect—a much deeper significance.

I want you to visualize with me, if you can, the homeward march of 10,000,000 men. Ten million of the finest men this generation of America has known. Among them is your son and mine.

Ten millions! That's a lot of men—and they represent a lot of potential human happiness. They represent a lot of firesides, a lot of wives and a lot of children, yet unborn. They represent the kind of parents to which those children will be born, the kind of homes they'll live in, the kind of schools and churches they'll attend, and in the end, the kind of America they'll inherit.

They're coming back to us, these men, not only because of blood ties, but they're coming back to us economically, politically, and spiritually. They're coming back to us because we control the businesses and the professions in which they will find their jobs and build their happiness. They are coming back to our leadership.

How we receive them, where we place them, how we train them and what we cause them to believe in, is up to us. What we do or fail to do when they come back, will to no small extent determine the future of America—not just the future of our sons, but the future of our grandsons and great-grandsons.

America faces a choice—democracy or dictatorship. In the years just ahead the decision will be made. The votes will be cast by the men who come back. Whether they vote for or against a free America will depend upon the kind of leadership they find. That means you—and me.

Probably at no time in the history of the world have so many ordinary men like us had the privilege of influencing world events—the privilege of constructively influencing so many human lives. Are we big enough? Can we forget our selfish interests long enough to do this job? Frankly, it's doubtful. Based upon past performances, the answer would have to be "no." But let's hope that on this job, we'll do better than we have done in the past. In all our lives we will never know a more splendid opportunity. We will never face a bigger job.

I opened this discussion with the first paragraph of Dickens' Tale of Two Cities. I think the last paragraph of the same book might be appropriate in closing. Because if we do this job as it should be done, then when we of our generation look backward at the evening of our lives, we can surely say as Sydney Carton said, "It is a far, far better thing than any we have done; it is a far, far better rest we go to than any we have known."

The Internal Defense of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, before the fifty-third continental congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York City, April 17, 1944:

Each continental congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution is a reminder of the struggles, sacrifices, and glorious deeds of the men and women who founded this Nation and which are perpetuated in your efforts to further the elements of patriotism and the national welfare. You Daughters of the American Revolution have the power in your hands and the purpose in your hearts to influence the guidance and direction of the destiny of our Nation.

The experiences of the past reveal that every period of great danger was first preceded by inaction, theorizing, and a paralyzing blindness to such fundamentals as the necessity of preparedness. It took a Pearl Harbor to shock us out of our lethargy and galvanize us to concerted action with a unity of effort.

Americans from the founding of their Government never have known the servile meaning of surrender—God grant we never will. True, there have been defeats—never capitulation. But some day history may change its course. Democracy as we have known it could become inert. Liberty and freedom could become heroic memories. This heritage could be lost by us unless it is cherished, fought for, and preserved as it was proclaimed and won by our forefathers. Other civilizations and nations have flourished and passed away and sinister new orders have sprung up. This could happen in America unless we jealously safeguard our foundations.

The first concern of every citizen, therefore, must be the internal defense of our Nation. We will win the war. Of this I am certain. But to win with a minimum of sacrifices and losses there must be no turning or wavering at home which would stem or clog the uninterrupted flow of materials to our fighting men on the far-flung battle fronts and seas. Breaches already are painfully evident in the unity of effort which is so necessary to the success of the ghastly fight we are waging against fanatical fiends who would rather be slain than conquered.

Something has happened in this land for which our forefathers fought and died. Once, it was a true melting pot, fusing the cultures and ideals of oppressed peoples everywhere into the common mold of Americanism. Our goal was the guaranty of equal protection and opportunity for all—it still should be.

But today, that noble purpose has been clouded and challenged by opposing interests. Constitutionally, we are a land where the will of the majority should prevail; actually, the will of the minority too often is overevaluated. There is a reason. As a people we expect and engage in fair play. Many of us are inclined to go about our daily tasks oblivious to the menacing forces around us. We are working in the interest of the majority and in the pursuit of that objective we take for granted that everyone else is doing the same. Too often, militant self-seeking, loudly vocal groups of muddled emotionalists, parlor pinks, fellow travelers, and avowed Communists are mistaken for the masses.

Scan the editorial page of any old-line ethical venture in journalism. The editor sets forth his views in clear and unmistakable language so the reader may make up his own mind. That is the way of the vast, unvocal majority. Now, consider some of the current, irresponsible journalistic attempts of groups which do not represent the best interests of democracy. Their editors not only proclaim their personal views but urge their readers to wire or write their demands urging this or that action. The Fascist-minded tyrant is no different from the native-born communistic-minded corruptionist. Both seek the same objective and speak the same sinister language—totalitarian control. Let us not minimize their evil effect. The time has come when loyal Americans, even though in the majority, must make themselves heard in defense of America, to balance the disruptive nonsense and neutralize the woeful will of a minority who would tear down and make rubble of the democracy our forefathers passed on to us.

Surely we have learned a lesson from observation in these recent tragic years. We have watched nations as they have been overrun and practically annihilated by the Nazis under Hitler after they have been weakened by internal strife engendered and fostered by subversive agents of that pagan order. Political and financial greed have blinded the leaders of those nations to the necessity of absolute unity, both internal and with their sister nations. The experience of the ages teaches clearly this lesson: Sacrifice leads to sunlit heights; selfishness leads to the darksome pit.

Our own internal defense demands oneness of effort and unselfish dedication to the preservation of the heritage of the American way of living. America cannot exist half democratic and half Fascist or Communist. Only the rebirth of the melting pot of old, fusing all peoples into vigorous, unmixed patriotism and a common unity, can truly accomplish this end.

The day of the front organization is not over. Already there are signs of a revival of the very forces that ridiculed preparedness and defense. To further insult the intelligence of the American public there are those who hold that the sneak attack on Pearl Harbor was justified, and still others who would not offend the Japanese by speaking disparagingly of them, while they behead American flyers, starve innocent civilians, and engage in other savage forms of debauchery and torture too horrible to mention.

America must, if it is to defend itself, build up a barrier against the prophets of doom who would trade personal advantage for principle, who would debauch freedom into license, and who malign America by shallow, superficial sugar-coated panaceas that are neither democratic nor defensible.

Knowledge is a bulwark of defense. No finer job ever has been done in the world's history than that being performed today by the alert journalists representing American newspapers and magazines. With fidelity to American principles they have sought to separate the true from the false and fact from rumor.

It is to the legitimate press that we must look for protection from the false prophets and deliberate propagandists. They are the watchmen on the ramparts. They are the narrators of facts, the exponents of truth, and the enemies of wrong. Not only must we expect a continued performance of high character but, as true citizens we must lend them our support whenever it is needed. With the press are their kindred purveyors of news and molders of public opinion—the radio and screen. They merit the same support and backing that should be afforded all protectors of freedom so long as they keep within the realm of fact and truth and aim to perpetuate our democratic institutions and honored traditions. By the same token, when unprincipled persons would foist alien ways of life upon the American people whether it be through the press, the screen, or the radio, they should be resisted with all fearless determination.

While patriotic men and women have given a commendable account of their stewardship of our internal security, a contrary record has been written by a segment of so-called journalistic enterprise. From this source has come a constant stream of vilification which has the effect of weakening our foundations of security. Cloaked with the guaranties of the Constitution, with brazen effrontery they seek to destroy constitutional government. Whether they hide behind the Fascist or anti-Fascist label makes little difference. The results are the same. Always seeking to incite class against class, race against race, and creed against creed, they foist themselves upon a people who seek to live and let live in peace and progress. The poison gas of misrepresentation and falsehood is employed by them in reckless quantities. If a voice is lifted against them, they cry of persecution and abridgment of freedom of speech. They are the enemies of true freedom of the press. They give one side only of the picture. They deal in half-truths or whole lies, thus putting weapons in the hands of those who would destroy a free press. Laws will not curb these malicious forces for they are usually cunning enough to keep within the strict letter of the law; only the therapeutic rays of a white-hot public opinion, informed and militantly democratic, will effect a cure.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has not been spared from such groups. Paid rabble-rousing propagandists misrepresent the F. B. I. as a menace to civil liberties. The truth is that the F. B. I. stands between them and their desire to abrogate liberties by installing their own treacherous and ruinous philosophies of rule by license. No device is too low for the forces that would tear down these ancient and honorable sentinels of our finest traditions and security. Unfortunately, such propaganda is not always labeled. It sometimes emanates from decent quarters that have been hoodwinked by misinformation.

Of prime importance is the need for our people to judge critically the source. Native-born agitators today who would sell America "down the river," regardless of their party line, have clearly established themselves as turncoats and dealers in colossal falsehoods. We should recognize them by their stripe which is neither American nor decent. The same is true of their Fascist counterparts—the variety that weeps and wails but never corrects, only obstructs.

As a people we may as well recognize that certain vital and fundamental problems do exist, through misunderstandings, ignorance, and a false spirit of toleration, which permit otherwise controllable conditions to get out of control. Baseless rumors and hates started by one bigot can, and frequently have, reached flood-tide proportions. The Ku Klux Klan, a few years ago, flourished on hate and false rumors just as did the small group of so-called Christian Fronters who hid behind a respectable group of people whose citizenship is exemplary. Neither was truly Christian, both were in fact rackets. So it is with other groups. I think the time has come to demand proof when biased accusations are leveled at groups of people because they are Catholic, Jew, gentile, white, or Negro. True Americans deplore racism, hate, greed, and injustice.

Our democracy was established because of the common desire of the founding fathers for tolerance. Yet, paradoxically, it was because of intolerance that the Revolutionary War was fought. Even today, our fighting men face the supreme sacrifice because of intolerance, intolerance of the system which has made one-man control the destiny of Germany and of Japan. Yet, it was misguided world tolerance and stupid apathy that permitted this condition to become a world menace. Here again, knowledge of the right kind and at the right time surely would have prevented the present world turmoil. Instead, an apathetic world viewed the antics of an Austrian paperhanger as something humorous—his rantings were regarded as those of a crazy man. Now is the time to make secure the internal defense of America; now is the time to plan for the future. Let us do it in the interest of America; let us put our own national self-interests first and be expedient rather than vacillating and appeasing.

Let us forever pledge that we shall keep here in America a way of life that is wholesomely democratic, where citizens walk consciously and fearlessly as free men.

We must preserve and teach democracy now for the future. All now realize that in many quarters we have failed in the past. Before Pearl Harbor, the lack of patriotic and militant sentiment and loyalty, together with a too evident attitude of selfishness discouraged timely preparation for defense.

This situation, however, is understandable when a condition can exist, for example, where subversive elements through pressure tactics, seek to dictate what publications are to be distributed in schools and which ones are to be banned. It is to God-fearing women such as you that America must look for support when the flanks of democracy are attacked by subversive-minded espousers of alien ways of life. You will let your voices be heard when the defense of the land needs strengthening and through you, the wisdom and sacrifices of the founding fathers shall not have been in vain.

To my plea for unity and knowledge, I would add another. It is the duty of patriotic citizens in high and low places to be sure of their facts when they level charges of nonfeasance or malfeasance, disloyalty, or misdirection at public servants, and if they do not know, they should inquire first before undermining confidence and causing disruption, for it must be remembered that the answers and vindications never catch up with the charges. The mouthings of the psychopathic publicity seeker, in or out of politics, should not be the springboard for public recognition. The defense and security of America are too sacred to be the medium of irresponsible feuding between selfish individuals who would warp and distort any fact into political buckshot.

Many fine American organizations, citizens, and institutions have been the subject of such attacks. Frequently, the charge is justified but leveled in the wrong direction. For example, on occasions, unprincipled persons have not been averse to implying or representing they were associated with the F. B. I. Questions of an offensive nature have been asked. Acts that have been construed as threats have occurred. In each instance when derelictions have occurred, it is the citizens' duty to see that they are corrected, but here and now I want to state in unmistakable language that no one is authorized to speak for the F. B. I. unless he is able to produce proper credentials of that organization. Likewise, I want to make it plain that the F. B. I. is a career service designed to protect all law-abiding Americans and, as such, it has been scrupulously kept out of politics by every administration since 1924. So long as I have the privilege to head it, it will never be used for political purposes. Anyone who charges that it exists for such purposes lies or does not know what he is talking about.

By force of necessity, any discussion of the defense of the Nation must eventually come down to the fundamental and basic unit of our civilization—the American home. I do not believe it is necessary for me to set forth in detail the conditions, not only unsavory but heartbreaking, which exist in our country at this time. You are intelligent individuals; you are aware of the staggering increase in lawlessness, of seeming blindness to the ruin which is being vested upon our society. You are equally aware that the very core of our homeland is being weakened. Something must be done. America's destiny rests at the threshold of the homes of our people. If we are to maintain our advanced position in the world, the home must be revitalized. For too long the duties of parenthood have been delegated. I am frank to say that I fear the future and what it will bring—more because our internal defense has been weakened than because of any external threat of force.

The emotional instability revealed by the experiences of the draft alone is enough to be the cause for alarm, to say nothing of the startling increase in the number of youthful offenders. The cause goes directly to the home. Make a survey in your own home towns and count the number of homes where there is a plan of training, by precept and example, to impel children to recognize their good fortune in being Americans. Are they taught to respect the American flag as a symbol of liberty? Do they respect the honorable forces of law and order? Are they taken to the shrines of great Americans and are they told of their glorious histories? Do they go to Sunday school and church? Are they taught that the best opportunities come from hard work and industry? Are they taught that honesty and integrity are the only way, as well as the best way of life? Are they being prepared to assume their full responsibility as useful citizens?

The figures point to the contrary. Last year a major crime occurred every 23 seconds. More persons were murdered within the United States than there were casualties at Tarawa. A robbery occurred every 12 minutes, a burglary every 2 minutes, a larceny every 39 seconds, and an automobile was stolen every 3 minutes. Remember that 13 percent of all murderers arrested were under 21 years of age, as were 39 percent of all robbers, 55 percent of all burglars, 37 percent of all thieves, 32 percent of all rapists, 30 percent of all arsonists, and 65 percent of all car thieves. In fact, nearly 23 percent of all persons arrested last year were under voting age. More boys 17 years of age and more girls 18 years of age were arrested than in any other age group. In fact, the arrests of girls last year over 1941, the last peacetime year, increased 130 percent. Until we can greatly change this picture, we are hardly in a position to boast of true progress.

But what can we expect when so many parents place their own pleasure and convenience before the training and security of their children? Unfortunately, we are not born with knowledge; we are born with the ability to learn—and it should be the duty of the parents to avail the child of the benefits of their own experience, before expecting them to assume the responsibility of life. Each individual must learn by personal experience, it is true, but youth should not be expected to be bruised and scarred needlessly when a guiding hand could set them on the right path at the beginning. I do not condemn youth. Your young people today have more advantages than ever before and correspondingly more temptations. But they lack the understanding, love, interest, and guidance of experience that can best be given by their mothers and fathers. Neither do I mean to say that parents deliberately lead their children from the straight paths of rectitude. They simply do not seem to care. Too many have other and more engrossing interests. Every newspaper in the land should start a column on a program of education based upon existing community social facilities. Every local chapter of your splendid organization and other splendid groups such as the National Federation of Women's Clubs and parent-teacher associations, should start a series of discussions enlisting the thousands of excellently trained specialists in the field of child guidance to help point the way. Every church and Sunday school in the land should start a year-round campaign to extend their facilities to attract every child in the country to the church of his own denomination.

There is one further step. While winning the war, we should also fight to win an everlasting peace at home. Your law-enforcing agencies have suffered the loss of trained men to the armed services and in facilities to maintain law and order. It is shortsighted and false economy to eliminate recreational and community facilities at home. Instead, they should be extended. What is the situation in your home town? Are your authorities supported as they should be? If not, you are the ones who will suffer. When law and order broke down in the roaring twenties and the delirious thirties, it was primarily because of technicalities, graft, and corruption. This is a trend we should guard against, for the technicalities already are beginning to work against protection of society.

The defense of our land is the joint task of every man, woman, and child—there can be no higher dedication of cooperative effort. If we fail, we are untrue to the men and women who give up their lives fighting for democracy. The only safety for America lies in a passionate determination to defend our own American tradition. May we each dedicate every fiber of our being to the noble endeavor of keeping America safe and secure in the American way.

O. P. A. Regulations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include a letter addressed to me by Mr. Don E. Huddleston, a member of the Malone (N. Y.) Price and War Rationing Board, together with a resolution adopted by the other members of the same board endorsing Mr. Huddleston's letter.

I feel that this is a most intelligent analysis of the method of O. P. A. operation and think it will be of interest to Members of the House and the country:

MALONE, N. Y., April 6, 1944.

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN,
Member, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KILBURN: It is my understanding that a bill appropriating money for the continuation of the Office of Price Administration another year will come before Congress in the near future. I submit the following information in the thought that you might like to make some inquiry before voting upon such a bill. Perhaps some explanation on the part of O. P. A. officials might not be out of order.

Since June 1943 I have been associated with the Malone War Price and Rationing Board, first as a member of the price panel and since March 1, 1944, as chairman of the tire panel. However, I want to make it entirely clear that I do not speak for the tire panel or the rationing board or any of the members thereof. I speak only for myself as an American citizen who believes that he still has the right of free speech.

As I gain experience it seems to me that the whole rationing program is being operated more and more by regulation dictated from Washington or Albany rather than by judgment and common sense. Every time I attend a panel meeting, I realize that there is little I can do except to initial those applications which meet the requirements of a certain regulation. True enough the regulations imply that there are decisions to be made by the board, but for the most part the regulations have narrowed the range of decision almost to the point of nonexistence. This is a job which can be done by any paid employee. Actually the panel has little function except to act as a sponge for public criticism. Permit me to give just one illustration.

Recently, a tire application came to us from a somewhat disreputable individual who happens to be a part-time salesman of a nonessential commodity. As such he claims occupational mileage and I am informed by members of the gasoline panel that he is entitled to a B book in accordance with the regulation. Since he has been granted a B book, he is also entitled to a tire according to the regulation. See tire regulations, p. 4119, par. 216, subpar. 1.)

At the same time a second application came from a man who has a job in town but who works part time on a farm. However, he has only an A book and as such is not entitled to a tire. (See tire regulations, p. 4119, par. 216, subpar. 1, ann. (.01)).

The country would be just as well off if the first man never had a tire and it probably would not seriously interfere with his way of making a living, but in my opinion the second man can make a sufficiently significant contribution to food production to justify his request. Yet, under regulations I have found no way in which it can be issued. It is the regulation that governs the case rather than the judgment of the Board and the knowledge of local conditions. I supposed that rationing was designed as a means of securing maximum contribution to the war effort. True enough we probably might refuse the salesman even though in the eyes of the regulations he might be able to build up a fairly good basis of appeal to the district office and even to Washington. Still that does not help the second man who might be able to contribute more to the war effort if the panel had more authority to act.

Secondly, I would like to point out that in my opinion the local administrative set-up of O. P. A. is almost impossible.

The chief clerk is appointed by the Board chairman with the prior approval of the district director. (See General Rationing Orders—Organization—p. 37303, par. 6105, subpar. B). Essentially, this means that he is appointed by the district director.

In another place I find that the Board chairman is responsible on behalf of the board for the supervision of the chief clerk and the clerical staff. (See General Rationing Orders—Organization—p. 37303, par. 61-04, subpar. h). This seems to imply that the local board has something to say about the operation of the local organization and is privileged to speak through the medium of its chairman.

In another place I find something about the responsibility of the chief clerk. It says: "Under supervision of and specifically responsible to the chairman etc." (See General Rationing Orders—Organization—p. 37303, par. 6105, subpar. c). This seems to imply that the chief clerk is responsible only to the chairman and that the Board as a whole has nothing whatever to say about local administration.

Doesn't this seem a perfect set-up for the creation of dissension between the members of the Board and the chief clerk and the district office?

Since essentially the chief clerk is employed by the district director and paid by O. P. A., it is only natural that in an attempt to hold his job, he would make certain that everything he does complies with the wishes of the district office regardless of the wishes of the local board. At the same time in one place the regulations imply that the Board has some control over the activities of the chief clerk. I think you can see what an impossible situation the chief clerk is in when he is faced with the problem of attempting to satisfy both the district director and the local board, especially when they do not see eye to eye on certain policies. Practically, this means that the chief clerk does the rationing in accordance with a specific regulation and the Board either goes along or else, and accepts the public criticism that may result. As a matter of fact I am reliably informed that district officials have on occasion told the chief clerk to disregard entirely the decision of the local board whenever he felt that the decision was not in complete agreement with O. P. A. policy. This type of thing is not only a perfect set-up for dissension, but it is creating dissension, reducing efficiency, and materially affecting the morale of the whole organization.

It is my belief that one of two things should be done. If we are to continue under the present set-up, I would suggest that O. P. A. issue a very specific directive giving the chief clerk complete authority over the rationing program in his area, that it be specifically pointed out that the local board has no authority except under the direction of the chief clerk and that this policy be published in order that the general public may understand where the responsibility lies. If this is not their policy, then I would suggest that a directive in simple language be issued placing the entire authority for the administration of the local rationing program in the hands of the local board, and that the entire clerical staff including the chief clerk be made 100-percent responsible to the local board. Personally, in the interests of the general public I believe the latter course should be followed, and that it would materially improve the efficiency and the morale of the organization. I can see no excuse for divided responsibility.

In the third place, I would like to make a very specific complaint against some of the present policies of the district office.

I have in my possession a memorandum, dated August 19, 1943, from Mr. Lester W. Herzog, district director, and addressed to all war price and rationing board chairmen, board members, and board personnel. In this memorandum he implies that board members are not to publicly criticize the regulations or policies of O. P. A. He goes on further to state: "If any member or local board employee should feel it necessary to submit a controversial subject to the newspapers or make it public in some other way, it will be considered as a violation of the oath of office. This office will expect that any board member or employee who issues such a statement shall at the same time submit his resignation to this office." In my opinion, this is dictatorship of the highest order. There may be some weak justification for asking paid Government employees not to criticize their organization, but there is a distinct difference between paid employees and volunteer public servants. Board members are not, in my opinion, employees of the United States Government. They are public servants of the people who are volunteering their time in an effort to serve the people, and in the eyes of the public have a very definite responsibility. To make such a demand as Mr. Herzog has made is absurd and foolish. True enough, we took an oath, but not to give our silent approval to dictatorship. No doubt when this letter becomes known, I will be exterminated from O. P. A. in true dictatorial manner, in which case I shall keep you informed.

In his memorandum, Mr. Herzog goes on to state: "Any such person may make any statements he chooses without criticism from this office, provided his resignation is filed at the same time."

I think the reasoning behind this statement is clear. Naturally, there would be little effective criticism from people outside of the organization who are not familiar with its operation. By silencing board members throughout the country, a perfect set-up is brought about for tightening controls and bringing them into the hands of a few people.

Perhaps you might be able to find out who in Washington instructed Mr. Herzog to issue this memorandum muzzling the servants of the people. If this regulation exists anywhere in O. P. A. policy, I suggest that you demand its removal before voting for their appropriation.

On or about January 22, I was called by a clerical employee of the local board and was asked several personal questions, including an inquiry as to what church I attended and what political party I belonged to. Upon inquiry I was told that this questionnaire had come from the district director's office. Since when has religion and politics had anything to do with the qualifications of board members or had anything to do in determining the policies of O. P. A.? Upon my next visit to the local office, I inspected a memorandum dated January 20, 1944, from Mr. Paul R. Duffie, district board operations executive, district office, Albany, N. Y., and directed to all chief clerks. In this memorandum he refers to the questionnaire and points out that board members do not need to answer the questions on politics and religion if they do not so desire, but that it will probably not be necessary to contact board members to get the information desired. However, I happen to know that a person claiming to be a representative of the district office came to this town the previous week, made a survey of the political affiliations of the board members and implied his dissatisfaction with the political set-up. As of April 4, 1944, a copy of this memorandum was in the file of the local office.

Perhaps you might be able to find out who in Washington instructed the district office to make a survey of the political and religious affiliations of local board members. If any regulation exists in which political or religious affiliations are a factor in determining eligibility for board membership, I would suggest that you demand their removal before voting for any appropriation.

I somewhat reluctantly became a member of the local war price and rationing board with the thought that perhaps I might be able in some small way to contribute something in the fight for democracy. However, I find that I am more and more becoming a front behind which it seems to me a form of dictatorship is being organized. A demand is being made of me that I either give my silent approval or get out. To this policy I strenuously object. If we are fighting for democracy, then let's fight for democracy.

The regulations say that "the district director shall have authority to select and appoint board members." (See General Rationing Orders—Organization—p. 37301, par. 6104, subpar. a). As a citizen of Malone, are you willing to continue to be rationed by a board appointed by a district director who, by his memorandum, has indicated his intent to muzzle the members and who, by his survey, has implied that he intends to give politics and religion some consideration? Personally, I do not believe this program or any other can be justified unless it is democratically operated. Therefore, I would suggest an amendment to the law governing O. P. A. directing that local board members be elected by the people whom they serve or that they be appointed by a board composed of elected representatives of the people. Don't let anybody tell you that this cannot be done, because it is being done now in another government agency with which I have been connected personally for the past 6 years and in connection with another rationing program. If direct elections seem too burdensome, then as a possibility, I suggest that they be appointed by a committee composed of the supervisors of the townships which are served by the board. I suggest further that the laws governing O. P. A. be revised in order that board members may be subject to removal under only two conditions.

1. At the pleasure of the people served by the board of their elected representatives.

2. When board members violate the provisions of a law as enacted by Congress.

I am convinced that rationing and perhaps some degree of price control is in the interest of public good when fairly, sincerely, and democratically administered.

I do not know how others may feel, but as for myself I would just as soon see O. P. A. abolished and take my chances in the open market, come what may, as to gamble with an organization set up under a dictatorial policy by regulation and drawn along religious and political lines.

Sincerely yours,

DON E. HUDDLESTON.

Whereas the regulations under which local rationing board operate are so complicated and it is almost impossible to operate efficiently; and

Whereas the administrative set-up is so involved with conflicting statements as to make the operation inefficient; and

Whereas the district director has gone beyond what we consider to be his authority in restricting the activities of board members; and

Whereas Don E. Huddleston, a member of the board, has already written a personal letter to the Honorable CLARENCE E. KILBURN, Member of Congress, in which he has outlined in detail the above-mentioned problems; and

Whereas we are in complete agreement with the statements made by Mr. Huddleston in his letter: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this board go on record as endorsing Mr. Huddleston's letter to Mr. KILBURN dated April 6, 1944, and that this resolution be sent to Mr. KILBURN with the request that it be attached to Mr. Huddleston's letter of the above-mentioned date.

Respectfully submitted.

Floyd C. Tarbell, B. O. LeDuc, W. J. Ashline, J. E. Price, H. B. Reddy, C. Dumas, L. J. Child, P. B. Brennan, William F. Malchow, Paul U. Smith, and F. W. Schmitzlein.

Class of 1965

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Malvina Lindsay from today's Washington Post:

CLASS OF 1965

(By Malvina Lindsay)

WAR BABIES SPEAK

We are the war babies of World War No. 2, the nearly 7,000,000 born since Pearl Harbor, the largest oncoming generation of youth this Nation has known.

You see us everywhere, gazing wonderingly on the world from our carriages on sidewalks and in parks, fretting on the crowded train coaches as we are being hauled about the country to see "Daddy," sleeping on benches in dreary waiting rooms of railway stations.

Many of us aren't getting a good start in life. Our fathers are away and we are shunted here and there from Army camps to homes of relatives. We never know the tranquillity and security of a home and of orderly living.

Many of our mothers already work and more will soon do so. Much of the time they are tired in body and anxious in mind. We may have to grow up without the guidance and companionship of fathers, without the reliance of their pay checks.

Yet despite all this, we know we are getting a better chance in the world than the babies of any other country. We also know that our Nation will not let us down, either now or in the future.

As the young men and women of the 1960's, as America's youth 2 decades hence, we ask that we be given as much protection as possible from the strains and sufferings of this war into which we were unwittingly born.

We ask above all that we get the foundation of physical health, that both our mothers and ourselves receive adequate medical care. We don't want to grow up with crooked legs or teeth, or to be scrawny, flabby, weak, or unpleasing looking adults. All of us want the cod-liver oil, orange juice, and doctor's attention that the most cherished babies get; all of us, as we grow older, want our parents to have the chance to buy health protection for us in terms of keeping with their incomes. None of us want to belong to another generation of "soft" youth, such as the one that now has flunked the draft by 50 percent.

We ask that we get the right mental start so that we will not grow up fearful, suspicious, resentful, unhappy, and unable to fit ourselves into society. To that end we ask for a program of education for our mothers so that they may give us psychic understanding, make us mentally self-reliant, and save us from being listed among the misfits of the future. We also ask that our communities, through clinics or classes, do their part in helping us solve our emotional difficulties.

We ask that those of us who are toddlers under 2 years old and whose mothers must for good reason be away from us, be included in the Nation's child-care program. We ask that as we grow older the schools or the communities give us places to spend our idle time before and after school hours so that we will not have to play in the streets, loaf at the drug stores, run around with gangs, and possibly furnish our Nation another generation of juvenile delinquents.

We ask that our mothers be given the chance to be healthy and calm nerved, that if they must support and rear us unaided, their burdens be lightened so that they will not be too tired to bring any joy to the care of us, and that they be able to smile oftener and thus bequeath to us the habit of happiness.

We ask that we be allowed to grow up in homes that are not haunted by fear of hunger and unemployment, and that whoever is supporting us has at least the opportunity to work.

We ask for education—as much as we can take, and of the sort that will fit us for the world of tomorrow, not of yesterday; for the education that will give us the key to knowledge unshackled by censorship or propaganda; education that will fit us to be citizens who will meet rather than shirk their responsibilities and who will pass on a better rather than a worse world to your grandchildren.

We ask for vocational guidance so that we will not grope futilely or wander down blind alleys and become frustrated, nonproduction human beings.

We ask that when our schooling is completed, we be given the chance to work and to contribute to society and that we do not become another generation of idle, transient, bewildered youth such as the first years of the depression saw.

We ask, of course, that you do all in your power to save us from a continuation of this war 20 years hence.

We ask that you start doing something about these things now. We don't want to hear you say, "We'll see about that later. Let's not scatter our forces. Let's get on with the war." For right now the patterns of our lives are being formed, our future destinies determined. We cannot afford to wait. Neither can you.

Anniversary of Battle of Warsaw Ghetto

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this day marks a very important anniversary in the struggle for freedom fought by a small group against ruthless oppressors.

On April 19, 1943, the German Government tried to obliterate the remnant of Jews who remained in Warsaw after most of the others had been destroyed by Hitler and his cohorts. On the 19th day of April 1943, German tanks rolled into the ghetto.

Let me give you the story as it appears in the New York Sun of April 14, 1944:

It was not an unusual incident—quite the contrary. The Nazis began throwing a cordon around one ghetto street, preparatory to picking up another few hundred Jews for deportation, but this time the results were unusual.

The Jews long had been preparing for revolt and this was the night for its beginning. As the Germans reached the ghetto's main street, they were met with a rain of bullets. Their tanks became burning pyres. Every house was a fort and every man and woman was armed.

Night after night and day after day the attacks on the Nazis continued Many died and so did many Jews die. The Germans pleaded for terms of peace and not liking them, called for reinforcements. The battle became hotter.

NO FOOD AND WATER

In time the ghetto was without food and without water. Ammunition was running low and the piles of dead were becoming higher and higher. The streets were masses of ruins. In 42 days it was over—over because the last Jewish defender had been liquidated. Or had he?

The Independent Jewish Press Service has information that even today a ragged, starved defender of the ghetto can be found crawling around the debris which once marked the ghetto homes and shops. If a Nazi tries to capture him, the attempt is fatal. These stragglers still have hand grenades and their attempted capture means that Jew and Nazi alike go to their certain deaths.

A documented account of the battle of Warsaw ghetto was prepared for the Yiddish Scientific Institute by Shlogme Mendelsohn. This report was printed at length in the issue of PM of April 16, 1944, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

BATTLE OF WARSAW GHETTO: JEWS CRIED FOR ARMS IN VAIN—DOCUMENTED STORIES TELL HORROR OF FIGHT TO STOP DEATH DEPORTATIONS

In the history of heroic and hopeless causes, the battle of the Warsaw Ghetto must take a high place. April 19 marks the first anniversary of this battle, in which a few thousand Jews armed only with light weapons and grenades stood off for weeks the crushing might of Hitler's forces. How and why these Jews fought is told in the following story prepared for the Yiddish Scientific Institute by Shlogme Mendelsohn from documented sources—reports of Polish Government observers, the democratic Polish underground press, and eyewitness stories. PM considers this account the best and fullest that has come to this office.

PART I. PROLOGUE

On July 22, 1942, the German authorities began their murderous liquidation of the Warsaw ghetto. On that day the Gestapo demanded from the Judenrat (Jewish council) that it supply for deportation to the East from six to ten thousand persons daily. The head of the council, Engineer Czerniakow, in protest against this demand, committed suicide.

The notices regarding deportation announced that families would be allowed to go together, to take some of their belongings with them and that they would all be settled for peaceful work. The deported Jews of France used to inquire for the "Estate of Treblinka"—Treblinka being the spot where Jews were slaughtered in gas chambers. These notices were presented to a population which for months already had been living in the horror of things to come. Simultaneously, the machinery of the Jewish auxiliary police was utilized by the Germans to spread reports about the favorable labor conditions which awaited the deported.

There were many—reports vary from 20,000 to 40,000—who reported voluntarily at the Umschlagplatz (deportation center) on Stawki Street in Warsaw. A picture that can drive one's mind to insanity—thousands of men and women going voluntarily to their death.

Several days after the first deportations, when thousands of Jews already lay asphyxiated in the gas chambers of Treblinka, letters were rumored to have arrived from the deported describing how well things were going for them in their new localities.

Day in, day out, thousands were either dragged from Warsaw or reported voluntarily for deportation. By the sixth day positive information had sifted through on the destination of those railway cars, packed as they were with human beings and sprinkled with quicklime. Despite the desperate desire on the part of the unhappy inhabitants of the ghetto to believe the Germans, to live at any price, the devil's game was unmasked. For a time the mad whirl still continued. Some were still hypnotized by the magic power of these papers which could spell life. But all this did not last long. The abyss of death opened. As the Polish Government report puts it:

Through the streets of Warsaw wandered pale shadows, their eyes frightened, visionless. They ran from street to street, in the delusion that perhaps on the next street the danger might not be as great. Carloads of dead children rumbled over the pavement. Corpses lay unburied on the sidewalks. Deportations continued for weeks.

At the end of 1942 there were a few months of comparative quiet. The hangman rested. Fear reigned in the emptied streets of Warsaw. Terrified eyes peered into the blackness of the night. Ears were strained.

PART II. PREPARATION

While the deportations and murders were still in full swing, the idea of revolt was born.

According to the accounts of the Polish underground newspaper Przez Walke do Zwyciestwa (a radical democratic publication) of December 15, 1942, the greater part of the remaining population consisted of the young and middle-aged, comparatively healthy and able-bodied. The determination to resist gained strength among them. A report of the underground Jewish labor movement dated as early as October 1942 reads in part:

"We shall never forgive the commandant [of the underground Polish military organization] for refusing us arms so that we could die as men."

The period of preparation for armed revolt began. In a letter of December 17, 1942, from London, the unforgetable Szmul Zygelbojm [1] writes:

"I worry now about the problem of the next steps I have to take in the [Polish] National Council and the demands I have to make of the Government. The most important question is this: At home [in Poland] there is a split on whether the time is ripe for armed revolt against the invader. All Polish organizations without exception are opposed to it, because it would only destroy and drain the blood of the people without any results. For this reason the Jewish masses were denied the arms to fight against German annihilation."

Zygelbojm believed, and rightly so, that an uprising must be organized even if it would not lead to a general revolt in the country. The question was discussed by the Polish National Council in secret session. I do not have the right to give you details of that meeting. But by the end of December or the beginning of January, the Jewish underground began to receive arms. This was due partly to that secret session of the national council, but in the main it was a result of negotiations and cooperation between Jewish and non-Jewish resistance groups in Poland itself.

January 1943 witnessed a revival of rumors that a complete liquidation of the ghetto was in the offing. We read in the newspaper Przez Walke do Zwyciestwa of January 30, 1943:

"After a lengthy interval, the further liquidation of the Warsaw ghetto began anew on the 18th and 19th of this month. The Germans have already either killed on the spot or deported between 5,000 and 10,000 people from among the remaining population of 40,000 who had survived from the original 400,000 persons in the ghetto. Thus only 30,000 to 35,000 inhabitants remain. Among others the Germans have deported all employees of the supply department and almost all physicians. The result is hunger and epidemics. We must emphasize and extend our admiration to the fighter unit which during the latest liquidation met the Gestapo with gun in hands."

Now begin the 3 intermediate months between the first and second resistance. We have no information as to what happened in the ghetto during this period. I do not mean the murders perpetrated by the Germans. I am thinking of the internal organization, the political and spiritual preparations among the approximate 40,000 people for the incomparable, historic act. To arm a great part of the population under the conditions prevailing in the ghetto, to organize leadership, to divide the city into defense sections, to dig tunnels for communication with the part of the city outside the ghetto walls—all this demanded extraordinary discipline, an unimaginable will, tremendous self-sacrifice, and sublime revolutionary strength. Human dignity, group pride, and revolutionary tradition must have combined to organize and plan a war which everyone knew would be lost.

PART III. BATTLE

In the middle of April the Nazis announced that 5,000 Jews must report on Stawki Street for deportation. The first transport soon departed. The underground Polish newspaper Polska of April 29, 1943, writes:

"Several Jews in that transport managed to escape. They brought back horrible news. It turned out that the transport from the ghetto stopped not far from Warsaw. There the Jews were ordered to dig their own graves, which were then surrounded by machine guns. A second transport was scheduled to follow on April 20, Hitler's birthday. This news terrified the ghetto. Its streets emptied. People vanished from the streets, the workshops, homes, and factories. The Gestapo began searching, dragging forth the women and children as hostages. They assembled them on the Jewish cemetery, ordered them to dig graves, and wait there for their men. But as a reply from the seemingly empty houses came flying bullets and hand grenades. Roofs and attics began to spit fire and to rain death on the German police. Fear descended on Hitler's henchmen. They fled in confusion."

Use heavy guns

The official government representative thus describes the battle:

"The fight began on the eve of April 19. Armed German detachments surrounded the ghetto, then marched in to complete its liquidation. They came in numerous, heavily armed S. S. detachments on cars mounted with machine guns and on tanks. Ukrainian, Latvian, and Lithuanian detachments supported the S. S. The Jewish fighters began the battle as soon as the Germans marched in.

"The first period of struggle lasted a week. Jewish resistance was brilliantly planned. In the first days of combat the Germans took severe punishment; hundreds of them were killed and more wounded. Several times they had to retreat behind the ghetto walls. During that first week the battle had all the characteristics of regular military operations.

"Due to their defeats during the first 2 days, the Germans changed their tactics on April 21 and attacked one by one the points of resistance by fire (with incendiaries dropped from the air, incendiary grenades, and flame throwers), as well as by heavy artillery. Many fires were started in the ghetto.

"On April 23 the Germans took the central and outer parts of the ghetto. The combat zone then moved farther north. Here the main battle continued, but even in the conquered parts strong guerrilla activity was maintained. The main strength of the Jewish defenders was now concentrated near Okopowa Street and Powazkowska. German planes began attacking this area with incendiary bombs. The Jews replied by setting fire to the German factories situated there and to the ammunition depots, first capturing the ammunition.

"The regular military action lasted about a week. By April 28 the Germans had thrown into the battle 6,000 heavily armed troops. Estimates place the number of German dead at between 1,000 and 1,200. The Jews lost about 3,000 to 5,000 during the same period."

The next period of the struggle began when regular military operations gave way to guerrilla warfare. The report of the Government representative continues:

"At the close of the fifth week of the Jewish-German war, the Jews had not yet ceased their bitter resistance. The Germans are extremely cautious in their attempts to bring the ghetto to submission. Their main methods are setting fire to buildings, blowing them up with dynamite or flooding the cellars where the Jewish fighters hide. The rebels begin their chief activities at nightfall. It is already 3 weeks that building after building, street after street, are being burned."

The armed resistance started on April 19 had become a people's war in the truest sense of the word. All sections of the Jewish population of 40,000 partook in the struggle; some with gun in hand, some by service work, others by bringing medical aid to the wounded. That is the vital characteristic and the historic significance of the revolt. It was conceived by the underground movement, prepared by a coordination committee of several political movements and carried through heroically by the Jewish people at large.

[1] Zygelbojm, then a member of the Polish National Council in London, killed himself last May in protest against what he believed was the "indifference with which the Allies observed Hitler's massacre of European Jews."

Unspeakable horror

I shall not deal in detail with German bestiality during the struggle. It reached a stage of horror beyond description. A few facts only, as reported by the underground press, shall be stated here. Inside the improvised Jewish hospital the sick were shot in their beds. Jews who managed to escape from the burning buildings were either shot or driven back into the flames.

In the early days of battle, the Jewish Fighter Organization issued the following appeal:

"We realize that the Polish underground movement pays homage to the fighters of the Ghetto. But only the United Nations can give immediate and concrete aid.

"In the name of the millions of murdered Jews; in the name of all those who were burned, tortured, and slaughtered; in the name of those who are still fighting heroically though condemned to certain death in an unequal struggle; we call to the world to listen to us today.

"The Allies must avenge our death and our suffering, so that even the bestial enemy may understand why he is being punished. Our allies must finally realize that a tremendous historic responsibility will fall upon those who remained passive in the face of the unbelievable Nazi crime against a whole people whose tragic epilog we witness today. The desperate heroism of the people of the ghetto must stir the world to an action equal to the greatness of the movement."

Die with dignity

The appeal leaves no doubt that the fighters thought not only of dying with dignity but also of arousing the conscience of the world. They believed that the heroic fight would force the Allies to act against Hitler's headsmen and thus prevent further slaughters. Those who fell perhaps believed in it to their very last breath. Those who remained alive must carry deep in their hearts their bitter disillusionment.

For with the great pain of humiliation, we must admit that the call to the world remained unheard. Unheard were not only the voices of the two small towns of Krynki and Nieswiez, about whose struggles we unfortunately know nothing, but that they took place, but even the great battle of the Warsaw ghetto did not accomplish this purpose. That this happened was not the guilt of the fighters. They were guilty only of credulity.

I also wish to quote from the tributes paid by many individuals in public life to this valiant epic fight.

Governor Dewey said that the uprising in Warsaw had inspired the forces of freedom.

Wendell L. Willkie described it as "a milestone in the old-age history of the Jewish people." Bishop William T. Manning said that the Warsaw revolt was "an act of heroism which has had few equals in history."

The Reverend Robert I. Gannon, of Fordham University, said that on April 19 he will include in the prayers "the thousands of just and upright Jews who perished at the hands of the Nazis in Poland, as I do every day, for the holy souls."

Dr. George N. Shuster, president of Hunter College and Catholic lay leader, described the ghetto affair as "a picture of the almost forgotten bravery of olden times." Viscount Halifax, British Ambassador to the United States, said that "barbarous as the Nazi policy toward the Jews of Germany has always been, it is easily surpassed in savagery by the treatment accorded the Jews of Poland. The revolt of the Jews of Warsaw," he said, "proves that the human spirit is indestructible."

Farley Bides His Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 18, 1944

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following editorial from the Journal News, of Rockland County, N. Y.:

FARLEY BIDES HIS TIME

It's interesting to note in words of one syllable that Democratic State Chairman James A. Farley is due to be dumped by New York State Democrats. At the moment of the announcement Jim Farley had nothing to say and he probably will have little to say until later on. This much can be said: Jim Farley will retire as State chairman if he so chooses, and he won't retire if he doesn't so choose.

There is a magic in the Farley name which revives old loyalties by its very mention. * * * Perhaps there aren't as many of those old loyalties as there used to be for Jim Farley has not had the patronage that once he had and old friends in the ranks have been replaced. No matter, there are still enough old friends and enough new friends for him to retain his power in his home State, an area he knows like the palm of his hand, and whence he originally rose to power.

The saying goes that when a politician has once slipped he is a dead duck, and had best not attempt a come-back. That's still true, but Jim Farley has not slipped and has no worry on that score. * * * Jim Farley is a practical politician, a man of his word, and a man of honor, and he stands head and shoulders above those who are now sniping away at him. * * *

Mr. Farley has seen fit to differ with the administration, to hold to the line of the constitutional Democrats. * * * It will be a sorry day for the Democratic organization if ever they succeed, for out with Jim Farley would go all those loyal Democrats who believe as he does. This is not a year when the Democratic Party can afford to lose any votes.

The support of New York State Democrats is a rather important item in a national election for it carries with it a husky block of electoral votes. It would be rather foolish to assert that the loss of Farley and his friends would be offset by American Labor Party support * * *.

One of Jim Farley's uncanniest gifts is his ability to determine whence and whither the winds of political chance are blowing. He can do more with one cross section than most prognosticators can do with a national poll. * * *. He saw some of his fears of Democratic loss realized 2 years ago when Governor Dewey carried the State. The wind was setting in the direction he had foreseen.

Constitutional Democrats as represented by Mr. Farley will long have a place in the national picture. * * * Mr. Farley is still a young man and he can well afford to bide his time. When the time comes for constitutional Democrats to climb back into the saddle he will be there to climb.

Meanwhile, he can afford to let the wind that blows * * * whistle as much as it pleases. It takes more than wind to blow him out of his driver's seat unless he chooses to take a temporary rest. * * *

A Post-War Foreign Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, many editorials and columnists have discussed fully Secretary Hull's radio speech of April 9, as it relates to Germany, Japan, Italy, and the neutrals. Few, if any, have approached it from the angle of the post-war program outlined by Mr. Hull, which, in part at least, is undoubtedly the fruit of President Roosevelt's conferences with leaders of Allied Nations at Casablanca, Cairo, Teheran, Washington, and elsewhere.

Knowing that many of my constituents did not hear the broadcast and did not have the time to go over the speech with a fine-tooth comb, I have prepared for release to the newspapers of my district—Second, Kansas—the conclusions I have reached from a careful reading of the speech, which covered only a part of the 17 points previously announced by Mr. Hull.

Possibly this release, which follows, will serve to provoke discussion, crystallize sentiment, dispel doubt as to the existence of an administration post-war policy and, perhaps, bring into sharper focus the picture of the part the President and his Secretary of State would have this country play in the post-war world.

IN WASHINGTON WITH CONGRESSMAN ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

Since you all know what our foreign policy is (Secretary Hull stated it was known to all men), I suppose there is no need for further discussion—or is there?

Three times Mr. Hull referred to free and democratic nations, 15 times he used the word "democratic"—including by inference at least, Russia—which does not coincide with my view of democracy or a free democratic nation, even though it is a hard-hitting ally as far as the war against Germany is concerned. (It's neutral in our war with Japan.)

After listening to the 45-minute broadcast and carefully analyzing the text several times, the foreign policy seems to add up to something like this: Prior to the fall of France in the spring of 1940, we had begun preparations for self-defense—after France's fall, we started to strengthen those resisting aggressors. At that time it was England only, Russia being a party to a nonagression pact with Germany. Hence our policy was to aid England.

In August of 1941 came the Atlantic Charter which Mr. Hull passed over lightly, saying it is merely an expression of fundamental objectives, the signers agreeing not to seek any territorial gains, and which was later agreed to by all of the United Nations.

Mr. Hull told us—without mentioning the existing League of Nations—that a basis has been established and extensive work has already been done on the form and substance of a global international organization to—

(a) Maintain peace and prevent aggression;

(b) Bring about economic cooperation as a partner of other free nations;

(c) Provide adequate forces to preserve peace (world police);

(d) Authorize an international (world) court for the development and application of law;

(e) Create international arbitration machinery;

(f) Improve the material condition of the peoples of the signatory nations;

(g) Stimulate production in industry and agriculture by removing restrictions (tariffs) from international commerce;

(h) Provide investment capital (world R. F. C.); and

(i) Improve labor standards and standards of health and nutrition throughout the world.

Conceding the necessity of some post-war cooperation carrying with it the surrender of some degree of our self-rule, does this go too far? Does it go far enough? These are the questions facing "we, the people." Think it over and we'll talk about it this summer.

The Price We Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 19, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VURSELL] said correctly that "We have no yardstick by which we can judge the value of a billion dollars. You can say it as easily as a million, but we have lend-lease now according to the gentleman from West Virginia, something like $67,000,000,000. It is easy to say that, but that is equal to twice the value of all the real estate in the United States today."

Preceding the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SCHIFFLER] referring to the lend-lease fund grand total as more than $63,000,000,000, said "This represents more than one-fifth of the total wealth of our Nation and nearly one-half the current national income."

I am reminded that the publicity given the statement I made during the course of the hearings on the naval appropriation bill with reference to the $300,000,000,000 cost of the war to date, reduced to a comparative yardstick, suggests the interest of the public in such things.

The Associated Press carried the following story with respect to that incident:

PLUMLEY DESCRIBES COST OF WAR

WASHINGTON, April 12.—Consider a 20-foot wide highway, paved with dollar bills and stretching around the globe more than 13 times and, according to Representative PLUMLEY (Republican, Vermont), you will have a good idea of the cost of the war to the United States.

PLUMLEY made the observation during hearings on the Navy appropriation bill reported to the House today. For round figures he used $300,000,000,000.

Reduced to $1 bills, and laid side by side and end to end, PLUMLEY said that amount would "go 317,187 miles, or thirteen and seven twenty-fifths times around the globe in a highway running 20 feet wide."

The calculation, he explained, was made by "a friend in the Navy" at the request of "a thrifty citizen of Vermont."

The thrifty citizen's reaction, he added, was:

"But somebody has to pick it all up."

Mr. Speaker, I did not then say, but might well have done so, that 300,000,000,000 $1 bills laid end to end would extend 30,000,000 miles, in round numbers, or 29,000,960 miles to be exact. That is nearly a third of the distance to the sun, which astronomers tell us is 92,900,000 miles away. Just think of that.

If you wish to get on to the gold standard, let us take $5 gold pieces to use in our experiment. Five dollar gold pieces are five hundred and eighty-two ten thousandths of an inch thick, and we will pile them on top of one another till we have stacked up $300,000,000,000 worth. You have not the slightest idea, unless you have figured it, how high a column you will have. Believe it or not, the monument you will have made of gold, representing expenditures made, will soar into the blue of the heavens 291,000,000 feet, or 55,113 miles. That is substantially one-fourth of the way to the moon, which is what the cow jumped over and the New Deal started to reach in its wastefulness and extravagant spending—and is 238,857 miles away.

Your dollars in $5 gold pieces make some monument, but measure only the cost of the war to date.

Let us get down onto the old earth and keep our feet on the ground while we spread $300,000,000,000 worth of dollar bills all over the land to see how much territory they will cover. End to end and side by side, these dollar bills will cover 768,709 acres. That is an area in acres larger than the State of Rhode Island, the District of Columbia, Grand Isle County, and a considerable portion of Essex County in Vermont, all combined.

And the end is not yet. So it behooves everybody to economize in the expenditure of the taxpayers' money. Somebody will have to pick up these dollars sometime to put them or their equivalent back into the Treasury of the United States to keep us solvent.

Back when we were only $45,000,000,000 in New Deal debt—and that was in 1940 when we were being told the Budget would someday be balanced—I figured it out that, as of February 12, 1940, if 50 men were to start on that day and work continuously for the next 1,940 years to pick up these bills, and each picked up 1 every minute every day every year, they would have put back into the Treasury only $40,677,200,000.

So you take three hundred billion, instead of forty-five billion, as a basis, and, using my 1940 figures, do a little calculating for yourself. Those 50 men would have a hard job to pick up enough to pay the interest as it has accrued and will continue to accrue, to say nothing about picking up enough to make a dent on the principal sum.

What a mess. Is there any reason to doubt that the American people when they come to their senses will relieve themselves of the incubus of incompetency, wastefulness, and bureaucracy found in the present administration of our internal economic affairs? If there be any such reason to think the people will not eventually save themselves, then our form of government is on the road to folding up now as a Government of, for, and by the people.

What can the New Deal find of which to boast in such a sorry spectacle?

The people must save themselves, to save their self-respect, to save the country.

Consecration of Bishop Dun

REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, yesterday at the beautiful Episcopal National Cathedral, which I attend, there was consecrated as bishop, the Very Reverend Angus Dun, who was formerly dean of the Cambridge Theological School at Cambridge, Mass. We of Massachusetts are very proud and very happy that the board, in selecting the bishop of the National Cathedral, chose Bishop Dun. He is a man of sterling character, kindly, and broad-minded. He has great ability and great spirituality. I am glad that he can do even more as head of the National Cathedral at Washington during these tremendously trying days than he did as dean of the theological school. The world needs today as never before the consolation and inspiration of religion. The sermon delivered by the Right Reverend Henry Knox Sherrill, D. D., bishop of Massachusetts, is as follows:

TEXT OF CONSECRATION SERMON—BISHOP SHERRILL SEES CHURCH LEADERSHIP VITALLY NEEDED TO HEAL ILLS OF TORN WORLD

We are met to share in the service of the consecration of a bishop. As we proceed there will be heard words proclaiming the great truths of the gospel. There will come before us constant reminders of the long life of the Christian church and the story of successive generations of saints, evangelists, and heroes.

In this cathedral, on this deeply significant occasion, we feel the reality of the presence of the living God. It would be easy to think and to speak solely of the glory of God, of His goodness and mercy, of the comfort and peace which come from fellowship in the blessed company of faithful people.

It is a temptation to shut the doors as of an upper room and so to forget for the moment the stern and tragic realities of the world in which we live. There are times when such relief and release are essential. But here we are consecrating a leader in the Christian church. A leader must be prepared to face the facts, the discouragements as well as the opportunities of his times.

CHURCH IS BODY OF CHRIST

The church, St. Paul declared, is the body of Christ. It is not my intention to elaborate this familiar statement. I only wish to emphasize what the physical body of Christ faced in obedience to the will of God. That body had nowhere to lay its head. That body was set steadfastly to go to Jerusalem to face danger and arrest. That body was crucified on the cross.

The church, we say, is the body of Christ. Is the servant above His Master or the disciple above His Lord? To be truly the body of Christ, the church of Christ can expect no sheltered or favored position. The church must live so dangerously, so sacrificially that the Master can once again say, "This is My body which is given for you."

It is essential that we understand that fact today. There are epochs in history which seem to be turning points, when decisions are made and roads chosen which determine the course of human events for generations. It is admittedly difficult to view dispassionately and to evaluate one's own time, but everything points to the stern fact that we are in such an era.

I am not thinking alone of the winning or losing of the war. I am thinking even more of the character of the world which is to be. Our situation is too well known to need detailed description. There is no east and west in one sense, for modern invention has made the twain meet. Everything, from physical boundaries to men's hopes and fears, is in a state of flux. With clashes of nations, colors and races, there are cruelties and hatreds.

LONGING OF UNTOLD MILLIONS

Also we may be thankful there are noble deeds of high sacrifice. Above all, there is an unutterable longing on the part of untold millions for the new and finer day which, please God, some day will dawn. It is not a comfortable, but a dangerous world. The church cannot escape the common trial by fire. Too often Christian people are inclined to live in a paradise of wishful thinking which overestimates the influence of the church and minimizes the difficulties we confront. We are prone to lack discipline and determination because when we are with church people and groups we become complacent.

Surely now any sane view both of the church and the world should stir us to the realization of the magnitude of the task before us. Is the church merely an agreeable association without vital impress on the times, or is the church the body of Christ who gave His life? May it not be true that we are living in a period when the fullness of time has come again?

Certainly we are at one in the conviction that Christ has a message and a life for our day. Surely we must proclaim that His gospel is applicable to our social order. But it is not enough to preach and to resolve; it is essential that the Word become flesh, that there be a true body of Christ in an individual and corporate life which will determine the course of history.

Let us apply this to some of the pressing questions before us. I imagine that most of us would agree that the greatest need beyond the immediate winning of the war is the establishment of what, to avoid political terms, we may call a world family of nations. Only on the basis of such international understanding and cooperation can world peace be maintained and a more equable and stable world order be established. There can be no debate as to Christ's teaching as to the brotherhood of man, not as a political slogan, but because all men are the children of a Heavenly Father.

ISOLATION IS SPIRITUAL HERESY

From the point of view of Christianity, isolationism of an individual, a nation or a race is a spiritual heresy. God was not isolationist when He so loved the world. The church has never been isolationist in sending out missionaries to the four corners of the globe. I am not speaking in terms of any one scheme of world organization, but of the general spiritual objective to which the church is committed as the servant of Christ. It is to be hoped that from the fellowship of the church will come inspired and determined men and women who will work out and support the definite means of achieving this objective.

This calls for more than sermons and resolutions; it demands attributes of mind and of heart. Above all, there must be a unique quality of life within the church. The missionary cause is not a work of supererogation, not trying to force our way of life upon someone else. Missions mean the sharing of the best we have, the truth of God in Christ, and then living in a fellowship with God which transcends all barriers of nationality.

We may evolve all kinds of international machinery which is necessary, but which will be bound to fail if formed only for reasons of fear or of selfish advantage. There must be the spiritual motive and life. We may be grateful to God and to thousands of known and unknown missionaries that, in almost every land, yes, including Japan, there are those who count themselves members of the Christian church. There are difficulties and tensions which will continue. But here the church can be the body of the Christ who draws all men to Himself.

Along the same line, there is the whole problem of race relationship, a question not peculiar to the Far East or India, but one which confronts us at home with immediate and pressing necessity. Again the gospel note of brotherhood rings clear and strong. There cannot be the slightest question as to Christ's way of loving kindness which is more than justice. To be realistic it is impossible to ignore the perplexities, the fears, and the prejudices which so often tie our hands and confuse our heads.

PROBLEMS CONCERN CHURCH INTIMATELY

I am not proposing any definite radical solution. I am saying that here is a matter which deeply concerns the Christian church, which is intimately connected with the practice of the religion we profess. Again it is not a question of pronouncements and of programs, though they have their place, so much as it is a matter of life within the church. Are we in truth a fellowship in which God is no respecter of persons? The church is called upon to set an example, to create a spiritual atmosphere in which brotherhood can grow.

Let us take our economic order. There are those who uphold the theory that there certainly is no concern of the church. But others more realistic see that the material and the spiritual are not so easily separated. I learned long ago when I was a chaplain in France that it is hard to pray when you are unbearably cold. The church's interest in the social order is to see that there is the proper environment so that the spiritual life of men may have the chance to live and develop.

In our cities we know that slums, with their bad housing, produce crime. There are slums equally in rural areas where poverty results in ignorance and in evil and where the life of the spirit has indeed small opportunity. The church cares for all men irrespective of their station, but the church should have an especial care for those who through circumstances beyond their control are oppressed by surroundings which destroy opportunity.

But for a much broader reason the church must be concerned with the social order. We live in a period of complexity when great social forces carry the individual along a current which he is unable to control. The war is the supreme, if not the only, example of this. Millions of people who had nothing to do with the policies of nations or of statesmen have been uprooted and sent to far distant places by the exigences of the times.

CHRISTIAN LIFE NOT EASY

What is true of war, in lesser degree is true of business, of labor, or of any of the great social organisms of today. Certain individuals of special gifts or of heroic proportions may for a time seem to breast the tide, but for most people it is an impossibility. The spiritual life practically is conditioned to a tremendous degree by the framework in which it is set.

Christianity does not claim that the Christian life is easy or ever will be, but the church must strive to see, unless religion is to be the possession of the few, or unless Christianity returns to the catacombs or the deserts, that the average man lives in an environment in which he has a fair chance to practice the teaching of the Master.

The world cannot remain one-quarter Christian and three-quarters pagan; for a house divided against itself cannot stand, as the present tells us in suffering. Once again this is not primarily a matter of statements or of resolutions. It is the matter of the common life of us all within the church. Have we such a consciousness of the presence of God, of the impelling summons of the Christ, that from our churches will go industrial leaders, economists, laborers, farmers, men and women of every walk of life who in the name of Christ are champions of a more Christian social order?

Let us come to the church. Here is perhaps the most distressing fact of all. The church which St. Paul stated to be the body of Christ is a divided and broken body. Under these circumstances how can the church preach unity to nations and men? The familiar answer is too true to be lightly turned aside: "Physician, heal thyself."

WORLD WANTS CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP

At a time when the forces of evil are so strongly entrenched, when men and women are longing for clear and convinced Christian leadership, there are divisions in the very family of Christ. At a time when the trumpet should give a clear and certain note, there are many trumpets and the notes not in harmony. No words can effectively describe the unhappy effect of this upon average humanity, non-Christian as well as Christian.

I realize full well that this is a somewhat brutal simplification of the situation. There is the long history of the church which has caused this condition. There are prejudices to be overcome and wounds to be healed. On the other hand, we must not forget the real progress which has been made in the greater cooperation of the churches. But what has been accomplished is infinitesimal to what must be done. I know many of the tensions and difficulties, but this cause cannot be ignored, on the lower ground, because of plain common sense; on the higher, because who can doubt what is the will of Christ?

I am not suggesting a colorless, regimented uniformity, or a mere theoretical conceived union, but a deep and overpowering unity of the spirit. Again it is not a matter of words, but of the character of the Christian fellowship and of the vision we have of the glory of God. Let the church be the body of Christ.

It may seem strange to some that I have not touched upon the special responsibilities and opportunities of the episcopate. I assure you that I have not forgotten them. They are implicit in all I have said. A bishop has the privilege of being a pastor to clergy and people. He has upon his mind and heart the spiritual care of all the churches. He has important administrative duties, but they are insignificant compared to the quality of his spiritual vision and leadership. This is involved in every act, whether it be the direction of candidates for the ministry, conferences with clergy, wardens, and vestrymen, visitations for confirmation or contacts with the community. With humility and yet with persistent courage he must strive to keep the church true to the Master, or else the salt will have lost its savor.

BISHOP IS MISSIONARY

The bishop is also a missionary. If one may reverse the figures, he cannot be content to minister alone to the one within the fold, he must reach out to the 90 and 9 who in our world have not realized the implications of Christian discipleship. The bishop must not be insistent upon his authority, and position and rights, as such. The church is not a club with certain officers and with the purpose of mutual help and comfort. The church is a living, militant missionary force, glad to spend and be spent, not careful of her own prerogatives, even her own life. Nothing which is human can be alien to her purpose. The bishop should be the exemplar of this truth.

Perhaps the noblest fact in our day is that millions of men and women everywhere are giving themselves without counting the cost to a cause which they conceive to be greater than they. Whatever their limitations, and they are many, they have learned the meaning of sacrifice. They put to shame many of our complacent self-centered conceptions of the Christian life. They will spurn any institution, no matter how venerable or sacred, which is interested merely in self-service, or self-preservation.

The church is the body of Christ. A body is to be used, as was Christ's body—used to heal the brokenhearted, to free captives, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord, not for the sake of social reform alone but that men might be made into the glorious body of their risen and victorious Lord. That is what it means to be a bishop or a priest or a deacon or a layman, in the church. We must never forget these uplifting yet exacting words: "Ye are the body of Christ."

PRAYER FOR NEW BISHOP

My brother: Those of us who know you will realize with what deep regret you leave the special work of training men for the ministry of the church. Because this is so vital in your eyes, I feel certain that in this new office you will find many opportunities to further this same cause. Out of years of study and of teaching, fundamental truths of the word of God have laid hold upon you and you care deeply that these truths be applied to the church and to the world. With simplicity, steadfastness and sympathetic understanding you will labor to this end.

Again, those of us who know you appreciate your genuine pastoral insight and care. Clergy of many points of view, parishes and missions will find in you a wise counselor and friend. You will strive to make the church in this diocese a fellowship, which is the body of Christ. Perhaps I can best express our prayer for you in the familiar words of the prayer for the alumni of the school you have served so well—that God will grant unto you the spirit of wisdom that you may teach His people His eternal truth and the spirit of holiness that you may go before them and lead them into His everlasting kingdom.

Manpower Mobilization Bill Agitated Again

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the pressure in the Congress for the enactment of some sort of a manpower mobilization bill is rising again. The administration is putting on all the pressure it possibly can muster. It has surrounded the whole issue in a cloud of confusion and contradiction. Having done that, it now asserts that since nobody seems to understand either the situation or the needs of the Army and the Navy and the Air Corps, we simply must believe implicitly those officers sent to testify before the committees of the Congress, that the manpower of the Nation—which includes, of course, the womanpower and the childpower, in the final analysis—must be brought under military control.

The master technique of the administration and the New Deal palace guard has been from the first to create so much contradiction, cross purposes, confusion, and misunderstanding as to leave everybody with a sense of futility when trying to understand the issue—whatever the issue has been—and then to demand legislation on the ground that an emergency existed, or that a crisis impended which the people could not be permitted to know about, and then to try to force the legislation through the Congress. That technique has usually been successful. So, as has been the practice, the administration has now produced another emergency—a so-called manpower shortage. It has pulled out every stop, it has used every chord to play the people into a sense of confusion, futility, and bewilderment, in order that the legislation can be forced through the Congress. They proceed upon the theory that the danger is one the people cannot see; that the emergency is a military one which the people cannot be permitted to know about; that the Congress must simply take the word of the witnesses sent up to the committees to testify in favor of the proposal.

Who, what sane person, believes for a moment that the officers who come before the committees of the Congress to testify for this measure, would dare do otherwise than reflect the views of higher authority, if those officers value their rank and their hopes for promotion? This does not mean that these military and naval officers are dishonest. It does mean that strict military discipline in time of war works that way—and has to work that way. So we cannot and we must not take too seriously the testimony of these officers. We must consider their position, the discipline they are under, the compulsions which beat upon them, and remember always that all the wisdom is not bound up in either the administration or the officers under the administration's control.

Punishment, promises, and persuasion have worked with the Congress in days gone by, and the military and naval officers certainly are not to be blamed if they—under very much more acute compulsion—have to come to the Congress and testify for measures which in their hearts they may believe are not strictly necessary to the war effort. They must reflect the views of higher authority or else.

If this administration—if the Chief Executive had always been frank with the people and their Congress, the case would be different. If the New Deal administration had always been willing to acknowledge its mistakes when it made them and saw them, the case would be different. If the New Deal administration had not sought, under the guise of false emergencies and phony crises, to grab and to retain every vestige of power it could get, the case would be different. If the administration were not now talking loudly about how the war controls must be continued long after the war is ended, the case would be different. If the people and the Congress did not know—as they do know—that the administration is filled with men and women whose first aim and main purpose is to overturn our constitutional representative form of government and set up in place thereof a political oligarchy, the case would be different. If the New Deal administration had made a success of solving a single domestic problem, not one of which was solved but all of which simply were obscured temporarily by the greater problem of the war, the case would be different.

This continued and really desperate drive by the administration to put the whole populace into the strait jacket of military control and discipline is part of a plan by the administration to hold its power over Government by any means, fair or otherwise. We must not forget that during the month of February more than 415,000 weeks of unemployment compensation was paid. This number is increasing. We must not forget that today the people in the armed services are muzzled. They dare not tell what they know; they dare not speak what they think; they dare not express their will in anything or on any subject. There are a thousand ways in which men may be punished—from top-ranking generals down to the lowliest private—if they offend their Commander in Chief, or anybody who has the ear of the Commander in Chief.

Once the American people become enmeshed in such military control they, too, will be muzzled. You citizens now listening to my voice would be subject to the disciplines and the pressures and the punishments and restrictions to which other soldiers may be subjected should you express your will or dare to write to your Congressman, or publicly voice your will about your Government.

The New Deal administration faces probable defeat at the polls next November. Naturally it is greatly concerned. It wants to have control of the voters. A New Deal defeat will by no means result in a setback in this war. If the present Chief Executive were to resign and step out of the White House tomorrow, the trained, educated, and highly capable naval and military leaders, planners, and strategists would go right on with this war, and even more efficiently, because they would then be freed of a lot of civilian, political influences which they now have to put up with, together with a lot of interference which at the present time is seriously hampering their war efforts.

Free speech, free press, free radio, and freedom to vote as the citizen desires are the basis and the foundation of a government by consent of the governed. The impressment of the civilian population is exactly in contradiction and utterly dangerous to a government of, by, and for the people. No government by consent of the governed can possibly survive if the public servants become the public masters through the impressment of all the adult people into military service and military discipline. Our government by consent of the governed—your freedom under the Bill of Rights—cannot possibly stand up and remain unimpaired if you are impressed into military service and placed under a military dictatorship.

The Members of your Congress must be on guard for your welfare, because it has been demonstrated over and over and over again in the last dozen years that the New Deal administration is insatiable in its lust for power; that the gigantic bureaucracy which has taken root and flourished under this New Deal administration will hold to its powers, will further entrench itself, will never yield up its fat jobs and its control of the people's money, government, and liberties until it is wrenched loose by the people themselves.

I say to you here and now, my fellow citizens, that this proposal to mobilize the man and woman power of this Nation under military control is not necessary, that it is a most dangerous threat to your liberties, that it is the longest step toward the destruction of free government and the establishment of dictatorship in this Nation that has been contemplated since the Declaration of Independence was penned. In that step, if we take it, we will cast away all the heritage of freedom and self-government our forefathers fought and bled and sacrificed and toiled to give us. We will betray them; we will betray our posterity. If we take this step of impressing the civilian population of this Nation into military control, we will betray the men and women now fighting on the battlefronts of the world to turn back dictatorship and oppression and tyranny from abroad.

Our civil population has not lost its intelligence. The people of this country still in civilian status have not lost their power to cooperate. We have not lost our patriotism, nor our will to win this war. We need to be told what to do—and the administration has not told us. We should be told why things need to be done and the administration has not told us. Whenever we ask the reasons for this establishment of a military dictatorship in this Nation, we are met by the old, threadbare, over-worked excuse that the reasons are military secrets which cannot be told the people.

This concealment of all essential facts from the people is not an accident; it is a part of a design, a plan. The American people do not need to know military secrets which would be of value to the enemy. They do need to know the aims, the designs, the ends sought, and the things to which they will find themselves obligated by those in the administration who can, but will not enlighten them.

The last desperate hope of the New Deal administration to hold its power and its control over the people lies in this proposal to force the civilian population into military service. So keep awake, my friends.

All this hullabaloo and uproar by the administration about the so-called necessity for mobilization of civilian manpower by no means indicates we are losing the war. It just means the New Dealers see that they are losing the next election. They are terrified by the fact that they may be thrown out of office and that the real picture of their machinations, their maladministration, and their manipulations of Government and of the war effort for selfish purposes will be exposed. When that time comes a lot of people now riding high in power will be skulking in the dark corners, trying to escape the public eye and the public anger for their mishandling of the grandest Government, the finest people, and the most wonderful country Divine Providence ever provided a great segment of the human race.

We should all remember the warning words of that great American and statesman, Edward Livingston, who said:

> The gloss of zeal for the public service is always spread over acts of oppression, and the people are sometimes made to consider that zeal as a brilliant exertion of energy in their favor which, when viewed in its true light, would be found a fatal blow to their rights. In no government is this effect so easily produced as in a free republic; party spirit, inseparable from its existence, aids the illusion, and a popular leader is allowed in many instances impunity—and sometimes is rewarded with applause—for acts which would make a tyrant tremble on his throne.

Congressman Gavin, of Pennsylvania, Answered On Criticism of O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable LEON H. GAVIN, of Pennsylvania, yesterday cited the number of lawyers employed by O. P. A.—298 in Washington, and 1,443 in the field—at a total cost of $5,873,000, and stated that if Administrator Chester Bowles wants to save the American taxpayers money he will reduce the personnel of his legal staff several hundred and not alone save the American taxpayer considerable money, but a considerable number of headaches.

Does Mr. GAVIN realize that O. P. A. is controlling 8,000,000 prices in 3,000,000 business establishments, and is controlling rents in 14,000,000 rented quarters? Does he realize that setting up controls and not enforcing them penalizes the loyal 95 percent of our business concerns but rewards the black-market operators?

Black-market operators in gasoline are robbing loyal car owners of a gallon of gasoline every 10 days. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want to encourage that by reducing the already inadequate staff fighting to thwart these black-market operators?

Does he know that almost 3 percent of the present cost of living is made up of charges over ceiling prices roughly for every 1 percent reduction in prices saves a billion dollars to the people of the Nation as consumers and as taxpayers?

What O. P. A. needs is not fewer enforcement people but a redoubled enforcement effort. Any move to cut O. P. A.'s enforcement staff as an economy move would be penny-wise and hundred-dollar-foolish. The American people as consumers and taxpayers not only want price control to protect their pocketbooks and rationing regulations to give everyone a fair share of scarce commodities. They want those regulations enforced. They want no cut in O. P. A. attorneys which will prevent a vigorous hunting down of black-market operators from one end of the Nation to the other.

I really do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania could have understood the meaning of his proposal or I do not believe he would have made it.

TACTICS OF THOSE WHO OPPOSE PRICE CONTROL

I do not claim that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN] is opposed to price control, but the tactics he is using are identical with the tactics of those who are opposed to price control and stabilization. Those who have always opposed price control are very much like the isolationists; they have not changed their views; they have only changed their tactics.

Many who are opposed to this act, which has saved us from ruinous or runaway inflation, are doing everything they can to make the enforcement of the law impossible, impracticable, or just as weak as they can make it. The House of Representatives passed a law directing the President to stabilize the cost of living, keep down the cost of the war, and prevent inflation. Then the House of Representatives, by a majority vote—the Republicans voted solidly and a few Democrats joined them—reduced the appropriation of O. P. A. to such an extent that effective enforcement of the law was practically impossible. By this amendment the enforcement of the act was at least considerably crippled. The House of Representatives also voted to eliminate entirely the $6,000,000 appropriation for O. W. I., known as the Domestic Branch of O. W. I., which, in effect, greatly crippled the only organization in our Government charged with the duty of warning the people against run-away inflation.

Now different Members are coming forward with amendments, no one of which would probably destroy the act; but if all of them, or a substantial number of them were adopted, we would have no price control or stabilization in this country.

Why should the gentleman from Pennsylvania say that the number of attorneys in O. P. A. should be reduced 30 percent? Why should he not say 50 or 90 percent? What does he base his information on? Could he not also just as intelligently say that all departments in our Government should be reduced 30 or 90 percent, or that all Members of Congress should have their appropriations for office assistance reduced by the same amount? Such statements not based upon a knowledge and appraisal of the actual facts are calculated to do much harm. The Price Control Act should be considered from a nonpolitical standpoint. It involves too much for any one party to try to gain a political advantage by opposing it, or attempting to emasculate it in any way.

It Needs Looking Into

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 17, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I have in hand an editorial which appeared in the Washington Star of April 14, 1944, entitled "It Needs Looking Into," and I ask that this editorial be reproduced in full at this point:

IT NEEDS LOOKING INTO

Backed by the high prestige of General Arnold and the Army Air Forces, the Costello bill to commission as Army pilots the women members of the WASPS (Women's Airforce Service Pilots) was favorably reported by the House Military Affairs Committee and is now awaiting a hearing before the Rules Committee. The Rules Committee very wisely is delaying its approval. There are a number of things about this WASP program that would stand more examination. The House Civil Service Investigating Committee, for one thing, has not completed its own inquiry, begun some time ago, as to the need and the heavy expense involved in the present organization.

The main question is why the Army Air Forces are doing away with the services of literally thousands of experienced civilian male pilots, which it used in its own pilot training program, and is taking on the WASPS—with the thought of increasing their number—for duties that these men, in the opinion of competent authorities, are well able to perform. Why should a young woman, after a hundred hours or so of training, be a better or more useful pilot for ferrying, target towing, etc., than men with thousands of hours of flying time, who have instructors' rating? Except for those needed for combat service in the ground forces, they are already available for the same type of auxiliary service that the WASPS are furnishing.

There is general praise for the spirit and the competence of the women flyers in the WASPS. But the manifest waste of trained pilots, the rather arbitrary treatment these men have suffered already at the hands of the Army Air Forces, the relatively high expense of training women pilots together with this gesture of setting up a separate female air force (instead of giving pilot training to WACS) suggests the need for a far more careful inquiry into the whole background of this plan than has been furnished up to this time. Certainly, the Rules Committee is well advised to take its time.

Mr. Speaker, the Air Service of the United States Army is headed by a brilliant and devoted disciple of aerial warfare, Assistant Secretary of War for Air Robert A. Lovett. Working alongside of the Assistant Secretary of War for Air is Lt. Gen. Henry H. Arnold who has literally given his life to development of the Air Force of the Army. It has been during the time of General Arnold as commanding general that the Air Force has grown from a few hundred planes to the hundreds of thousands of airplanes of every kind and description which comprises the greatest air armada that any nation has seen. Remarkable work has been done by these two high Army officials and those working with them, and, as a result, the war will be much shorter and many an American soldier will owe his life to the drive and the sustaining power of our Air Force.

In one respect, I feel that the Army Air Force has not measured up to the high standard of its history or its prestige. I refer to the war-training program; and more particularly to the 5,000 men who were taken into the Air Force voluntarily and were given training as pilots in the flying of planes.

Originally, some 14,000 men were recruited by the Civil Aeronautics Authority under a mandate from the War Department and were given civil aeronautics flying throughout the United States. At the outset, these men trained at their own expense, paying for their own food and other expenses. Many of them trained as much as 18 months and have had hundreds of hours flying in various types of planes.

In July of last year, the Civil Aeronautics training program was discontinued, and the Army then culled out thousands of these student flyers, releasing most of them from service. The remaining 4,800 men who were considered qualified were formally inducted into the United States Army and were sent to training camps throughout the country, with the understanding that when they completed pilot training they would be eligible for commissions in the Army. On January 15, 1944, these camps were closed down by the Army within just a few days of the graduation of many of these men. It is now impossible for them to finish the training course, the camps having been closed; and the Army proposes to commission some of these men, place others in the glider program, and the bulk of them it expects to use on work of a mechanical nature, including sheet-metal work.

The men are naturally discouraged. They have trained for many long months. They expected to be pilots and commissioned officers. Many of them are instructors and supervisors. They have hundreds of hours in the air. They are men of ability and standing with an ambition which our institutions encourage and which naturally springs from the heart of every American desiring to make a real record in his work. The action of the Army in closing down these camps when many of these men were within a few days of finishing the course has had the effect of removing the goal toward which they have worked and fought for many months, and it has taken their morale from them. I sincerely hope that the War Department will reconsider its pilot program and will give these men who are already trained and ready for real service to the Nation an opportunity of using the training laboriously given to them by the Government at great expense. They are entitled to this opportunity and to a commission as an officer in the Army when they have successfully completed their training.

Anti-Poll-Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Westmoreland Observer, of Greensburg, Pa.:

ANTI-POLL-TAX BILL—NORTHERN REPUBLICANS PLAYING WITH FIRE IN SUPPORTING THIS UNCONSTITUTIONAL BILL

When the Congress reconvenes one of the first bills that will be dumped onto the floor is the anti-poll-tax bill, aimed solely at the Southern States. The bill is obviously unconstitutional, it is arousing wide resentment among our fellow citizens in the Southern States, and disunity throughout the country. And in the past when this bill was before another Congress its only result was the wasting of the valuable time of national legislature.

The bill is demagogic and naturally would have the backing of the New Deal administration, it is unquestionably Communist sponsored. So far, so what? In other words, what do we expect from the New Deal-Communist cabal?

Well there is a peculiarity and that is the Republican support it is receiving from a number of northern Republican Members, both Senators and Representatives.

Why do these Republicans, who expect to have as one of the principal planks in their 1944 platform the reaffirmation of the principles contained in, and absolute support of the Constitution permit themselves to become cosponsors with the New Deal-Communist clique in pushing anti-poll-tax legislation at this time?

Do these Republicans think that they can get some of the Communist-labor element support away from their New Deal opponents this fall? A fat chance they will have of doing that. But they can rest assured that they will disgust and discourage a lot of thoughtful citizens, both in and out of labor, who may not consider it worth while to vote at all.

It seems to us sheer stupidity for Republican Members of Congress to permit themselves to become involved in this acrimonious, and highly explosive interparty Democrat brawl. Why don't the Republicans remain aloof from this matter and cling to the literal precept of the Constitution? Thus they have much to gain and absolutely nothing to lose, either individually or collectively.

It is a trite phrase that southerners would as soon vote for the devil as a Republican. This is not true, and the fact is borne out by not too distant history. The South bolted Al Smith in 1928 when the grievances were as nothing when compared to the studied insults which have been heaped upon the politicos of that section particularly during the fourth term. Are the Republicans so politically dumb as not to see the possibilities of such a policy?

Then there is another phase of this anti-poll-tax issue, and this, as likely as not, may be the real motive behind the New Deal-Communist move in precipitating this fight in Congress at this time, and that is to encourage the Congress to discredit itself in the eyes of the people by a prolonged and bitter debate over what is after all a rather minor matter, thus wasting precious time that ought to be applied to the vital affairs of the war and the coming peace, and the immediate problems which press upon Congress for relief of bureaucratic oppression of our citizenry.

The Republican Party licked itself in 1940; it can do it again in 1944.

Lease-Lend Rumors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. FOLGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Star of April 18, 1944:

LEASE-LEND RUMORS

It is always difficult to undo completely the mischief done by vicious gossip, mean and irresponsible rumors, and brazen insinuations and innuendoes carefully calculated to injure a man's reputation or besmirch an honest cause. Unfortunately, to some minds, the truth too often seems less appealing and exciting than its meretricious opposite, so that to nail down the latter and get rid of it permanently is by no means an easy task. The thing dies hard; it has more lives than a cat; it needs to be struck down not once but many times before it is finally buried and forgotten.

A notable case in point is the recurring spate of rumors about the operations of lease-lend. From time to time we have been told all sorts of nonsense in connection with this vital wartime pooling and reciprocal interchange of Allied resources, and from time to time the nonsense has been hit resoundingly on the head. But still, resuscitated and nourished in no small measure by Axis propagandists, it gets back in currency every now and then—so much so, in fact, that Leo T. Crowley, director of our Foreign Economics Administration, has just seen fit to make another frontal attack upon it in a special statement to the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

There is, for instance, the old chestnut about how lease-lend money has been used to finance gay dinner parties thrown by Allied purchasing commissions. Nothing of the sort has ever happened. Indeed, according to Mr. Crowley, it could not possibly happen. Then there is the story about sending 50,000 refrigerators to England, presumably to let English housewives have them while American housewives went without. Actually, says Mr. Crowley, only 940 were sent and they were for distribution throughout the entire British Empire, to be used for storing perishable chemicals and foodstuffs in such establishments as hospitals.

Other lease-lend rumors of a potentially more dangerous and derisive kind include one to the effect that the Russians have transferred some American-made planes to the Japanese. This story—one of several of the same type circulated by Tokyo broadcasts—is completely false, as is also the story that Red Army men use our butter to grease their boots. Similiarly vicious are the reports that the British remove our labels from the goods we send them, substitute their own, and then transship the material to other countries, taking the credit that rightfully belongs to us. The British have heard that we do the same thing with what they deliver to us, the guileful Axis radio simultaneously beaming the anti-American version to Britain and the anti-English version to the United States. Nothing is too self-contradictory for the versatile Dr. Goebbels.

Mr. Crowley renders a genuine service to truth and to Allied unity in wielding the ax against these and other trouble-making falsehoods, and his action is especially timely because Congress must soon vote to continue the lease-lend authority for another year.

Simplification of Tax Reports

REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reports have appeared in the press recently stating that the Ways and Means Committee has for several weeks been considering legislation to simplify income-tax reports. Of course, these reports should be simplified. There is no question about it. The people of the country demand it. They should not have been permitted to become so complicated and confusing in the first place. Neither should so many reports be required.

I am asking the Ways and Means Committee of the House to hold open hearings on this legislation so Members of Congress and others interested may have a chance to express their views and offer suggestions.

I have confidence in the membership of this great committee, but it must be observed that when the Ways and Means Committee brings legislation to the House it comes under a closed rule. Members are not permitted under such rule to offer amendments. Members of the committee insist it is the only way to handle the situation. As I have said, we are all in favor of simplifying tax returns. I see no reason either why some 40,000,000 people who receive salary and wage incomes should be required to file reports or why those who do file them should furnish 3 or 4 additional reports during the year. Furthermore, if we are going to enact such legislation—and we certainly ought to do it—then it should be made effective right away and not wait until the end of the year.

The committee is to be commended for its industry and perseverance. It must be remembered, too, that we followed this great committee in supporting legislation that resulted in a lot of complications and confusion. Much of the complication, of course, came about because the committee and Members of Congress were anxious to collect taxes from every source available and try, at the same time, to be equitable.

Mr. Speaker, I understand the Ways and Means Committee has had this matter under consideration for 2 or 3 months. It seems to me that during that time, or even now, it would be good policy to hold hearings on this question. It is an important matter and one in which the entire public is deeply interested and concerned.

Soldiers Fed Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald, Wednesday, April 19. It is an interview with the gentleman from Michigan, PAUL SHAFER, an able and highly regarded member of the House Committee on Military Affairs:

SOLDIERS FED PROPAGANDA, SAYS REPRESENTATIVE SHAFER

(By Walter Trohan)

Representative SHAFER, Republican, of Michigan, ranking member of the House Military Affairs Committee, yesterday announced he will call on the committee to investigate New Deal political propagandizing in the Army.

The Michigan Congressman said he had received a number of letters from members of the armed services protesting slurs against Americanism and the Republican Party and promotion of foreigners and the fourth term.

SOLDIERS FED NEW DEALISM

"The pattern of propaganda for the New Deal and the fourth terms is at last becoming clearly defined," SHAFER said. "It has, in fact, become a major military activity.

"Soldiers have even been sent off to battle improperly trained and inefficiently commanded, but the Army has found time to cram enlisted men and officers alike with internationalism. The men may not know how to shoot properly, but they should be able to spout at length about the New Deal new world order.

"From the day of induction the recruit is fed New Dealism and foreignism at orientation talks and through various courses at Army schools. And the propaganda mills grind out bales of material for his leisure hours."

PROPAGANDA MOVIES TOO

"Soldier reading is heavily larded with administration propaganda in official, semiofficial and private publications. Movies of the documentary type are loaded to the sound track with propaganda.

"Worse than all of this is political persecution, sly and open, of those who oppose the New Deal and its rush toward dictatorship not less vicious than what the soldier is being trained to fight abroad."

SHAFER said he had letters to support his charges. He said he will take precautions to protect the identity of the writers in any investigation by the House committee so that they will not suffer New Deal reprisals.

QUESTIONED ABOUT HIS VOTE

One of the letters from an Iowa soldier told of being questioned about his voting by Army Intelligence.

"I was one of the few soldiers who voted in the elections in Iowa by means of the absentee ballot," he wrote. "Prior to the date of voting I was called to the intelligence officer and the first question he asked me was:

"'Did you make a remark in the barracks that you were going to vote only for those candidates who were isolationists in Iowa?' (I cannot quote his exact words, however.)"

Several soldiers have written to tell how they were hauled up before their commanding officers and asked if they were ever members of America First, pre-Pearl Harbor organization opposed to intervention. Many who answered in the affirmative feel that they were marked for heavy work details.

POKES FUN AT ISOLATIONISTS

All soldiers, said SHAFER, are forced to see an alleged orientation film, "Prelude to War," which makes fun of isolationists. Soldiers write, he said, that they wish that they could spend as much time on the rifle range as they have been forced to spend in seeing this film so that they could be more fit for battle.

Many soldiers complain against ridiculing of Republicans in so-called orientation lectures. They add that they have found that it does not pay to fight back.

SHAFER recalled that in a recent orientation talk to draftees, a naval petty officer smeared Representative HOFFMAN (Republican), of Michigan, after he learned that most of the 600 draftees before him came from the Congressman's district.

CALLS IT TERRIFYING

"This is but a small part of the picture," SHAFER said. "The extent of this calculated war against the mind of the American soldier is terrifying. One gets the impression that it is far more important to the New Dealers than the war against Hitler or Hirohito.

"I believe the committee should seek to find out how much of this is dictated from Washington and how much is due to New Deal officers. I am certain that New Deal officers could not plug for the cause if they were not encouraged by the New Dealers in Washington.

"The committee should also propose effective measures to halt this un-American procedure."

James Buchanan, Fifteenth President of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article written by Arthur Cornwall, yeoman, second class, United States Naval Reserve:

James Buchanan, the only President of the United States who died a bachelor, was born 153 years ago at a place called Stony Batter in Franklin County, Pa., at the foot of the eastern ridge of the Alleghenies.

President Buchanan's father, James, was a native of the county of Donegal, in the north of Ireland, who emigrated to the United States in 1783. He was a poor man when he came to America, but through industry and perseverance he acquired considerable property. Five years after his arrival he married Elizabeth Speer, of Adams County, Pa. He and his young wife became pioneers in American civilization, and they built a rude log cabin where James Buchanan, Pennsylvania's only United States President, was born on April 23, 1791.

The pioneer Buchanan was a prominent man in his county and exercised a large share of influence. He had an excellent English education, and so fully understood the advantages to be derived from one of a more liberal character, that he early resolved that his son should receive it. The mother of President Buchanan was a woman of strong mental ability, and although she had not enjoyed the advantages of a superior education, she was distinguished for her intelligence and remarkable literary taste. To his mother's influence, the President was greatly indebted.

In 1798, the Buchanans moved to the village of Mercersburg, where young James received his early education in English, Latin, and Greek. His progress in his studies was exceedingly rapid, and he entered Dickinson College at Carlisle, when he was 14. He immediately took rank among the most outstanding students. He, therefore, rose rapidly in the estimation of his teachers and his fellow pupils. He graduated in 1809, at the age of 18.

At this period of his life, President Buchanan was tall, slender, and graceful. So dextrous was he with his rifle that, like a true backwoodsman, he considered it a disgrace to go home with squirrels or similar game, unless the ball had been sent with unerring precision directly through the head.

There can be no doubt that his vigorous, early training had been the means of giving him that wonderful endurance, which so remarkably distinguished him in after life as a public man.

In December 1809 James Buchanan commenced the study of law in the office of James Hopkins, Esq., of Lancaster, and was admitted to the bar November 17, 1812, when he was a little over 21 years old. He immediately rose rapidly in his profession. From the day he was admitted to the bar until he finally retired from the legal profession, his was a series of successive triumphs. He was poor, and necessity demanded that exertion which soon made him the rival and equal of the best lawyers in Pennsylvania.

He retired in 1831, having accumulated a competence by his steady devotion to business and the superiority in his profession, which his commanding talents had given him. Thus the log-cabin boy, born in a wild rocky gorge of the Allegheny Mountains, at the early age of 40 years, was the architect of his own fortune, and he became the admiration and pride of his native State.

Only once after he left his profession could he be prevailed upon to again appear at the bar. This was in the cause of an aged widow. It was an action of ejectment which involved all her little property. The case was a difficult one and, technically, decidedly against the unfortunate woman. To the surprise and astonishment of everyone, he succeeded in establishing her title to the property in question. The poor woman was overjoyed and overwhelmed her benefactor with expressions of gratefulness, and offers of remuneration. He, however, would accept nothing for his services.

In the War of 1812 he enrolled as a private soldier, and his company was commanded by Judge Henry Shippen. They marched to Baltimore and served under the command of Maj. Charles S. Ridgeley until they were honorably discharged.

He was elected to the Seventeenth Congress in the fall of 1820, and took his seat in 1821. This was immediately succeeding the stormy session of 1820, when the difficulties in regard to the admission of Missouri had been adjusted by the adoption of the first concession ever made to the anti-slavery or abolition sentiment of the country.

Congressman Buchanan quickly took rank among the most industrious and capable Members of the House, which was composed of the ever memorable names of McDuffie, Joel R. Poinsett, John Randolph, Philip P. Barbour, Andrew Stevenson, Louis McLane, and others equally distinguished.

The first set speech which Mr. Buchanan delivered in Congress was upon a bill making appropriations to the military for some deficiencies that had occurred in the Indian Department.

In the Eighteenth Congress, which convened on December 1, 1823, Congressman Buchanan had as colleagues Daniel Webster of Massachusetts and Henry Clay of Kentucky.

He was a close friend, admirer, and ardent supporter of Gen. Andrew Jackson, who was elected President in 1808. Through all the storms of detraction and abuse which were poured upon President Jackson, as no man had ever before been assailed in this country, Mr. Buchanan stood his firm, unwavering friend. However, Jackson and his loyal friends triumphed over every obstacle and inaugurated the most glorious democratic administration since the days of Thomas Jefferson.

At the close of this session, March 3, 1831, James Buchanan voluntarily retired from Congress. He had been a constant Member since 1821.

Ten successive years of active service in the popular branch of the National Legislature necessarily gives a man a thorough acquaintance with the details of legislation, and if he be an individual of even ordinary sagacity he must be qualified for more responsible positions

It is not too much to say that President Buchanan won his position in the affection of the people by the laborious industry of a long life devoted to their interests, and by the possession of those qualities both of head and heart, which qualified him for retaining, in so remarkable a degree, their confidence.

Shortly after Mr. Buchanan retired from Congress he was honored by President Andrew Jackson with the appointment as Minister to Russia. For 3 years he filled this important position with distinction.

After his return from Russia in 1833 he was elected to fill the vacancy in the United States Senate caused by the resignation of Judge Wilkins. He took his seat on December 15, 1834.

He had left Congress just as the storm, which the rigid principles of General Jackson inaugurated, had been raised. He was destined to return to the theater of his duties in time to come to the rescue of his early friend, and bear a part in the memorable struggles that the democracy encountered during his administration.

Senator Buchanan entered the Senate when Clay, Webster, and John C. Calhoun were the mighty intellects which swayed that body, and he immediately took rank among them as a debater, whose blows, if not so brilliant in style, were even more effectual in execution. There is one feature of Mr. Buchanan's speeches which is very remarkable. It is the absence of all display, of all attempts to benefit his cause by any of those adventitious aids which oratory furnishes. He appealed to common sense rather than to fancy or imagination and adhered strictly to plain, yet graceful and elegant language.

He was our ambassador to the Court of St. James for 3 years, and was appointed Secretary of State in 1844 by President James K. Polk, serving for 4 years.

Upon all public questions Mr. Buchanan was awarded a leading part. We find him the Senator chosen to present the resolution for the admission of Arkansas, the champion of democracy in the debate with Henry Clay upon the bank question, and for several years the head of the most important committee of the Senate, that on foreign relations. Upon our relations with Mexico he early took a stand which was at last found necessary to be adopted in order to vindicate our rights. As Secretary of State he was a leader in the acquisition of California, the annexation of Texas, and other valuable and important matters.

March 4, 1857, James Buchanan was inaugurated President of the United States. He was 65 years old and had had 40 years in the legislative, executive, and diplomatic service. When he took office it was perhaps the most perplexing period of our history. Only a great leader might have succeeded in those most difficult times.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt described Mr. Buchanan as "a man who bore with high sense of conscience the trying responsibilities resting upon him in perhaps the most perplexing period of our history."

The Dred Scott decision came 2 days after his inauguration, when the Supreme Court held that all compromises were unlawful, that all political agitation for the restriction of slavery was in vain and that an owner had the same rights to take a drove of slaves, as a drove of horses, into any State of the Union.

The fire of the Civil War had already been kindled in Kansas and it continued to sputter throughout his term as President. At last, it exploded a blast close to Washington, D. C., when John Brown carried the Kansan war to Harpers Ferry, in the wild dream of inciting the slaves themselves, to rise in revolt against their masters.

During this administration the first ocean submarine telegraphic cable was used, when from England Queen Victoria greeted President Buchanan. He assembled the members of his Cabinet for this occasion. However, later the cable broke and no messages were sent under the sea for 8 years.

Secession was the talk in 1860, and President Buchanan expressed himself as bitterly opposed to such action. Although he held that the Government had no authority to keep a State in the Union by coercion, he denied that the States had any right or just cause to secede, and he ordered the commanders of southern forts to defend them. President Lincoln continued that policy, absolutely, without change, when he became President.

Slavery was entrenched behind a wire entanglement of constitutional dogmas, court decisions, and legalistic technicalities.

When the first State seceded from the Union President Buchanan was only within 2½ months of the end of his term. Congress was hostile and the country irresolute. As he saw the Union falling to pieces he hoped that it could be patched up again by another old-fashioned compromise.

Ex-President Hoover said of President Buchanan: "He was the last outstanding figure surviving one of the most remarkable groups of men in our history. He played his part with dignity and courage that only now are assuming the recognition they deserve."

One of the strongest traits in Mr. Buchanan's personal life was the hold he had upon the affections of the people among whom he lived. He was a gentleman of unblemished personal integrity and unusually agreeable manners in his social intercourse with all classes.

He lived at Wheatland, once a large farm noted for its yield of the cereal which conferred its name, now reduced to a few acres in the suburbs of Lancaster. It is a beautifully and carefully preserved estate. The red brick, three-storied house stands about halfway up a gently rising ground, and has a wide lawn stretching down to the street, shaded by oaks, elms, and larches, interspersed with evergreens.

The style of the furnishings and furniture is solid, comfortable, and dignified, without show.

Wheatland was originally built in 1828 by William Jenkins, who sold it to William Morris Meredith in 1845. Buchanan purchased it 3 years later from Mr. Meredith for $6,750.

After the nomination of Mr. Buchanan to the Presidency on June 9, 1856, Wheatland became a busy place. It was literally the Presidential campaign headquarters and the house was always filled with guests of national prominence. From its veranda Mr. Buchanan conducted the first front-porch campaign in American political history.

President Buchanan, the fifteenth President of the United States, spent his declining years in the peace and coolness of Wheatland with his niece, Harriet Lane, who married Henry E. Johnston, of Baltimore. She was said to have been the loveliest mistress the White House has ever known. She was the daughter of the President's sister, Jane, who married Elliott T. Lane, a native of Virginia. Harriet Johnston was a tall blond with violet eyes. Her mother and father died when she was quite young, and she made her home with her uncle, and was with him in his career here as well as in Russia and England.

President Buchanan died in Lancaster, Pa., June 1, 1868, of rheumatic gout. His remains lie in beautiful Woodward Hill cemetery in the city of Lancaster, beneath a simple monument, which records only the date of his birth and of his death and the fact that he was the fifteenth President of the United States.

It is well that the soil of Pennsylvania holds his ashes, for he is the most eminent statesman yet given by the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to the service of the country since the Constitution of the United States was established.

United Nations Cast Adrift

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, that mystical and vague organization called the United Nations, which has been used as the clothesrack on which to hang the habiliments of high-sounding platitudes and beautiful ideals has now become more vague than ever before. It is little wonder the American people are confused about the issues of the war; about the aims of the different allies; and about the methods by which those aims are to be realized, if they are to be realized at all.

For your information, it is necessary to trace the origin of this entity called the United Nations and the modus operandi by which it is supposed to have been set up and brought into being.

Thirty-five nations became signatories, or later agreed to what has been known as the United Nations Declaration of January 1, 1942. The list is headed by the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union. The essence, the soul, the substance of the United Nations Declaration lay in the Atlantic Charter as agreed to, and promulgated to the world by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain on August 14, 1941. The Atlantic Charter was the preamble of the United Nations agreement. Later the organization known as the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration was set up. That organization hangs upon the United Nations as assembled under the original declaration of January 1, 1942, which I have just mentioned.

The United States Congress has already authorized $1,350,000,000 of the taxpayers' money, which is the major share of all the moneys to be put into the original fund of this U. N. R. R. A. You should be aware of the fact that this first authorization actually is only the beginning of what will be a succession of authorizations and appropriations, if the American people do not call a halt on the efforts of U. N. R. R. A. to make them pay for the rehabilitation of all the rest of the war-devastated world, friend and enemy alike.

At this point, it ought to be said that the American people are the most generous-hearted people in the world. Throughout our history, we always have been ready and eager to aid other peoples when disaster has overtaken them. We have done this on occasions of earthquakes, floods, hurricanes, epidemics, and wars. We did it following the First World War. We carried the major part of the load of feeding the starving, friend and foe, in and following the last war under the direction of Herbert Hoover. These activities were paid for by the American people. We are ready to do the same following this war. That is why it is all the more reprehensible that the people should be fooled and defrauded as seems to be the situation at this time.

Now keeping in mind that the Atlantic Charter, which was foisted upon the world and propagandized as the great aim of all the allies, as the banner under which the civilized nations of the world were assembled to beat down barbarism, bestiality, and aggression, was the essence of the agreement between the nations which caused them to become an aggregation known as the United Nations, ask yourselves what must now be the situation since the Atlantic Charter has been repudiated by one, ignored by another, and neglected by a third of the three leading signatories to the compact.

Time was, not so long ago, when Mr. Roosevelt could scarcely have a press conference, a fireside chat, or a message of any character that did not include some reference to the Atlantic Charter and its noble sentiments. For the last several weeks, Mr. Roosevelt has been strangely silent about the Atlantic Charter. Apparently, like the slogan of the "New Deal," he wants it ignored and buried in forgetfulness.

Prime Minister Winston Churchill, of the British Government, recently told the Parliament bluntly that the Atlantic Charter does not mean what we were led by Mr. Roosevelt to believe it meant. On March 22 he said to the British Parliament:

> It is evident that, as the changing phases of the war succeed one another, some further clarification will be required of the position under the document which has become honorably known as the Atlantic Charter, and that this must be the subject for renewed consultation between te principal allies.

Joseph Stalin, the master of Russia, has never had anything to say about the Atlantic Charter. He has maintained a grim-lipped silence.

The London Times, which is the unofficial organ of the British Foreign Office, on March 20 carried an amazing editorial in which the following statement was unequivocally made:

> Whatever may have been true in past centuries, the division of Europe today in 20 to 30 sovereign independent units, owing no allegiance to any higher authority, is incompatible with the military security and economic well-being of the European peoples. This is a hard, irrefutable fact. To attempt to override it on the grounds of any general theory of self-determination would be an act not of high political principle but of political madness.

Again we are compelled to ask ourselves what, in the face of these facts, has become of the Atlantic Charter? It is obvious that it has been repudiated. It is obvious that it was never accepted by our allies as a definite, genuine, honest statement of their war aims.

Now, when a contract is entered into either by individuals or nations, and that contract is based upon a stated preamble, and it is agreed upon in order to carry out the objectives of the preamble, what happens to the organization when the preamble to its agreement is ruthlessly and callously tossed out the window by one or more of the chief signatories? It is obvious, of course, that the agreement has gone by the board, and that the organization, the United Nations, has been disrupted, blown up, repudiated, and no longer actually exists as an organization bound together by a solemn agreement.

What, then, under this condition of affairs, happens to the other organizations of which all but a few of the signatories were partners in the United Nations agreement under the Atlantic Charter? As a matter of fact, its objectives are gone. The money authorized—the American people's money authorized and the assistance being given without their knowledge under lend-lease are now being given to nations who are in no sense bound by the war aims set forth in the Atlantic Charter. I think you will agree with me that this is a shocking condition of affairs.

There can be no question but that the ideals of the Atlantic Charter are still enshrined in the hearts of the American people. We are going ahead, of course, to fight this war to a finish because of our high ideals; because of our generous impulses; because the civilization itself, which the American people cherish in their hearts, is in peril.

These developments, however, have made it crystal clear that the American people and their Congress must demand more honesty and frankness on the part of the administration. In the face of this shocking and unprecedented abuse of the people's confidence, this monstrous pretense shrouded in the habiliments of noble sentiments and high ideals, and used to befool the right-thinking people of the world, it becomes imperative that the American people demand of their Congress and of their administration, facts and not fairy tales; information and not excuses; truth and not evasions; honesty instead of dissemblance concerning this war, and what the other nations have as their aims in fighting this war.

The aims of the other nations are vital to this Nation, just as our war aims are vital to them. It must be perfectly clear to any thinking person that we cannot possibly plan a sound and successful post-war policy without and until we know the actual war aims of all the other nations. We cannot intelligently participate in any peace settlement without and until we know the war aims of our allies.

It can make no difference now in our attitude toward the war if we find that these war aims of our allies are not at all what we were led to believe they were. But it can make all the difference in the world—the difference between success and failure—in our own difficult readjustment to peace, and in our own readjustment in the post-war world, for us to know actually what the war aims of our allies really are.

It has become perfectly clear that the New Deal administration does not intend to tell the American people the facts about this war, or the facts about the war aims of our allies. It has become equally clear that the New Deal administration still insists on regarding this as its own private war; that it regards our foreign policy as its own private foreign policy; that it has a contempt for the rights of the American people to know about these matters, and that it means to increase its controls over the people, their lives and activities; that it means to continue those controls in its own clutches as long as possible after this war is ended; that it is playing a desperate game of world power politics in which our public officials are novices compared to the British and the Russians, and that it intends to try to purchase power at the expense of the American people.

The people will not stand for this. They ought not to stand for it. I say to you, frankly, that only a change of administration will save our constitutional Government and our Bill of Rights from disaster later on.

We must be vigilant; we must be earnest; we must be courageous, and we must not be fooled.

Post-War Highway Construction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEAN P. TAYLOR

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Albany, April 12, 1944.

Hon. DEAN P. TAYLOR, M. C.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TAYLOR: I address you concerning the above-entitled bill, now in the House Committee on Roads, and want you to know what its effect will be on the State of New York.

The bill seeks to provide $1,000,000,000 a year for 3 years for the several States for the ostensible purpose of improving highways and assisting in the relief of post-war unemployment. Unlike highway bills generally, it covers a 3-year period and is not part of the continuing Federal-aid program.

It is my measured judgment that this bill, if reported out in its present form and passed, will not be beneficial to the State of New York or its people. The reasons for my position are four:

1. The formula for distribution does not reflect either the highway improvement needs nor the requirements for unemployment relief.

2. The method of matching places an inadequate share on the States and is conducive to insufficient evaluation of the merits.

3. The formula for distribution within the States does not coordinate the urban and rural needs in New York.

4. The size of the appropriation exaggerates all defects.

On March 24, 1944, I appeared before the Committee on Roads in opposition to this bill. I then made a brief statement which

I believe clearly describes the defects of this bill. I enclose a copy of my statement for your consideration.

I believe that when you have examined my statement in connection with the bill you will conclude that the bill is not to the advantage of the State of New York nor any section or subdivision of it, and its passage will not benefit but will harm our State.

I will be very happy to discuss with you, or a representative of your office, the views of this department upon this bill at your convenience. I also want to assure you that I will be glad to analyze and advise with you about any proposed amendments.

I also want to tell you of the care and courtesy with which the Committee on Roads has dealt with both the proponents and opponents of this legislation.

I take this opportunity of bespeaking your cooperation and support.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

CHAS. H. SELLS,
Superintendent of Public Works.

Rumania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Pioneer:

Americans of Rumanian descent are primarily concerned with the fate and fortune of the United States of America. Most of those who were born abroad have long ago made it their choice to become American citizens.

Their American-born children are valiantly serving in the United States armed forces. Those who are home are working hard and uncomplainingly in the various war factories. They are among the first to invest in War bonds, to donate to the Red Cross, U. S. O., and other patriotic agencies.

The young men and women of Rumanian descent who are serving in the various branches of the armed forces are the best reminders to everyone that the only country that really matters in the heart and mind of Americans of Rumanian descent is the United States of America.

This, however, does not prevent a feeling of sympathy toward the people whom we left in the old country. This feeling comes to the surface especially in times of suffering and misfortune.

To say that the people of Rumania today are suffering and that they are unfortunate is to put it quite mildly. The ill-fated and unpopular decision of the Rumanian Government to place the Rumanian people on the side of the Axis could bring nothing but more misery and unhappiness to the Rumanian people in Rumania.

We hope and pray that Rumania will be soon out of the war and that post-war Rumania will bring freedom and justice to the Rumanian peasant.

We know the intrinsic goodness of the Rumanian peasant's mind and heart, we know how hard he must work to live, for most of us in America come from the peasantry. We have seen what the corruption of the unscrupulous politicians has brought upon the entire Rumanian Nation.

We who are fortunate enough to live in the United States have experienced, more than we ever had hoped for, the blessings of freedom and justice and the fruits of opportunity for all, regardless of nationality, background, and religion. It is natural that we wish that the people of post-war Rumania in arranging their future take their cue from the United States of America.

We know that any discrimination and intolerance toward the Jews or any other racial or religious group is not only wrong and unjust but also unworthy of a people with so many good qualities as the Rumanians have.

Because we know what they mean to us and to our children, because without them we never could have participated in American life, because we feel that without them life would have little meaning, we sincerely hope that whatever form their future government may take, the people of Rumania, as well as of the other countries of Europe, should have complete freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, freedom from fear, freedom from intolerance, and freedom from want.

Emergency Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I should like to call to the attention of the House the following editorial in the April 14 issue of the Journal of Commerce and Commercial, published in New York City:

"GENERALLY" FAIR PRICES

Price Administrator Chester Bowles has advanced a strong case against the proposed amendment to the Emergency Price Control Act to eliminate the word "generally" from the provision which requires the Price Administrator to establish "fair and equitable" maximum prices under the law.

In every industry and trade costs of production and distribution vary greatly among competitors. It is not always feasible to set price ceilings so high as to assure every seller a profit. If every ceiling price must yield a profit to the marginal producer or distributor in each case, sellers who operate more efficiently or more economically than the marginal concern might make larger profits than they require or want.

Normally, the low-cost seller will be content with a fair profit, reducing his price and underselling marginal competitors in order to expand his sales volume. Under the abnormal conditions prevailing in wartime, this competitive pressure for lower prices may not operate. Hence, if ceilings should be generally lifted to take care of marginal sellers, the way could be opened for a number of price increases. There can be no certainty, of course, that low-cost producers would raise their prices even if ceilings were lifted to cover the highest cost producer, but the risk that this would be so should not be run in a period of emergency.

During the First World War, the bulk-line level of costs was used. Maximum prices were set so as to yield a profit to the large majority of producers or distributors in an industry. The application of this formula tended to lift many prices from the previously existing level.

The basic principle of the Emergency Price Control Act is to freeze prices generally at a historic level, rather than to revise the price structure to conform to any one cost or profit formula. However, to avoid inequities and to prevent the drying up of production of many commodities because they could be produced or sold at a loss, the Emergency Price Control Act specifies that prices shall be "generally fair and equitable." This language does not make it necessary that each price cover the costs of every single producer or distributor.

An amendment of the law that would place the burden of the proof upon the Price Administrator to show that each price ceiling is profitable for each vendor could jeopardize the future of price control by opening the way to an endless succession of increases in individual ceilings.

Capitol Stuff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extent my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald:

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

With a guilty conscience and occasional nervous glances over the shoulder to make sure that one of J. Edgar Hoover's boys wasn't lurking behind the file cabinet, we have been perusing an absorbing document, bearing that omnious Government warning in red letters: "Restricted."

What's restricted in this case is a history of the United States of America, written and published by the worthy Office of War Information. The volume is formally restricted by O. W. I. imprimatur and cannot be distributed or sold among tax-paying citizens residing in the United States. And we think this is very wise on the part of the O. W. I. Because if their Handbook of the United States of America got general distribution here there would be a howl to Congress which might well boot the O. W. I. out of its present overseas propaganda campaign to put across the New Deal at next November's elections.

But the new edition, 178 pages of history, has been placed in the hands of all of O. W. I.'s overseas staff. And thanks to the enterprise of a British publishing house it will be made available to all United States servicemen in the British Isles, who, before voting next November, would like to brush up on American history as seen through the eyes of Dr. Elmer Davis (late history student at Queens College, Oxford, and present director of O. W. I.) and his colleagues, including Broadway Playwright Bob Sherwood, head of O. W. I.'s overseas propaganda bureau.

Incidentally, the O. W. I. historians who forget to mention that such persons as Paul Revere ever existed or that a gentleman by the name of George Washington led rebellious Americans against the forces of Britain, or that Thomas Jefferson ever lived, didn't pass over the name of old "Massa" Bob Sherwood, who ordered the volume printed at Government expense.

In the section devoted to belles lettres, the savants on the O. W. I. pay roll modestly point out that Robert E. Sherwood "has been a spokesman for democratic ideals in Idiot's Delight and Abe Lincoln in Illinois. And that other pet playwright of O. W. I., Maxwell Anderson, also gets a good international boost at public expense (after all the Sherwood and Anderson plays are bidding for London trade).

Of Anderson, the historians solemnly note "his poetic dramas, like Winterset, Candle in the Wind, have been courageous. His war play, The Eve of St. Mark, has been called Anderson's best. * * * American theater has geared itself to war. Its current plays carry on the war against fascism, interpret the Nation at war, or serve as dramatic statements of war aims and ideals."

We don't like to make any nasty cracks, but lines like those quoted arouse the snide suspicion that O. W. I. Overseas Director Sherwood might be giving an approving nod to the blurbs of Press Agent Bob Sherwood plugging the output of Broadway Playwright Sherwood. We don't know of course, but we do know that it's all done at Government expense in the name of patriotism.

Now, the worthy Members of Congress, who are being implored by Franklin D. Roosevelt, to pony up a neat increase of $25,000,000 over the present allotment for overseas propaganda work, are not particularly irritated about the O. W. I.'s press agent blurbs.

They are not immediately concerned over the fact that from a standpoint of factual history of the United States, the whole O. W. I. jumble is so much fantastic screwball rubbish.

Had the O. W. I.'s Handbook of the United States been written by a child in the seventh grade he would be properly classed as a backward child. Had it been read by Henry Ford, the manufacturer would be justified in uttering the famous phrase "history is bunk."

But what makes the G. O. P. lawmakers, such as Representative TABER, of New York, sore, is the unashamed, bold use of public funds for Roosevelt fourth-term campaign propaganda.

So-o-o expect a merry session on the hill. And if O. W. I. history pundits are placed on the witness stand before a House committee and examined on their scholarship, the belly laughs should relieve the invasion-taut nerves of the Capitol.

The original O. W. I. Handbook of the United States was tossed off in a 400-page edition. Only 5,000 copies were printed at a Government printing charge of only $4,639. These were quietly shipped out of the country.

Last January came the present revised edition with the material slightly revised, contained in the larger format of 178 pages. Cost of this is as yet unknown, but Congress will find out. The British publishers are placing their cloth-covered edition on the market at 10 shilling 6 pence, about $2 in American money. All copies bear the official O. W. I.' seal and the announcement that the volume contains "pertinent information about the United States of America and the war for use overseas" and has been issued by "the overseas branch of the Office of War Information."

In the revised edition only eight columns are required to tell the tale of the Republic from Lief Ericson's discovery in 1000 to the inauguration of F. D. R. and the New Deal.

The O. W. I. historians of the United States skipped rather breathlessly over the B. R. (before Roosevelt) dark ages of our Nation, but when they got down to F. D. R.'s entry into the White House—boy, oh boy. They spit on their hands and really go to town. They cut loose for 22 solid columns of hosannahs in an ecstatic chronological chant of the words and deeds of the New Deal leader.

Somehow or other the boys left out the Constitution of the United States in their history. It didn't make the grade, but they did get in the preamble, however, the Declaration of Independence, Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, Wilson's Fourteen Points and—here comes the really important utterances—the Declaration of the United Nations, the Atlantic Charter, the Four Freedoms, the Moscow Conference Declaration, and the statement signed by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill and Premier Stalin regarding atrocities.

O. W. I. experts probably figured that Washington's Farewell Address or Patrick Henry's "Give me liberty or give me death" oration didn't place in that company.

Nice Going, Medico!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following article by J. Norman Lodge, which appeared recently in the American Legion Magazine. Mr. Lodge is a war correspondent from Methuen, Mass.; he has had wide experience and has covered the various war fronts for several years:

NICE GOING, MEDICO

(By J. Norman Lodge)

Japanese bombs were raining down on Rendova Island. Death and desolation, the war god's premium exacted as penalty for modern warfare, was all about.

Dead and dying—viciously wounded men groaning in the slime of the coral thoroughly wetted down by continuous rain. Orders were being barked by those in command. Discipline was sorely taxed in that terrible moment that lasts a lifetime after such a pattern bombing.

Then from the welter of ruined tents, from the bomb craters, from the hillside foxholes, "messengers of the gods," noncombatants all, began their work. Bandages, splints, morphine syrettes, plasma, and other medical supplies were carried to the wounded and order came from the chaos of a moment before.

One may talk of deeds of derring-do. One may laud the Air Force, one may talk of the marine raider, of the machine gunner and of the submarine sailor. They all deserve all the mention they get, but in my book the fellow with the guts, the fellow who receives little mention for his work in the war, is the one who wears the caduceus of the Medical Corps. Noncombatants, unarmed, in the thick of the bombing or the front-line fighting they crawl out into the vastness of the jungle night to save a buddy, to administer under withering fire the life blood from the plasma bank.

There are others, too, listed as noncombatants—chaplains, for instance—but that is another story. This is strictly about the "messengers of the gods," so named because their caduceus—the twining serpents surmounted by the wings of Mercury, translated means exactly that.

I've seen them when the action was thickest, in the jungles, on bomb-strewn fields, aboard ships, and in the field and base hospitals.

I have seen their sketchy shelters attacked and I have seen them killed. And I have never seen a man, enlisted or officer, wearing the medical insignia who turned coward in the face of enemy attacks.

Away back in the gruesome days of Guadalcanal, when we were storming Mount Austen, when we were on the Matanikau or on the bloody river Teneru, medical men made military history with their magnificent work under fire.

Aboard the destroyers, in the air, under the sea, and in the tangled jungles of New Georgia, Rendova, and Vella Lavella, I have jotted down note after note, not of the Marine private who drove away the fanatical Jap, not of the pilot who waded into too many Zeros, not of the antiaircraft gunner knocking Jap planes out of the sky and not of the raider tracking down an enemy outpost, but of the unarmed, lawful nonbelligerent, noncombatant lad wearing the twining serpents, staff and wings of the Medical Corps.

Lt. Nicholas T. Kliebert of Detroit, the officer in charge of a water hole on New Georgia during the 37 days of horror that the storming of Munda airport was, has this to say about them:

"Sergeants Harry Jeliotti of Bridgeport, Conn., and Joseph Petrosky, of New Haven in the same State, the medical men with us, were the bravest lads I ever saw."

That was just after 300 fanatical Japs had attacked one of our litter columns in the jungles of New Georgia. Storming in on the column in charge of 11 medical corpsmen, they knocked our wounded men from their litters, used bayonets on some, machetes on others, and for several hours sated themselves with gory deeds to the greater shame of anything Japanese.

Kliebert with four others happened on the melee and before their night's work was done 175 Japs paid with their lives for the carnage they had wrought. But, during the donnybrook, Jeliotti and Petrosky, with their nine corpsmen, escorted the ambulatory wounded to foxholes across the small stream; got out at least 35 litter cases. Those men, already wounded and then wounded again by the sadistic Japs, were treated on the spot with whatever the medical men were able to round up.

Not once did any one of the medical corpsmen think of himself. Not once did one slither away in the jungle blackness to safety. And although no one of them was armed, each made repeated trips back into the orgy to bring out wounded to safety.

I recall the night we went up the slot to the Paruso River on Vella Lavella to bring out 157 survivors of the gallant cruiser Helena. I was aboard one of the rescue craft—an old four-piper of World War No. 1—now sporting but two stacks and renamed an A. P. D. (Army Personnel Destroyer).

Aboard was Lt. Lewis Kirchhofer, of Philadelphia. As we took aboard our human cargo, shipwrecked for 8 days, Dr. Kirchhofer started to work. It was just past midnight. He had but the tiny wardroom of the small destroyer and the crew quarters in which to work. But from the moment we took aboard the first survivor, Ensign George Bauswine, of Cincinnati, until the last men were picked up further down the island, Kirchhofer dressed the wounded, those suffering brutal coral cuts, and reduced fractures.

Among the Helena survivors was one lad with both legs broken. Another had a smashed hip. They were given treatment, as was another poor lad who had one of the worst compound fractures I have ever seen. Kirchhofer, single handed, worked the entire long trip back to Tulagi, then supervised the transfer of the worn-out lads to the base hospital there.

Ensign Bauswine told me that night in talking of the fracture cases: "Thanks to the excellent medical aid by our corpsman, J. G. Layton, of Roxton, Tex., all three still have their limbs." Layton later was recommended for the Navy Cross by Commander John Chew, executive officer of the Helena.

Those are not isolated instances. In fact they are some of the lesser deeds performed by medical men. And the same holds true all down the line. The nurses aboard the naval hospital ships, the Army nurses flying the C–47 hospital airplanes, the corpsmen in the various base hospitals at the rear echelons, and the unarmed lad, medical aid kit slung over his shoulder, crawling out into the stinking jungle morass to administer plasma while machine-gun slugs, as thick as a swarm of bees, cut bushes over his head.

Batting the breeze during one of many trips up the slot from Guadalcanal to Rendova aboard an LST (landing ship tanks) which, on the return trip is utilized for bringing out wounded, I talked all night—we were at general quarters, of course—to a medical lieutenant whose name I will not use because of medical ethics.

I asked him how many cases he had treated, how many amputations, how many plasma injections he had given and how many fractures he had reduced and the number of operations he had performed. The figures are startling. Again I will not use the figures he gave me because it might give information to the enemy. But we wound it up, after a battle of figures, by arriving at this estimate.

The doctor, who incidentally also comes from Philadelphia and who knew Kirchhofer, was 40 years of age. He gave up a $15,000 practice to volunteer for naval duty. He had made 15 trips up the slot and on each return trip had brought out an average of 250 cases of all types—war neurosis, malarial, appendicitis, and wounded. He was the only medical officer aboard, but, with the aid of his corpsmen he worked the full 20 hours en route back to Guadalcanal.

We began using figures. We charged each patient with an office visit although I tried to make him see that he had gone to the patient, therefore was entitled to charge a dollar a mile. He listed the amputations at the scale he would charge in his home practice. He listed operations at the same civilian rate, and the medications were charged according to his office price scale. Even he was aghast when we had added it all up.

The New Georgia campaign began June 30. It was over by August 5, when we had Munda airport. My doctor friend had done business that at his home office would have upped his $15,000 practice into six figures. And yet, as he explained it, he couldn't have done it at home even with everything at his command. Men do remarkable things during war, things they couldn't do at home even with better facilities.

And most of this work was done while Japanese bombers harassed us all the way down through Blanche Strait, seldom leaving us until daybreak.

More recently the medical men came in for great praise at the taking of Tarawa, perhaps the bloodiest battle of all time. Marine officers reported from that swift siege that perhaps not more than 200 of the entire marine attacking force escaped without wounds of some description. And yet, as the raiding forces waded ashore from their landing craft, along with them went unarmed men, men with nothing but a red cross to distinguish them from the combatants, men who willingly risked their lives to be present when one of their buddies fell. And the Jap does not recognize hospital men as noncombatants. In fact, they recognize none of the conventions other nations have signed.

Medical men, chaplains and correspondents are unarmed. But to the Jap each category is an enemy. Our medical men who attended wounded Japs on Guadalcanal were often attacked by the very men they were treating.

Some day, medical ethics to the contrary, the saga of the "messengers of the gods" will be told in its entirety. Some day I hope the Medical Corps will have their own P. R. O. (press relations officer) to recount the valiant deeds the unarmed, brave lads accomplish.

You can have your combatant machine gunner, your air hero, your raider or your artillery man. Man for man, pound for pound, worth for worth, I'll take the messengers of the gods, those fearless boys who wear the twined serpent of Mercury as their emblem. More power to their clan.

And, until ethics are shoved aside and their stirring deeds are properly chronicled, this "old sarge" of World War No. 1, and correspondent of World War No. 2, has appointed himself their Boswell. Nice going, men.

What Price O. W. I. Hooey?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald:

WHAT PRICE O. W. I. HOOEY?

The New York Sun comes to bat with a story from its Washington man, Phelps Adams, about what would seem to be the most eerie single performance to date of Elmer Davis' Office of War Information, or O. W. I.

Mr. Adams tells of a 400-page O. W. I. book entitled "A Handbook of the United States of America," gotten out for circulation in other Allied countries, especially England. The book purports to give a detailed and accurate picture of the United States—its history, its Government, its art, literature, geography, industry, press, etc., etc.

The reader gets some surprising ideas about the United States from this O. W. I. production.

TWISTED HISTORY

For instance, it appears that only two women in our whole history have contributed enough to our national life to be mentioned in this handbook. These astounding ladies were Miss Jane Addams and (you've probably guessed it already) Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

George Washington gets fairly honorable mention—but not as our Commander in Chief in the Revolution. The first mention of him is as presiding officer at the Constitutional Convention in 1787. Thomas Jefferson is not mentioned, probably for the double reason that he wrote the Declaration of Independence and abolished primogeniture in Virginia.

The Revolution as a whole, in fact, is passed over with an extremely light touch, its only actors mentioned by name being John Paul Jones and British General Cornwallis and 7,000 troops. We presume the idea is to avoid ruffling British feelings about the Revolution; to make the British love us enough to continue to accept the lend-lease donations we have been showering on them to the tune of billions of dollars' worth a year.

Andrew Jackson is not mentioned, probably because he beat the British at New Orleans and killed the British Major Gen. Sir Edward Pakenham, Wellington's brother-in-law.

The British, if you ask us, don't need any such buttering up. They will accept all the guns, tanks, planes, and food we will send them, and will not even be pettifogging about the bookkeeping. The British people, too, are well aware that the American Revolution occurred and that England didn't win, as witness plenty of thoroughly objective and accurate books on the subject by British authors.

But to return to the O. W. I. United States handbook. One of its sections is a "Chronology of American History" from 1000 A. D. to January 1, 1943. Our history from Leif Ericsson to Franklin D. Roosevelt's first inaugural takes 8 pages, while our history during the reign of Roosevelt takes 14½ pages.

Mr. Roosevelt does remarkably well, too, under the heading "Historic American Speeches and Documents." Here are printed the Declaration of Independence, the preamble (only) to the Constitution, Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, Wilson's Fourteen Points, the declaration of the United Nations, the Atlantic Charter, and speeches by Mr. Roosevelt on the "four freedoms," the Philippine Commonwealth, and the Allied invasion of north Africa.

In short, this Handbook of the United States of America is a book which tortures and emasculates United States history for two obvious purposes. One of these is to glorify Franklin D. Roosevelt as President of the United States. The other is to push the idea that he would be the ideal choice for President of the world.

Those two purposes stick out throughout the volume, and are plain to any connoisseur of propaganda.

DAVIS WANTS $64,000,000

The O. W. I., which produced this masterpiece of propaganda, has now come around to ask Congress for $64,000,000 of your money to carry on for another year. That is an increase of $25,000,000 over its current appropriations of $39,000,000.

Congress, we believe on the face of the facts thus far publicized about the O. W. I., should scrutinize this request for $64,000,000 with the greatest care and skepticism. The O. W. I.'s story is that it is fighting the same kind of war of propaganda and nerves for us as Dr. Paul Josef Goebbels is fighting for Germany. The facts as thus far dug up go to indicate that O. W. I. on the contrary is spending our money for a lot of paper, shortwave and news-reel boondoggling whose main effect is to make our allies laugh at us behind our backs.

The American people, who pay the bills, are entitled to know what the truth about O. W. I. is—and to have free and easy access to all the propaganda products it gets out for foreign consumption.

As for the presidency of the world, Mr. Roosevelt can now be assured that there is at least one part of the world where he will never be President. That part is Russia. Pal Joey Stalin has made it more than plain that he isn't stepping aside for anybody.

Allied Victory in Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York World-Telegram of April 19, 1944:

ALLIED VICTORY IN RUSSIA

At Sevastopol the Red armies are completing the liberation of southern Russia in the most remarkable military campaign of the war; in the number of troops involved, territory reclaimed, and the steady 800-mile advance despite an entrenched enemy, snow, ice, floods, mud, and bad communications, this offensive is historic.

By destroying so many Hitler divisions and so much equipment; by depriving him of Ukraine food, Donbas minerals and industries, north Caucasus oil, the Kiev-Kharkov networks and Black Sea ports; by threatening the Balkans, and by shattering the myth of Nazi military superiority, the Red armies have opened the way to final Allied victory. There is still much fight left in Germany but, barring miracles, she never can recover from this blow.

Marshal Stalin has said Russia's achievement would not have been possible without our help. While it would be neither fitting nor fair to us to measure our munitions against the blood they have shed, the victory is all the finer for them and for us because it is shared.

Our bombers from Italy have weakened Nazi armies in Russia by blasting their Danubian communications and supply lines, including their precious Ploesti oil source.

The continuous western air offensive has drawn about three-fourths of the Nazi fighter planes away from Russia, where they might have turned the battle. American air forces alone since November have cut Nazi fighter production by about 5,000 planes, and since January have shot down 5,200 planes, all of which Hitler might have thrown against Russia.

In western and southern Europe, Russia's allies have tied down more than 40 percent of Hitler's total divisions, many of them hastily withdrawn from the Russian to the Italian front or to the western invasion coasts.

Nimitz, MacArthur, Stilwell, and Chennault kept Japan so busy that Stalin could concentrate against Hitler instead of using larger Red forces to guard the Siberian back door.

To cite such American contributions is not to lessen Russia's paramount achievement, but to demonstrate anew that there are no separate fronts and no isolated battles in this global war. The only possible complete victory is joint victory.

The G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the April 15 issue of Army Times:

THE G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

There is no reason for any delay on the part of the House of Representatives in passing the G. I. bill of rights. The Senate has already unanimously passed the measure, the entire Nation is behind the bill, the President has indicated that he is wholeheartedly in favor of the legislation, so it is up to the House to quit stalling and take action on the measure.

To the men on the combat fronts the G. I. bill of rights represents a definite move in their behalf. Its concrete provisions give them something to tie onto, a lift for their morale.

Although little opposition has been voiced by any groups or individuals, the credit for getting the bill before Congress goes to the veterans' organizations. Their efforts and actions in behalf of the bill assured its passage.

Mr. Speaker, the men and women in the armed forces are wondering what has become of this bill, and why the House committee has not acted more promptly upon it. The families and friends of service people feel exactly the same way about it, as indicated by the fact that thousands of citizens in my district have signed petitions urging speedy enactment of this measure.

The committee received this bill originally on January 10. It has had a revised form of the bill under consideration since March 27. The Senate passed the bill unanimously on March 24. I urge the committee to complete its deliberations, and to report this measure to the House for action without further delay.

Why They Hear So Much About Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting herewith an article that appeared in the Paris News, Paris, Tex., April 17, 1944, entitled "Aussies Ask Clemo Why They Hear so Much About Texans." It is as follows:

Texans in the present war are upholding the traditions of our State by distinguishing themselves on all battle fronts as well as on the home front. Repeatedly have Australians asked me why they hear so much more about Texas than they do other States in the Union. If such a question was put to me by an American from another State I would, without giving the matter further thought, immediately reply, "Why because it is the best gol derned State in the Union, that's why." But to a citizen of another country one must be less boastful and state specific supporting facts. Due to the number of Australians asking me such questions and due to the necessity to render a plausible reply, I have had to ponder over the facts.

Unquestionably our Texas history plays an important role in giving us such an intense provincial pride in our State. Our forebears fought for and won our independence in such spectacular and dramatic circumstances that would rival or surpass the history of other States, nations, or peoples. We have been a nation unto ourselves, self-governing, and independent. Our State is rich in folklore and legend. Our people are steeped in a pioneer tradition and imbued with intense and justiable pride in our heritage. Our men have always fervidly answered the call to arms in any crisis. In so doing they have proceeded to commit themselves on the field of battle with the same courage manifested by those Texas immortals of the Alamo, Golidad, and San Jacinto. It is little wonder when the call to arms is sounded that Texans are among the first to answer. It is little wonder that on the battlefield Texans acquit themselves in a manner in keeping with the heritage bequeathed to them by Houston, Bowie, Crockett, Travis, and other immortals of Texas history.

The size of Texas tends to give her people an individuality not possessed by others. Not only is our State large geographically, but gigantic in accomplishments. Our oil fields are extensive, our fields of corn and cotton are of great size, our herds of cattle large, and our timber land plentiful. We have large modern cities, thousands of miles of paved highways, and seaports that are growing by leaps and bounds. We have a diversity of climate as well as terrain. We cultivate cotton in the northeast sector of the State, produce choice cattle and sheep in the west, rice in the south, and citrus fruit in the valley. As one proud Texan exclaimed, "You name it and we'll have it."

Texans are their own best publicity agents. When any Texan is asked his home State his chest will bulge with pride and he proudly acclaims, "I'm from Texas." Texans never miss an opportunity to publicize Texas. Only since I have been away from Texas have I fully realized how other people are so universally conscious of the Lone Star State. Australians feel a keen kinship with Texas and Texans. Recently an American war correspondent published an article in an Australian paper on the Australian soldier (the Digger). In his justifiable eulogy of them he chanced to state that they (the Aussies) reminded him very much of Texans. Instead of resenting this comparison, as they would be justified in doing, for, after all, they are of English stock and take great pride in the fact, they loved it. Since that time, upon meeting an Australian and he discovers I am a Texan, I am quizzed as to my opinion on the accuracy of the comparison. An assenting vote that the comparison is true inevitably leads to an invitation to tea as the guest of the pleased Aussie. (Never fear, I am not selling my birthright for a pot of tea. To be compared to an Aussie Digger is a high compliment.)

By our constant boosting of Texas it may appear that fellows from other States would find our conversation a trifle obnoxious. A braggart is never one to endear himself to those around him. Instead of resentment, those from other States thrive on the good-natured raillery that goes on between those from Texas and those not so blessed. A genuine Texan never wears his feelings on his sleeve. He welcomes comment on Texas, whether good or bad. Actually I think that most Texans assume the philosophy of the renowned circus major domo, P. T. Barnum, who made the classic remark, "I don't care what you say about me just as long as you mention my name." So it is with Texans, just mention Texas, whether good or bad. When a non-Texan relates in detail the disadvantages and discomforts he experienced while training in Texas or the heat, rain, or cold experienced when passing through on the way to a port of embarkation, the Texans present will not deny anything said. In fact, they will proceed to tell of even greater catastrophes that he had missed. When an outsider mentions our unpredictable weather, our drought, blizzards in the Panhandle, incessant rain in the spring, or dry heat in the summer, some Texan will inform them that they were lucky to have missed the really bad seasons and then relate instances when we had real droughts, real blizzards, and real rain. I've heard tall tales of atmospheric catastrophes that, if they were true, would have destroyed the State beyond any hopes of reclamation.

When a Texan does boast about his State, or the accomplishments of other Texans, it is always done on such an exaggerated scale that non-Texans take it with a grain of salt and proceed to heckle the boastful individual. I was seated at the mess table eating breakfast one morning when a fellow Texan rushed into the tent and excitedly exclaimed, "Italy has just surrendered to Texas! I just got it over the radio." In the excitement that ensued no one gave thought to what the Texan had said, other than that Italy had surrendered. It finally dawned on those present. "Surrendered to Texas, bosh!" stated a native son of Connecticut. "To hear you Texans talk you'd think you were personally winning the war." From the far end of the mess hall came the drawling voice of a Texan, "I wouldn't exactly say that, brother, the Russians are helping us a lot."

In this war as in the past one Texas A. and M. has provided officers on a larger scale than any other such institution in the United States. Almost daily I meet a Texas A. and M. graduate. Texans in this theater have distinguished themselves in combat. The exploits of lads from the Lone Star State have become almost legendary. The Air Corps is packed with Texans. The highly successful invasion of New Britain was executed by a Texas cavalry division. From the limited information we receive over here I have gleaned the fact that troops from the Thirty-sixth Division (Texas) were the first allies to set foot on European soil, this at Salerno, Italy. All of this I can now relate to my Australian friends who inquire of me why they hear so much about Texas. Texans make their own news and their own history.

The current rumors floating around here in Australia is that Germany and Japan are suing for a separate peace with Texas. But we Texans aren't concerned because we're in this fight to the finish and will stick with our favorite ally—the United States of America.

Fathers of the Race

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the following poem was written by a friend of mine, Mr. Neal D. Ireland, 1055 North Kingsley Drive, Los Angeles, Calif., shortly after the War Department notified him that his son was killed in action while on a bombing expedition over Berlin:

FATHERS OF THE RACE

(By his father, in the hour of travail, as a memorial to Lt. Robert Neal Ireland)

Fathers of the race, I come seeking entry to your fellowship.
I have the eternal password—"A son given in war."
I do not come demanding, neither do I beg admission.
Out of my own father heart I know your hearts.
We no longer have pride. We no longer believe in demanding.
So out of a great humility I come to you, my brothers in suffering.

I do not ask your color, your politics, or your faith,
Nor does it matter on which side of the tracks—or of the world—you may live.
If you have given—as I gave—all your heart's pride
As your part of Humanity's great sacrifice,
Then neither will you ask any questions.
You are admitted to our great fraternity.

Let us sit together on the banks of some quiet stream,
The Volga, the Rhine, the Yangtze, or the Po,
And tell each other of the dreams we had for him
Whom we loved better than our very lives—
Him for whom we planned since early manhood.

Let us, my brother-fathers, hold together in loss
And in the cleansing flame of pain burn out
The ancient hatreds, all vanity and all pride
That have made man slay his brothers since the time of Cain.
And as we talk together, sharing our common pain
You may be sure I'll never hate again.
Let us pledge faith that we will hence be brothers
Because of this—our Brotherhood of Fathers.

Social Security Funds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, for some time certain individuals and some editors have been critical in expressing themselves concerning the Social Security surplus. Let it be understood that the law, not rule or regulation, provides those funds must be invested in interest-bearing Government bonds. That provision in the law results in an increase in the surplus. There is an excellent editorial published in this week's issue of Labor on this subject. Under permission granted me, I include that editorial as part of my remarks:

AN OLD SCARE STORY IS REVIVED—SOCIAL-SECURITY FUNDS ARE BEING INVESTED IN GOVERNMENT BONDS, AND THAT'S THE SAFEST I O U IN THE WORLD

From time to time, newspapers in various parts of the country endeavor to scare their readers by repeating the old yarn about the way the Government is using social-security funds to meet ordinary expenses.

The latest to come to our attention is an editorial in the Times of Beatrice, Nebr. The editor says:

"Instead of creating an honest reserve of these paid-in funds for some future showdown, the Government has been spending the money on current expenses and placing in the reserve fund a series of I O U's."

By weird calculations which no ordinary person can hope to follow, the editor reaches the conclusion that there is an over-all 300 percent loss.

It would be most unfortunate if any considerable number of people were to accept that statement at its face value, for it is entirely erroneous.

We don't know what the editor had in mind when he wrote about an honest reserve, but we take it for granted he would agree that any surplus in the social-security fund should be invested, and not piled up in the Treasury vaults in the form of currency and gold and silver.

He would also probably agree that the surplus should be invested in the best securities available.

Well, that is exactly what has happened. The social-security surplus is used to buy a special kind of Government bond. It pays 3 percent. Such a bond would command a premium on the open market, but it is sold to social security at par. That means that Social Security is getting the best security available at a remarkably favorable price.

Of course, these bonds are I O U's, but they're Uncle Sam's I O U's. Every bond he has issued since the Constitution was adopted was just an I O U—that is, it was a promise that it would be redeemed at face value by Uncle Sam on a given date.

Uncle Sam has never run out on such a promise. He has always redeemed his I O U's. With the help of God, he always will. Social security investments are as sound as our Government, and our Government is just about the soundest thing in the world.

We are all interested in social security. Therefore, anything that disturbs our faith in that great institution is worthy of the most serious consideration. Labor has given such consideration to social-security investments, and it does not hesitate to assure its readers that they have no reason to worry.

Mr. Speaker, I feel Hon. Edward Keating, a former Member of this body who is manager of Labor, and his associates deserve our thanks for this clear statement. It confirms what Hon. Arthur J. Altmeyer, the Social Security Administrator, recently told the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Canada and Post-War Civil Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, one of the post-war problems that will confront the Nation will be commercial aviation, and I sometimes wonder if the membership of the House realizes the importance of this subject both from a domestic standpoint and from an international standpoint.

For the information, therefore, of the Members I deem it advisable that they should know something of what our sister nation Canada is doing. The Honorable C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply, on Friday, March 17, 1944, in the House of Commons in Ottawa delivered a very fine speech on the subject of post-war aviation both from the domestic standpoint and from an international standpoint and at the same time had printed in the Official Report of Debates a tentative "draft of an international air transport convention." This speech, as well as the draft of the proposed convention, is a little too long to publish in the RECORD at this time. I am, therefore, under the permission granted me, printing a portion of this speech relative to international aviation by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. At some later date I shall quote extracts from the speech on domestic aviation in the Dominion. There is one very significant paragraph in this speech which I shall call to your attention, and shall quote:

Accordingly, after full consideration, the Government has decided that the railways shall not exercise any monopoly of air services. Steps will be taken to require our railways to divest themselves of ownership of air lines, to the end that, within a period of 1 year from the ending of the European war, transport by air will be entirely separate from surface transportation. In the meantime, no new air routes other than Government-operated routes will be allocated to air lines owned by any railway or other operator of surface transportation. The term "surface transportation" includes railways, shipping companies, and highway transport companies.

As to international aviation, Mr. Howe said:

We believe that in the field of international air transport our interest lies in a liberal course of cooperation with other nations. This decision has been reached in view of the great importance of air transport in the future. Air transport is more than just the latest and fastest method of transporting passengers and goods. It is a revolutionary development which has already profoundly affected the civilization of the world. No one can predict with any degree of certainty or precision the nature and extent of the contribution which it may make to the future security and prosperity of the peoples of the world. It is our intention to make every effort to ensure that the framework within which the international air transport of the future functions, will be designed to promote international cooperation and not to foster international bitterness.

The demands of war have telescoped into 4 or 5 years the growth that might normally have taken air transport a generation to achieve. Canada's size is shrinking, while our long 3,000-mile frame is filling out, as air transport opens up the Canadian north. All Canadians are becoming neighbors and Canada is being given a new basis for unity. What is true of relations between the various parts of Canada is true also of relations between the nations of the world. These too are being brought closer together. Moreover, new regional connections are being developed and the boundaries of old regions washed away. Because of the geographical location of the land masses of the earth, that section of the globe stretching out from the north pole to a degree of latitude roughly equivalent to the Mediterranean and the southern border of the United States will probably be the most important for the air transport of the future. In this northern region, Canada occupies a strategic position, for it stands athwart most of the air routes linking North America with Europe and Asia. This position carries with it great responsibilities and great opportunities.

As I have already mentioned, on April 2 last year the Prime Minister gave a statement of the Government's position with regard to international air transport, making it clear that our policy would be one of international cooperation and collaboration and that we would support whatever policy seemed best calculated to serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada, but our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war. Behind this statement lies a recognition of the duty of the Canadian Government to do what it can to avoid the two chief weaknesses in the pre-war organization of international air transport. In the first place, it was a cause of serious rivalries and disputes between nations. In the second place, and closely connected to the first weakness, lines were run at an uneconomic cost, necessitating large national subsidies. Some countries refused to permit air lines to cross the air space above their territory, necessitating costly detours. Others refused landing rights, as well as transit rights. The necessity for hard and persistent bilateral bargaining resulted, especially in Europe, in the establishment of so many competing national services that air transport became highly uneconomic, and lines were heavily subsidized at the expense of national taxpayers.

Behind much of this friction lay considerations of national prestige, but more especially of national security, Civil air-transport fleets, and civil aircraft industries, represent a war potential, a reserve both of personnel and of industrial capacity which is all important in time of war. The truth of this has been obvious in the present conflict. The emphasis in the pre-war period upon the security aspects of civil air transport was, therefore, natural, and goes far to explain the failure of nations at that time to agree upon a method of effective international control of international air services. Because of the rapid development of aviation since the outbreak of war the international rivalries which would develop in the future after the conclusion of hostilities would be even sharper than those of the past, unless some improvement is effected.

The decision which the United Nations must make in the near future on the post-war organization of air transport thus is vital, and an enlightened settlement will go a long way toward establishing a lasting peace, and a new world order of security. It can constitute a model for the settlement of other difficult international problems, and create an atmosphere in which the settlement of these other problems will become easier. Failure to devise a working system of cooperation and collaboration will not only lead to endless friction in the field of air transport, but will prejudice the establishment of an effective world security organization.

From the point of view of practical politics, the problem is to find some method of international control which will serve the desired objectives, and yet be generally acceptable to all. The task is not an easy one. For many months it has been the subject of exhaustive study by Canadian officials and of active consideration by the Government. I think that a policy which is designed to meet these ends has been worked out, and that the Canadian representatives in future international discussions on air transport will enter those discussions well prepared, and with a clear view of the type of arrangement best designed to meet the needs of Canada for the development of international air services and provide for a fair share of international air transport, and at the same time establish an atmosphere of working cooperation among all other interested nations.

It is obvious that air regulations dealing with such matters as traffic rules, safety, and navigational aids should be as uniform as possible throughout the world, and that an international authority must be set up and given the power to prepare regulations which would be accepted as standards by the members of that authority. This alone, however, is not enough. I have already stated that the difficulties, in the pre-war period, arose because certain nations exercised their sovereignty over the air above their countries in a fashion designed to hinder the development of air transport, and foster ill will.

Accordingly, I think that we must be prepared to subscribe to the granting of general freedom of transit for international air services on a universal basis, so that national air services will automatically possess the right to cross the territory of other nations en route to their destinations, and to land in other countries for refueling and reservicing without having to request the specific permission of each government concerned. However, in order to prevent misuse of this freedom, it would appear necessary to grant to some international authority power to supervise the manner in which it is carried out. Moreover, in thus establishing freedom of transit, countries such as Canada, which are strategically placed, will be making a very great contribution to an effective international system, particularly when, like Canada, their population is not great, and the amount of traffic which they have to offer for international carriage would consequently not be large. On the other hand, this right of transit would be of particular benefit to those nations which have a great deal of potential traffic for international air services, but are less strategically located.

It would seem reasonable, therefore, to suggest that freedom of air transit should be extended to cover as well a certain amount of freedom of carriage of goods and passengers, in order to enable all nations to share in a proportion of the international traffic available without having to go in for all the bilateral bargaining which so confused the pre-war situation. It would seem necessary, accordingly, that each nation should at least possess the right to carry passengers and cargo from its own territory to other countries, and to bring back from those other countries passengers and cargo which are intended for its own territory. This would mean that the nations of the world operating international air services would not only be unhampered in the movement of their aircraft across the territories of other countries, but would also have a certain amount of traffic available to their own air services without the necessity of bilateral bargaining, thus increasing the chances of reasonable economic operation. In order to prevent a helter-skelter of airways developing, each country would, of course, designate the routes across its territory which the air lines of other countries must follow, just as it does for its own domestic services.

While international air transport will be a great and important factor in the future, nevertheless one airplane can do a great deal of work, and in the post-war period all the air traffic available may be carried by a comparatively small number of aircraft. It would not seem desirable that each nation should be allowed to establish as many international services, in as many areas, as it wished, thus bringing about a useless, uneconomic, and competitive situation which could only lead to trouble. Not only should some international air transport authority supervise the administration of the freedoms and rights suggested above, but the authority should also have power to regulate international air services in order to prevent the dangers of unnecessary and uneconomic duplication. Some such method might be used as control of rates and schedules, and licensing. Because an authority, established on a universal basis, might have difficulty in giving due consideration to the special needs of particular regions, it would be desirable that it work through regional groupings or councils.

If any such framework for international cooperation in the field of air transport should be developed, and I think it desirable that it should, it would seem that cross-border services, such as those between Canada and the United States, should be considered in a special category, and dealt with specially by the two countries concerned, since services originating in the one country and terminating in the other are primarily transfrontier extensions of domestic air services.

The Canadian Government is of the opinion that some form of organization along the lines suggested above would go far toward meeting the needs of the world for the establishment of effective international cooperation in the provision of efficient and economical air services, and at the same time provide for the fair and equitable participation of Canada in these air services.

One year ago the Prime Minister said: "The Government sees no good reason for changing its policy that trans-Canada air lines is the sole Canadian agency which may operate international air services." This is a matter of purely domestic concern, and this decision is, in the opinion of the Government, the one best calculated to serve the interests and needs of the Canadian people. It has, however, no bearing upon any decision of this type that may be made by other governments. The choice of instruments for the operation of international air services by the countries concerned is and must remain a matter of purely domestic decision. Each country must decide for itself whether its airline companies operating international air services are to be privately owned or state owned, whether there is to be one single national company or several.

I should like to say a word at this point regarding international discussions on air-transport policy. As Members of this House are aware, there was a preliminary exchange of views in London last October among the members of the Commonwealth, in which a Canadian delegation under my chairmanship participated. A complete airing of ideas and opinions, with regard to international air transport after the war took place, and provided a useful introduction to the broader discussion which will take place in due course. Canada, of course, expects to participate in these further discussions also, and is at the moment taking part in discussions with the United Kingdom and the United States regarding the holding of further exploratory conversations. No final decisions were taken in London, but I may say that it was evident from the outset that all participants had the same general objectives in view—the objectives which I have described earlier in this statement—and that there was a broad basis of general agreement as to the way these objectives might best be attained. All the participants were desirous of improving the air services between their territories, and agreed that such development must take place within an international framework, and that closed discriminatory systems could only promote disharmony and endanger the chances of reaching that broad agreement which is necessary.

Following the conversations in London, a statement was issued to the press, reading as follows:

"The conference with the dominions and India on civil air transport, which has been meeting in London since Monday last, concluded its sessions this morning. The conversations were informal and exploratory, and the conclusions reached are subject to confirmation by the governments represented at the conference. Unanimous agreement was reached as to the recommendations which should be made regarding the lines on which civil aviation should be developed after the war, and as to the contribution which the governments of the commonwealth and empire could make toward international cooperation in this field."

The chairman of the London meeting was Lord Beaverbrook, who is the member of the United Kingdom Government charged by Mr. Churchill with responsibility for the coordination of post-war civil air transport policy. Speaking in the House of Lords a week after the conclusion of the London meetings, Lord Beaverbrook emphasized the unanimous agreement which the conference had reached on every issue presented to it. He said that those issues were "adequate for testing immediate opinion in relation to civil aviation." He added that it had been agreed that "the international air transport authority should be intimately associated with and responsible to any United Nations security organization which might be established."

In summary, I may say that the Canadian Government is determined that Canada, by its participation in the framing of the general settlement of air transport, will make as great a contribution as possible to the successful solution of this problem. Our representatives in the international discussions, therefore, will be authorized to support or initiate such proposals as, in the Government's opinion, will be likely to result in the establishment of an international air transport authority with effective powers, supported by all the governments concerned, which will further international cooperation and good will, ensure that international air routes and services are divided fairly and equitably among all member nations, meet the needs of the peoples of the world for efficient and economical air transport, and contribute to the establishment and maintenance of a permanent system of general security.

Conduct of the War—Political Versus Military Leadership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include some observations by Constantine Brown, a recognized authority on diplomatic and military affairs, dated March 29, 1944, appearing in Human Events, a weekly analysis for the American citizen.

His observation is an analysis of the political versus military strategy of the war. The article is as follows:

POLITICAL VERSUS MILITARY LEADERSHIP

(By Constantine Brown)

The strategy of the United States in this war has been dictated by political rather than military leadership. The eventual result may justify the adage that civilians have no right to let the military bungle the conduct of the war. But, as matters stand, the military have a case—too seldom stated—for their own strategy, which they claim would have better advanced our military fortunes in this global conflict. The broader outlines of this case deserve consideration at a time when one great strategic operation, the Italian campaign, has encountered heavier weather than civilians anticipated, and another, the cross-Channel invasion, is coming to the fore.

The fundamental principles of the military strategy which has governed our world-wide operations so far were established within a few weeks following the disaster of Pearl Harbor. Premier Winston Churchill made his first visit to the White House at that time and these principles emerged from the joint conferences. They can be summed up as follows: "Hold the Pacific defensively and direct the main effort to the defeat of the Axis in Europe."

It is a little-known fact that American military minds preferred another strategy. General Marshall and later Admiral Stark's successor, Admiral King, believed that the Russians and the British, adequately supplied with arms and munitions, could hold the Germans for a long time. While our allies in Europe were engaged in these operations, the United States should concentrate its efforts in the Pacific where, the Army and Navy leaders believed, the myth of Japan's invincibility could be shattered in less than 2 years. Then, America could turn her troops, seasoned by this time from campaigning in the Pacific, against the European branch of the Axis. Throwing our weight into the scales held by the Russians and British, we could then more easily overcome the German armies.

But the political strategy of Churchill and Roosevelt prevailed over these views. Under the impact of what appeared at that time as a catastrophic defeat in the Pacific, and with knowledge of our lack of military preparation, the point of view of Churchill triumphed. Under these circumstances, the American military leaders bowed to the will of the political Commander in Chief and vigorously put their weight behind the accepted strategy.

But, with the importance of the eventual all-out attack on Japan in mind, the American military leaders had their own idea of how to carry out this strategy of beat Germany first. These military leaders saw that the Germans were strongly engaged in the Russian campaign, against tenaciously resisting Russian armies and handicapped by difficult and long supply lines. Under these conditions, they believed the Germans could not conceivably rush any large reinforcements to western Europe to break an Allied invasion. Therefore, the western Allies should occupy a part of western France. (It was deemed impossible at the time to try to reach the Rhine, because of our lack of divisional strength.) In this bridgehead we should establish airdromes from which we could send bomber forces over the Reich. Because France does not suffer the handicap of the dense fogs which envelop England for about 8 months a year, air operations would prove more constant and successful. In short, with this strategic conception in mind, the military leaders rushed American troops and matériel, in the opening months of 1942, to the invasion base of the British Isles.

Toward the end of July 1942 General Marshall and Admiral King prepared to go to England to discuss the fruition of these plans with their British colleagues. But, at the airport while waiting for their plane to take off, an official car from the White House arrived. The two leaders were handed a large white envelope which they discovered, to their surprise, contained instructions from the President to discuss with the British only the details of a newly conceived operation, supplanting their own—the occupation of north Africa. The military men again bowed to superior orders.

The invasion of north Africa proved a great success, although unforeseen circumstances delayed it from the end of October to the first week in November. But it was principally a success for British strategy because it effectively opened sea communications across the Mediterranean, hitherto clogged by Axis submarines and planes, to the Suez Canal and India.

While American military men rejoiced over the progress in north Africa, their satisfaction was diminished somewhat by the decision at the Casablanca Conference, to invade Sicily. But they were reconciled to this additional investment of men, matériel, and time by another agreement at that conference: Namely, that we would not delay the invasion of western Europe later than the summer of 1943. The Americans wanted to do the job as soon as possible in western Europe so as to get back to the Pacific.

They were, however, to suffer further disappointment. At the Washington Inter-Allied Conference of May 1943 they learned from the British that there were too few striking divisions in England to attempt the cross-channel invasion that summer. They reluctantly submitted to this view, but stubbornly resisted a British proposal to invade Italy itself following the taking of Sicily. The Americans claimed that Italy was already a liability to the Germans, that we should not burden ourselves with feeding at least 15,000,000 Italians and that the supply problems would offer many difficulties. The net result, if we got to the Po River, would be merely acquisition of bombing bases. Finally, they said, military operations with increased supply problems in the narrow hilly peninsula, would jeopardize the success of the essential cross-channel invasion. At Washington, and again at the Quebec Conference in August, the American military chiefs issued these warnings to the political leaders. But the political overruled the military leaders again. The invasion of the Italian peninsula was given priority.

Today, the worst fears of the American military men seem realized. We have, as Churchill said on March 24, "lost heavily" and are stymied 60 miles south of Rome. It is true that we are holding a number of German divisions in Italy, but these are reserve troops and apparently affect in no way the defensive concentrations of the Germans in western Europe. Also, the long lines of communications which handicapped German operations between 1941 and 1943 have now diminished as a German problem and have become an increased Allied problem. Even from Britain comes skepticism about the Italian campaign, as witness the statement of British Gen. J. F. C. Fuller (retired) in Newsweek, "The lesson of all this is that the strategy is execrable. We should never have embarked on this Italian adventure because it was unstrategic from the start."

Perhaps the success of the cross-channel invasion, which cannot now be far off, will hush the criticism of the military leaders. But, for the present, the advocates of the military as against the political leaders on the direction of grand strategy have their day in court. They can well point to the experience of the last war, which certainly was a military success. In that war, President Wilson from the first claimed no knowledge of military strategy. He entrusted the entire command of the armies in the field to Gen. John J. Pershing, whose decisions he backed wholeheartedly. At no time did President Wilson presume to tell Pershing where or how American forces should fight. With this free hand, Pershing was able to work in conjunction with Haig and Foch for the final destruction of German military power and the victorious end to World War No. 1.

Will similar results come from a contrary policy—the political conduct of the military strategy of World War No. 2?

Pass the G. I. Bill Promptly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following excerpt from an editorial which appeared in the Boston Evening American of March 27, 1944:

PASS THE G. I. BILL PROMPTLY

The United States Senate has passed the G. I. bill of rights without a dissenting vote.

No other action by the Senate could be more pleasing or heartening to the millions of Americans in the armed services.

It is assurance that the sacrifices of those who are bearing the brunt of this war are appreciated by the grateful people back home.

And it is a pledge that the shameful mistreatment of the veterans of the First World War will not be repeated after this conflict.

The G. I. bill of rights now goes to the House of Representatives and there it should be received with the same enthusiasm and absence of opposition.

What is equally important, it should be passed by the House immediately.

Commander Atherton, of the American Legion, convincingly explains the need of quick action when he says:

"The post-war period is here for more than a million men and women who have been discharged from the services.

"Many of them require hospitalization and facilities additional to those they now have. Many of them require education which is not yet provided. Many will require jobs, unemployment compensation, homes, and other opportunities not now available.

"For them the G. I. bill of rights forms the one immediate answer.

"It will go a long way toward giving these men a chance to get another start in life.

"The membership of the House of Representatives can win the eternal gratitude of our fighting men and of all their friends and relatives by passing the G. I. bill now, before the Easter recess."

Close-Ups of the News

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio broadcast by Upton Close on March 12, 1944:

To use an old Bible phrase, we are in the Valley of Decision, as this Nation was never in it before. We are in the Valley of Decision in the military shaping of the war itself, in the shaping of the world after the war, and in the matter of preservation of our American system of liberties and freedom of enterprise. Our wars with Germany and Japan have turned out to be neither a hip-hip-hurrah march nor a glory road to a new world order. In both the military campaigning and the political scheming we have encountered cross-currents and surprises and mix-ups. Our first discovery in the Valley of Decision will be whether or not we can decisively defeat our enemies and get clear-cut victories. In both the European and Pacific wars we have pushed back the enemy where he was over-extended—pushed him back into his area of density. We now face the test as to whether we can break him.

Take our European foe first. We drove the German-Italian forces out of Africa and Sicily. But in the tip of Italy, German forces have held us and our Allies. No use to argue whether or not that campaign is justified despite the present stymie and the losses to date. Or to argue about what it was originally intended to accomplish. The thing to examine is results—as of the present. Situation is that it has tied up more ships and materials on our side than on the enemy's, and possibly as much manpower, while at the rate the draft boards are inducting our older men now it is to be assumed that we have no excess of manpower to be intentionally used for such a purpose. Again, the Italy campaign has tied up the British and Italian shipping which was to have been the basis for a push on Japan in the Indian Ocean. Consequently, nothing has been done about Japan in South Asia this season save a penetration of a few miles into the jungle by foot soldiers. The Chinese and Americans of Stilwell have cleared one jungle valley which the new road to China must cross and in the south the British and Indians of Mountbatten have battered the outermost Japanese garrison.

But the Japs will have another half-year of time in which to dig in and build war industries. In a few weeks now the monsoons will begin again, and fighting weather will not return until early autumn.

A further effect of the unlucky Italian campaign is seen in Turkey's position. Either Britain decided that with everything tied up in Italy, it was useless to plan on a campaign through Turkey, or Moscow told Turkey to forget it. Moscow does not want the Anglo-Saxons to become a factor in the Balkans anyway, nor does Moscow want the Turks to invade Bulgaria. The trend of events is that Russia's influence is being extended through the Balkans to Italy, rather than that British-American influence is being extended from Italy into the Balkans. Randolph Churchill's mission to Tito Broz, and the young King Peter's visit to London are British bids to balance Russian influence, but they are made to look petty beside Russia's successful claim to a third of surrendered ships in the Mediterranean, and rumors that Tito will grant the Soviet a naval base on the Adriatic.

So much for the Mediterranean. It appears that the British and we have had our victory there and outreached ourselves, and that no decision is coming out of operations there. The Mediterranean waits on a larger front for its answer. The base for that larger front is Britain. The attack is being pushed by the largest air force in history. Behind it is assembled probably the largest and certainly the strongest ground attacking force in history. We are in the Valley of Decision regarding the air attack. The destruction it wreaks is tremendous. Its own losses, especially in trained men, are tremendous. Such losses cannot be sustained indefinitely. Yet, say air-training officers, they are proving less than were anticipated for this particular purpose, so that air-force training continues to be ever more severe and exclusive, with less rapid promotion offered.

Plans for the millions of armed men assembled in Britain are made and kept by three or four minds in Britain and America, and no one else knows if it is designed that the ground force should go in regardless of whether or not the air attack is successful in paralyzing the enemy. But we are nearing the valley of decision there, too. Crowded Britain cannot be kept continually overcrowded with several million men who do not go into action. If they do go in on a number of beachheads—certainly their numbers make one beachhead out of the question—we should find out as quickly as we found out in Italy whether or not they have triumph or a stalemate.

In the Pacific, too, we are in the valley of decision. We have now pretty well pushed the Japanese back into their area of density. Between their tough outposts and their main ramparts we have apparently struck a curious area of softness—chiefly because it lacks adequate air cover. Japan's planes as well as her ships are being held in reserve, evidently, for the battle in the inner area, which begins, it seems, with Borneo and Saipan. We have a huge fleet that can divide into several task forces able, it seems, to go anywhere and take care of itself—save for fuel. The millions of tons of oil for ships' Diesels and millions of gallons of high-octane gasoline for carrier planes have to be transported in a steady caravan of tankers whose line gets longer as the fleet goes westward, thousands of miles from its base. The Japanese Fleet and its air force await for opportunity for a surprise attack on that line and on fighting ships 3,000 miles from base, just as Admiral Togo back in 1905 waited in the straits between Japan and Korea to pounce on the Russian Fleet that had to sail all the way around Africa because Britain and France had closed the Suez Canal to it. Our Navy is becoming very ponderous and complex at the same time that it becomes large, and many a smaller ship is having to sail with one or two trained career officers, while the great bulk of our seamen is now made up of reserves, enlisted and drafted men. They are, however, doing remarkably well, according to old salts. Their one great danger now is surprise, and they know it.

Soon, now, it should be demonstrated whether the fleet can follow through to Guam, and from Guam to the Philippines, and then establish major striking power in the Philippines.

So much for the military phase. We have pushed both enemies back into their areas of density. We are about to find out whether we can break them there, or whether they have us stopped there. We believe the odds are in our favor, but this must be proved, at increasing cost in life and treasure. That is what happens when a nation goes from talking war into fighting it.

Now for the shaping of the world. Here some decisions are already quite completely made, and made over our heads, regardless of what share we contribute to the fighting and the paying. Most Americans do not like these decisions. One is that European children cannot be fed. Another is that nothing can be done for the Jews, either by way of getting them out of Europe or locating them in a national home. But the big decision is that we are not going to have an international federation of nations at all, or even have regional federations, in which the big and little fellows are going to treat one another as equals. Instead we have competition for spheres of influence, political and economic. We have brutal supernationalism and brazen superimperialism. Britain, through its head, Churchill, declined a scheme of international guaranty of future self-government for India. He refused at Cairo the suggestion for internationalization of the port of Hong Kong. That puts the kibosh on internationalism so far as Asia is concerned. Nothing remains for China but to get what advantage she can out of the fact that Britain wants back some colonial areas from Japan, and America wants to punish Japan for treachery and brutality. Nothing remains for Indians but to wait a turn of the wheel that will enable them to catch their rulers in a yet bigger jam, as the American revolutionists caught George III.

Russia through its head, Stalin, declined the suggestion for future international settlement of the boundaries of Poland. That put the kibosh on internationalism so far as Europe is concerned. Everywhere now, in Asia, in the Mediterranean, in Europe, we have a growing rivalry over spheres of influence. This is the exact opposite of internationalism and makes either simpletons or wicked deceivers out of those men who pictured America's participation in war as the final move needed to establish internationalism. Perhaps stronger and better American statesmanship could have averted such a pathetic and tragic collapse of the idealism which was held out as the purpose of the war. But then, stronger and better British and French statesmanship could have prevented the European war, and just a little American statesmanship and preparation and alertness could have prevented the Pacific war. I know that George Creel makes out in a current Collier's magazine article that our statesmanship had to be so pathetically helpless because of popular apathy and that all Secretary of State Hull could do was to play for time. I would like to challenge my old propaganda chief in the last World War on that statement by pointing out that any statesmanship that wanted to use events such as the sinking of the Panay to get America ready could easily have done so. Instead of that, the incidents that could have been used to warn and prepare America were officially played down. Before that, Gen. Billy Mitchell, pleading for use of W. P. A. money allocated to Alaska to build installations that could be used in need for our hemisphere's defense, was smacked down—and the record shows that the smack came from the White House.

Competition for spheres of influence rather than international federation has now come into the open, even in our own hemisphere. We are witnessing the breaking of South America into two rival spheres of influence, led by Argentina, which is developing under British business leadership, and Brazil, which is becoming a protégé of the United States.

The historian might well sum up what has happened by a just charge that the empire traditionalism of Mr. Churchill, the reliance upon force of Mr. Stalin, and the weakness of Mr. Roosevelt in the face of these two have done more to injure the ideal and practice of internationalism in our century than all the willful Senators who ever fought the Versailles Treaty, or prevented our adherence to the League of Nations. I believe that present prospects bear out such a charge, and that future history will sustain it. To such tragic tatters have come the Atlantic Charter promises of Roosevelt and Churchill and the One World of Wendell Willkie. If you want to know the charges that responsible circles in England are making, read the last few issues of Commander Stephen King-Hall's London News Letter. I wish I had time to quote them.

Now, behind the spheres of influence and endeavoring to use them, again, are the men who consider themselves the revolutionaries and the counterrevolutionaries of what they call the world revolution. To them these present horrible civilization-destroying and race-hate-rousing wars are merely steps in the world revolution and counterrevolution. The revolutionaries warn us that the counterrevolutionaries are throwing American and British force behind every reactionary element from France to China, and that it will one day be supporting the Mikado and German Junkers. The counterrevolutionaries warn us that the revolutionaries are truly planning a sort of internationalism—an international socialism in theory and world sovietism in power—which would mean a world despotism.

Is it not time for Americans seriously to set up leaders with plans to take us out of this world brawl of ideologies and greeds and power lusts and plots which is about to tear our Government down and tear our Nation into classes and tear our wealth into shreds? Here again we are in the valley of decision. If the people may know, the people will decide.

Continuance of Lend-Lease Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1944.

Hon. NORRIS POULSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. POULSON: Confirming our telephone conversation, will you be so kind as to make a statement for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the effect that due to Mr. KING'S absence from the House on official business as a member of the board of visitors to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, he was unable to be present in person to vote in favor of the continuance of the Lend-Lease Act; however, he was officially paired in favor of its continuance.

Thanking you, I am,
Very sincerely yours,
JULIE PUMMER,
Secretary to Cecil R. King, Member of Congress.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, a servant girl quit her job because she could not pay her income tax.

The O. W. I. Victory magazine is a sell-out every month in Spain and Rumania.

A Republican President for next January would change a lot of planning for the world.

No minority Member has presided over the House, even in the Committee of the Whole, in 14 long years.

The O. W. I. must feel that psychological warfare has sold itself to Congress because they are asking for a tremendous increase.

Years ago we carried the Chicago Tribune at 5 a. m. in the winter, sometimes in deep snow. Now, after 40 years, it thrills me.

The best evidence that education in northeast Kansas wants no threat of Federal control is that consolidation in 30 years there never took root.

The advocates of lend-lease said it would keep us out of war and therefore we could afford it. Now we are supporting a fighting Army and Navy around the world.

Evidently Mrs. Roosevelt has seen the light, or has felt the impact from the ether waves, for tonight she comes down to earth and brags on the voting railroads.

If Governor Warren can keynote in the HIRAM JOHNSON way of 30 years ago, he will stake down party victory. HIRAM has been the pile driver of the last half century.

JOE MARTIN is just as sure to preside over the next Congress as Speaker as he is to be the permanent chairman of the national convention, and he has been asked to do that.

"Nothing" next week in the House, largely because of the Pennsylvania primary—Indiana primary the next week, and still others the succeeding weeks. Say, Mr. MCCORMACK, where do we go from our Chicago convention, east or west?

The people who were holding back their political exercise for the Republican National Convention may have missed it. Oftentimes the hothouse plants cannot stand the outdoor spring primaries. Possibly the second convention in the Windy City will prove to be more interesting.

Thomas Jefferson, a Great American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address on the subject Thomas Jefferson, a Great American, delivered by the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, before the Virginia State Society, at Washington, D. C., on April 13, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When Colonel Halsey invited me to join you in observing the birthday of Thomas Jefferson, he said he would like to know what would be said to Virginians about Jefferson by a Yankee—with the usual prefix. This was a challenge no Yankee could decline with honor.

I can say that it was New Yorkers, under the leadership of his great rival, Alexander Hamilton, who broke the deadlocked election of 1800 and made Mr. Jefferson President. They could choose between Aaron Burr, a fellow New Yorker, about whose character they had doubts, and the Virginian, to whom they were opposed politically, but whose character they respected. So they threw their support to the forthright Virginian. We still take great pride in that act. Never before, nor since, have a man's adversaries purposely elected him President. Other Presidents have had some help from their enemies, but it was not intentional.

It was the high character of the man that captivated even his rivals and left an imperishable impression on American history. He was pitted against the severest competition. Not only did able men from the North, such as Hamilton, Franklin, and Adams—measure their talents against his, but Virginia itself provided such contemporaries as Washington, Madison, Mason, Henry, Monroe, and many others in whose company it would be hard for any man to distinguish himself. However, we appreciate the true stature of Jefferson the more when we stand him beside the other strong men of his time.

We must not yield to the temptation to deal with Jefferson merely by labels or to oversimplify his contribution to our country. His mind was one of the most comprehensive and complex in our annals. His experience touched American life in every possible aspect.

We all learned in school about Jefferson the statesman; author of the Declaration of Independence, our first Secretary of State, and the third President of the young Republic. Although preeminently a man of peace, as commander in chief he sent the American Navy to the coasts of north Africa to clean out the pirates who were preying upon our commerce. He saw that even in his day the world could be made safe for peaceful pursuits only if someone took the burden of destroying the parasites who would live by violence and oppression of others. Older nations had bought their peace with the pirates. By standing up and refusing to pay tribute to lawlessness, Mr. Jefferson won world-wide respect for our flag and brought a new security into the commerce of the world.

At home he was the author of so many reforms that his election was called "the revolution of 1800," especially by those who did not like it. We know him also as the author of a great variety of state papers ranging from the Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom to the Kentucky Resolutions. He was the master of the executive department of the Government for many critical years. He powerfully influenced the legislative department also. As Vice President he presided over the Senate and he wrote the Parliamentary Manual which still guides congressional procedures. And he did not neglect the judicial department. He expressed positive and not entirely complimentary views about the Supreme Court of his day. He advised that every justice write his own separate judgment in every case. To join in a single opinion, he thought, lessened the sense of individual responsibility. At least in this respect his ideas have gained ground in the Court. We could also speak at length of his influence on foreign policy, both in his own and later days; and his services as a diplomat, so helpful to the cause of the Colonies during the Revolution and to the young Republic in gaining recognition.

Jefferson was a brilliant man, to be sure, but he also brought to the Presidency experience—experience in national and in foreign affairs which made him sure-footed when it was necessary to lead the country on dangerous paths. Apprenticeship as Vice President and as Secretary of State taught him the pitfalls which an administration must avoid both at home and abroad.

Moreover, Jefferson's public service rested on a most varied experience in the practical affairs of life and a versatile intellectual interest. It was a very shrewd and business-like Mr. Jefferson who made the largest real estate deal in the history of the country; and like many another businessman, he took some chances with the law to get Louisiana Territory for the United States. He was an architect of merit and an inventor of many useful things, as a trip to Monticello demonstrates.

Despite this practical turn of mind he also was among the first philosophers of his day. He dealt with ancient and modern philosophies and religions and discussed confidently what he called the nonsense of Plato. Then there was Jefferson the educator, founder of the University of Virginia, who laid out its campus, designed its beautiful buildings, prescribed its regulations. He foresaw an American language a century before Mencken.

From his books he turned to farming. He was diligent in searching foreign countries for products that would grow in America, introduced many new plants, and was a pioneer in scientific agriculture. He set forth views on scientific subjects such as natural history and survey, studied methods to measure the velocity of rivers and to find the longitude of the place at land without a timekeeper. He wrote about musical vibrations and corresponded with Robert Fulton about the use of submarines for defense—this in 1807. He was also something of an economist, wrote a prospectus on political economy, a plan for reducing the circulating medium, advised standards for weights and measures, for coinage and currency, and had a plan for cheap wine as a substitute for whisky.

Withal he was a human being who loved the society of fellow humans. Essays of his have been preserved on such subjects as conduct and manners and rules of etiquette in Washington.

I have not begun to call the list of subjects that engaged his attention. There is even attributed to him a poem which includes this verse:

"I stole a kiss the other day,
And trust me, nought but truth I say,
The fragrant breath of blooming May
Was not so sweet as Peggy."

So this was Mr. Jefferson—preeminently a civilized man. He touched life from the grass roots of practical existence to the outer reaches of the most abstract philosophy and speculation. But he tested theories by their effects on the lives of men; he never tried to make life over to square with any set of theories. He saw our America as made up of many tongues and many minds and welcomed any contributions these could make to our total national culture. He saw, too, that from disparity of talent and industry and opportunity men would occupy different stations in life. But he thought the country rich enough so that no useful station in life need be a degraded one and, while standards of living would vary to suit taste and circumstance, none need be below the level of dignity and comfort. He loved the charm and peace of the countryside and the individualism and independence of country living. He never mistook bigness for goodness, either in Government or out of it.

Jefferson was the eternal enemy of the totalitarian and authoritarian systems of government of his time. Then they took the form of monarchy. Divine right of a king to rule other men was the fascism of that day. Jefferson rejected utterly the whole basis of dictatorial government. The majestic words of the Declaration of Independence swept throughout the world. For nearly a century and a half the world-wide trend was to do away with arbitrary rulers and to reshape government to make it rest on the consent of the governed, to put it in the hands of the people.

We in our time have witnessed a weird revival of authoritarian government in Europe. It is not under hereditary monarchs but under aggressive adventurers who became self-made dictators. They scorn and ridicule the teachings of Jefferson and in their countries persecute believers in the democracy he founded. They want to exterminate the Jeffersonian teaching from the earth. They know that no man and no people can admire both a Jefferson and a Hitler.

Mr. Jefferson with our young Navy taught the pirate government of Tripoli that democracy is not weakness, that freedom is not decay. It falls to our lot to bring the same lesson home to those who united to attack us. They dared to do so because they think that a free people will be a divided people; that because we govern ourselves no one can force the inconvenience and sacrifice of war upon us and we will not shoulder them ourselves.

The issue comes to just this: whether Mr. Jefferson or Mr. Hitler has sized us up best. The answer is no longer in doubt. Not only Virginians, but Yankees as well, and all our countrymen and lovers of freedom the world over fight today under the banner of Thomas Jefferson. Under it and by reason of it we will shatter to bits this new and ugly authoritarianism. Let us observe this anniversary by dedicating ourselves to the rebirth of the spirit of Thomas Jefferson.

Invasion and the Final Challenge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very challenging editorial entitled "Invasion and the Final Challenge," prepared by the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co. and published in the Washington Post of April 20, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INVASION AND THE FINAL CHALLENGE

The idea that our national security some day would depend upon the successful invasion of continental Europe by our armed forces was inconceivable to the average American but a few short years ago. Yet, today our whole strength is assembled for that very action and for assuring a sound and permanent peace.

America became great without aggression, without tryanny. Our greatness has been achieved without destroying others; ours is a history of unprecedented indlustrial progress, of development of our own resources, and reliance on our own efforts.

Aggression is foreign to American philosophy. Yet, today we find ourselves faced with the choice of destroying or being destroyed. Today we are confronted by the hard fact that the kind of peace which we all so fervently desire can be achieved only by crushing autocracy and by removing the causes of aggression.

We are now engaged in the accomplishment of the first objective. Since Pearl Harbor a complacent, peace-loving America—the largest of the "soft" and "decadent" democracies—has grown strong and tough. Out of the inherent virility of a free people we have molded the mightiest force for invasion and attack that the world has ever seen.

We have reached our peak rates of war production. We are producing as much war equipment as all the rest of the world combined.

History will record our industrial mobilization as a phenomenal achievement.

The battle of production has been won.

The full might of our armed forces and those of our allies unleashed against the Axis war machine will bring eventual victory. Two and a half years of intensive preparation, backed by 168 years of growth as a free nation, have given us superiority over 20 years of painstaking preparation by the totalitarian and militaristic countries with their enslaved peoples.

Every American has contributed toward this powerful offensive. Our manufacturers and business leaders have exerted their fullest efforts. Our industries have mobilized their tremendous resources, tapped to the fullest degree their inventive and productive genius. The men and women in the factories, on the farms, and in the mills and mines have played a magnificent part in the tremendous production program. Citizens all are making their contribution to the armed victory that lies ahead.

We have demonstrated that a free people under a free enterprise economy can unite in a common purpose.

When the war is won, we shall be faced by our second objective—removing the causes of aggression. This is a social challenge. A challenge to those who would sacrifice our democratic way of life for personal gains or foreign ideolcgies.

The best insurance for the continuance of our democracy is a successful democracy. That means a dynamic and not a static democracy. All of us who want to preserve the ideals that have made America—and that includes all but a handful of extremists—must determine to find the policies and programs which will permit us to make the most of the abundance Nature has provided for us.

To achieve this end we must recognize the fact that we are but a wheel in the machinery of world economy. A wheel that must drive or be driven. A wheel that must mesh smoothly with the many other wheels or be stripped of its cogs.

We are the only nation on earth free enough and strong enough to shape the mold of its own destiny. We can be hampered by nothing but our own confusion.

The mind and the heart of all America today brood over the shores of Britain and watch over the narrow waters that wash the beaches of the Continent. And the prayers of all America go with each of those who embark upon that epic passage.

Those of us at home who are producing the fighting tools and who are so earnestly concerned with the problems that will face a post-war America, should see now, even if we may never have seen it before, that all our plans will be worth just exactly what the men and women who make that passage are prepared, competent, and inspired by their leadership to make them worth.

For those men and women are America.

They have gone out from rich homes and poor homes alike, from farms and factories, from schools and churches, from mines and ranches, from offices and studios, to take their places in the battle line. They are a cross-section of the America that is to be.

Whoever may draw the plans for that America, it is those men and women who will make the plans good. Invasion is their first step toward that end. May their work be speedily done, and may our plans be worthy of that work.

JAMES H. MCGRAW, Jr.,
President McGraw-Hill Publishing Co., Inc.

War Bond Purchases by Ninety-ninth Lone Star Battalion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM CONNALLY
OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter I have received from Tom E. Foster, battalion editor of the Ninety-ninth Naval Construction Battalion, and the news article and letter from Vice Admiral W. L. Calhoun referred to in Mr. Foster's letter, all bearing on the highly patriotic record of the Ninety-ninth Naval Construction Battalion in the purchase of War bonds.

There being no objection, the letters and news article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NINTY-NINTH NAVAL CONSTRUCTION BATTALION,
April 15, 1944.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,
United States Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed is a photostatic copy of a letter written April 2, 1944, by Vice Admiral W. L. Calhoun, Commander Service Force United States Pacific Fleet, and a news article released by the Navy's public relations office, which you may have already seen in print.

I believe that you will agree that the Ninety-Ninth Lone Star Battalion's purchase of War bonds is Americanism at its best, and that it deserves a place in the permanent annals of this war as lasting evidence of the spirit of present servicemen. For that reason, and if it is consistent with your policy, perhaps you might have this material inserted in the RECORD.

Provided it is used, I shall appreciate having several proofs or copies.

Thanking you for your cooperation, and with best wishes, I am,

Very truly yours,

TOM E. FOSTER,
BM1c, Battalion Editor, Ninty-Ninth Construction Battalion, Headquarters Company, Fleet Post Office, San Francisco, Calif.

The Ninety-ninth Lone Star Battalion Seabees are doing their bit toward financing their own private war. Leaving nothing to chance, this group of hard-bitten construction warriors have purchased $745,000 of maturity value War bonds as a personal guaranty that they will get the supplies and equipment to continue action against the Japs, and at the same time provide a nest egg for the day when they will return to civilian life.

The total strength of the battalion slightly exceeds 1,000 men and officers. Thus the average amount of bonds owned per man is near $750, which is believed to be a record among Pacific Fleet units of comparable strength.

Commissioned July 5, 1943, the Ninety-ninth has been in the Pacific theater of war for 6 months. The Battalion has five detachments scattered over the Pacific building vitally needed advance bases for other branches of the service. The command has the singular distinction of being the only Seabee battalion ever sponsored and adopted by a States. Gov. Coke R. Stevenson, of Texas, bestowed the name "Lone Star" on the battalion by proclamation and authorized it to carry the State flag. The Lone Star flag flies daily with the national ensign over the main Ninety-ninth station.

This outfit, whose personnel includes a large section of Texans, was referred to recently by Admiral Chester W. Nimitz when he facetiously remarked, "It is rumored that they contemplate building a tunnel under the Pacific to Tokyo in order to be closer to the shooting." Lone Star men are typical of the legions of construction workers who comprise the rank and file of Seabee battalions; there are powder monkeys who blasted the bowels of the earth away beneath the Hudson River; lumberjacks from the great Northwest; cement finishers from Boulder; welders and steel workers from the Nation's shipyards; bulldozer and patrol operators, roustabouts, riggers, and tool pushers from the oil fields of the Southwest.

Practically every member of the Ninety-ninth volunteered for service; a large majority of them are married; many are fathers and even grandfathers. A liberal sprinkling of veterans of World War No. 1 are in the battalion. There are no millionaires in the unit to balloon the purchase of bonds and the certificates are fairly evenly distributed among the personnel of officers and men.

Comdr. R. R. Cook, officer in charge of the battalion, early instituted a planned educational program urging his command to save by investing in War bonds, and when final results of the battalion's Fourth War Loan drive was made known he said, "I am happy to know that Ninety-ninth men are wisely providing for their future security instead of waiting for any manner of dole."

Vice Admiral W. L. Calhoun, commander, Service Force, United States Pacific Fleet, has commended Commander Cook and the Ninety-ninth Seabees for their War bond purchases stating, "that you and your men now own approximately $745,000 maturity value of War bonds is a spectacular accumulation of post-war purchasing power. These results are a tribute to the realistic and forehanded manner in which the personnel are preparing for future financial security."

COMMANDER, SERVICE FORCE, UNITED STATES PACIFIC FLEET,
April 2, 1944.

From: Commander, Service Force, United States Pacific Fleet.

To: Commanding Officer, Ninety-ninth Naval Construction Battalion.

Subject: War bond allotment program—report of.

Reference: (a) Final report of results—form BAR-3, dated February 14, 1944.

1. The report of the War bond promotional program of your command has come to my attention.

2. The fact that a large number of the men are saving regularly through War bond allotments is gratifying. That you and your men now own approximately $745,000 maturity value of War bonds is a spectacular accumulation of post-war purchasing power. These results are a tribute to the realistic and forehanded manner in which the personnel are preparing for future financial security.

3. The Commander, Service Force, United States Pacific Fleet, desires to commend you and Lt. C. F. Wittenberg, C. E. C., United States Naval Reserve, for another job well done. May this splendid record be maintained in the months to come.

W. L. CALHOUN.

Lincoln's Peace and Ours

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Lincoln's Peace and Ours," published in the Illinois State Register of April 13, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"LINCOLN'S PEACE AND OURS"

Second only to the problem of war is the problem of peace. The time is ripe for a great educational campaign. Rabble-rousing politicians desecrate this great issue which is so close to the church, the home, the school, and the welfare of future generations.

Dr. William E. Baringer, executive secretary of the Abraham Lincoln Association, discussed this problem before the Springfield Lions Club this week, taking as his subject the above caption. He pointed out that the task of establishing a just, permanent peace is more difficult than waging a successful war. He drew a deadly parallel between the peace which President Lincoln sought to establish and the peace which President Woodrow Wilson sought to insure. The same may well apply to the peace which President Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, and other Allied leaders are planning to establish.

We agree with Dr. Baringer that "the citizens, guiding their government, must be the experts in peacemaking. They can make it, or break it." It was public misunderstanding which sustained Congress in destroying the Wilson plan of peace following the First World War. As was so pertinently pointed out by Dr. Baringer, our own Lincoln planned a comprehensive, lenient, permanent peace with the conquered South. Leaders of Lincoln's party in Congress did not agree with him. They wanted a peace which would create a Republican South, and a battle between the President and Congress loomed. Meanwhile Lincoln was assassinated. His plan, adopted by President Johnson, was defeated in toto by Congress, which proceeded to make its own peace. The Army was put in control in the South, assigned to the task of building Republican State governments which lasted only as long as bayonets held them up.

When the Army was withdrawn (1870–77), as Dr. Baringer pointed out, "southern Democrats systematically prevented the Negroes from voting and resumed control. The solid South became a political reality. The selfish peace of Congress produced exactly the opposite of its intended object."

It is to draw the White House and Congress into close cooperation that Secretary Hull advocates the naming of Senate and House bipartisan committees to cooperate in working out a peace plan to avoid a repetition of what happened when President Wilson's plan collapsed.

In the opinion of the State Register it is vitally important that all citizens weigh and act upon this vital problem free from political prejudice. It is infinitely important. It deals with the flesh and blood of future generations—with our children and our children's children. Dr. Baringer touched the very nerve center of this problem when he said:

"If American citizens are sensitive to the lessons of history, able to learn from the mistakes of the past, they can make their victory in the present struggle something of permanent value." He adds that "hundreds of billions of dollars, tens of thousands of lives, will have been spent for defensive purposes only, if we lose the peace. To make the huge war expenditures something of long-term, permanent, creative value, we can require our Government to construct the kind of peace Lincoln and Wilson wanted—generous, lenient, lasting."

And we might add, the kind of peace which President Roosevelt, Secretary Hull, and our leaders in this greatest of all wars advocate on exactly that same basis.

America's Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials by Mr. John W. Owens, editorial writer and political editor of the Baltimore Sun, which were published in the issues of the Sun of April 12 and April 14, 1944, respectively. The editorials are interesting, timely, and convincing.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of April 12, 1944]

THE LAG ON RUSSIA

(By John W. Owens)

Much of Mr. Hull's trouble is caused by the failure of a segment of the American people quite voluble, to make mental adjustment to modern Russia.

As to industrial organization and military organization, we are far past the aloof skepticism of '40, '41, and '42. And most of us have made beginnings in realization of the political power in world affairs that flows to Russia from her achievements. But still in our midst are elements which lag in mental adjustment to Russia's political power. They see with everyone else that Russia has been ravaged in hundreds of thousands of square miles. They see that millions of her civilians and soldiers have died at the hands of her enemy. They see that, having endured all of this horror, she is today driving from her soil the last of the greatest war machine of history. They see all of this destruction followed by all of this achievement. And yet they think that at the peace table the Russians should bow to the British and Americans and ask, "Gentlemen, where do you wish us to sit?" Since Russia gives no faintest shadow of any such deferential attitude, these mentally lagging elements live in a fever of apprehension and excitement.

Their condition may be illustrated by reference to Germany and Italy. The apprehensive and excited gentlemen shiver at sight of the westerly march of the Russian armies. The troops which occupy Berlin will enable their statesmen to exert profound influence on the course of post-war settlements. Therefore something must be done by the United States and Britain to slow the Russian march and to hasten Anglo-American arrival in Berlin. Military dominance in Germany is of first importance. But in Italy the Anglo-American armies are in control of occupied areas and will control these areas as they are expanded. And, lo and behold, military dominance in a conquered country now offers little security. Mr. Stalin sees fit to recognize the stopgap government headed by an old, simple soldier, and instantly the uproar in this country is terrific. Among the apprehensive and excited gentlemen a single Russian representative in Italy causes as much noise as the prospect of great Russian armies in Germany.

Again Russia has got out of hand.

Nothing would be easier than to toy with these brethren. They are afraid of everything that Russia does or will do, and yet they dare offer no concrete proposals against her.

But toying with the apprehensive and excited gentlemen is not enough. They are chiefly responsible for introducing turmoil, rather than deliberation, into popular consideration of our foreign relations. They are the people who are chiefly responsible for forcing Mr. Hull into repeated demonstrations that we do, in fact, have a foreign policy. In his last demonstration on Sunday night he seems to have won approval of the policies he has been following. Some of those who gave their approval doubted that the State Department pursues its policies with the vigor that is required. For example, one gentleman in Washington wishes faster reorganization of the political structure in Italy and refused to accept Mr. Hull's decision to heed in this matter the judgment of the military commanders on the spot. But allowing for the mistakes that Mr. Hull may be expected to make in deciding between the opinions of generals on the spot and gentlemen in Washington, the prevailing opinion is that the Secretary did very well. Yet, judging by the record, within a few weeks Mr. Hull will be called upon for another demonstration.

The elements which suffer the mental lag will soon be in full cry again, vaguely, but vociferously, insisting that something must be done and declaring that we have no foreign policy unless something is done. In this uproar the voices of the old isolationists will be loud. Among the minority of critics of Mr. Hull's statement was Representative FISH, who found that Mr. Hull's policy consisted entirely in "appeasing" Russia. Mr. FISH did not go further, but one gathers that Mr. FISH thinks Mr. Hull should defy Russia n complicated issues at the moment she is defeating Hitler's legions and the Anglo-Americans are preparing to invade the west. Senator NYE also is prepared for action. His statement on the Hull speech showed that he is set to quiver gloriously on a moment's notice over violations of the Atlantic Charter.

The American public ought to measure these uproars. We can, of course, let the people who suffer the mental lag influence and ultimately determine our policies. We can refuse to adjust our minds to the power that Russia has won. We can go on and assume that, if accepted as a giant, she will be our enemy in post-war Germany. We can make the most of argument over the eastern boundaries, refusing to remember that these boundaries have been in dispute for hundreds of years and refusing to listen to Russia's claims that she was a victim in these disputes after the last war. We can refuse to sense the emotions of a people who have been dreadfully tortured and now insist upon protection. We can do all of this, rather than follow Mr. Hull's principles and his work in applying those principles in friendly discussion, rather than in lectures and defiances. But if we do follow the excited men who cry that something must be done, we should make up our minds that the world of the next generation will be divided into two great camps, in one of which a resentful, distrustful Russia will be leader. Such division of the nations may be the world's destiny, but we should not ask for it in our present handling of delicate foreign relations.

[From the Baltimore Sun of April 14, 1944]

ON THE LOOSE AGAIN

(By John W. Owens)

The don't-haul-down-the-flaggers are regaining their nerve.

Most of the time, since 1940, they have been inconspicuous. When France fell in the early summer of that year and the chances seemed to be that Britain would follow—with the British Fleet going into German hands or going under the waves—one could talk in this country about the value of international cooperation and scarcely a word would be said by anybody about hauling down the Stars and Stripes. In 1941, when Russia was reeling under Hitler's blows and Japan decided that the hour had come to join her ally by treacherously attacking the United States in the Pacific, talk about the value of international cooperation caused no more than a whisper that the Stars and Stripes would be endangered. In 1942, when Hitler boasted that he was prepared to give the knock-out blow to Russia and Japan was racing from conquest to conquest in the Pacific, some of the most ardent of the old-time don't-haul-down-the-flaggers were declaring themselves in favor of an international police force—assuming that the Nazis and the Japs gave civilization an opportunity to establish one. Even in 1943, when the tide began to turn, the remaining don't-haul-down-the-flaggers were almost breathless.

But now things are different. We know we shall win the war. The Russians—who have supplanted the British as the foreign ogre in the eyes of many of the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers—first stopped Hitler dead in his tracks and then turned on him with such continuous success that the third anniversary of his invasion of Russian soil may see Marshal Stalin's armies fairly well on their way to German soil. We, for our part, have placed immense armies in Europe and have set up in Britain an air force that is helping to tear German industry to pieces in preparation for Anglo-American invasion from the west. The price still to be paid for victory in Europe is high. But we know we have the resources with which to pay. And in the Pacific, the Japanese race of conquest has been halted and reversed in some of the most brilliant exploits in our history. There, too, we know victory to be assured. So now the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers are sitting up again and talking bravely in Congress and elsewhere. They feel more like themselves.

The primaries in the Middle West have accelerated the rise in their spirits. Politicians all over the country have placed those primaries under microscopes to determine the forces that are at play and a variety of judgments have been offered. But the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers have decided for themselves and proclaim to the world that it's a beautiful morning, a beautiful day, and everything's going their way.

They have some reason for encouragement. Racial influences are at work, especially in the Middle West. Mr. Lawrence C. Eklund, of the Milwaukee Journal, in analyzing the Wisconsin returns, said that to conclude that the State is largely isolationist would be a mistake, but he found that Mr. Willkie, the leading Republican exponent of international cooperation, had done himself no good in German-vote counties by telling of his support of lease-lend to Britain. The Polish voters, running into very large numbers, are being cultivated because no assurance is given them that something will be done to belabor Russia. Among the Irish are elements which resent our present ties with Britain, and especially resent the efforts to persuade the de Valera Government to dismiss German and Japanese agents.

All of this, in its actual or potential effects in the voting, contributes greatly to revival of the ardor of the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers. And they also see rosy prospects in the possibility of converting war weariness—irritations over taxes, wage controls, price controls, rationing systems—into a general revolt against prevailing war aims which will reach such proportions as blindly to include international cooperation.

They may grow in strength. They may threaten the stability of any policy of international cooperation—and no policy will have value unless it is one of long-term stability.

To many intelligent Americans a second triumph of the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers will seem incredible. Twenty-five years ago the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers triumphed in the Republican party, though such figures of that party as Elihu Root, William Howard Taft, Charles E. Hughes, Herbert Hoover, A. Lawrence Lowell and Nicholas Murray Butler favored the League of Nations, some without reservations and some with mild reservations. Having triumphed in the Republican Party, the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers extended their triumphs to the Nation. Results: First, violent economic nationalism which contributed to the worst depression in American history; second, violent political nationalism which facilitated the worst war in American history, involving expenditure of blood and treasure beyond the weirdest imagination of the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers when they were scaring the people in the campaign against the League of Nations. One would suppose that this fatal experience with the don't-haul-down-the-flaggers would be enough.

But the fact is that these protectors of the Stars and Stripes are coming out of seclusion, in fine fettle, and at the moment are definitely on the offensive.

School-Lunch Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting article on the school-lunch program which appeared in the April 1944 issue of McCall's magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As part of our food program, Congress has approved a maximum expenditure of $50,000,000 of Federal funds for school-lunch programs.

No single set plan is suggested. The more nearly self-supporting the effort can be, the better. The Federal funds available are probably not adequate to grant aid to all schools that need a lunch program and may request Federal help. Whenever possible, schools should follow the example of Columbia, Mo., and require payments from those children who can afford it, to cover part of the cost of the lunch.

Any public and nonprofit private school or child-care center will be considered eligible, provided Federal assistance is necessary to operate an adequate program serving nutritious lunches to all children.

Schools will receive a specified amount per child per meal, depending on the type of lunch served. Children unable to pay must be served without charge, and there must be no distinction between paying and nonpaying children.

Foods are purchased by the sponsor locally, through the regular channels of trade. Records are kept and the War Food Administration reimburses the sponsor.

How can a hungry child study? How can he stay well enough to turn up at school every day when his growing body is not getting the good food it needs?

The answer is easy. He can't. It hasn't been quite so easy, however, to work out a plan whereby hungry children the country over can count on at least one nourishing meal each day.

Such a plan has been perfected and Congress has voted $50,000,000 to defray part of the food costs of school lunch programs which measure up to certain definite standards. If your child's school does not serve a midday lunch, I believe it may be your duty as a parent and a citizen to see if a school lunch program can be set up.

Who are the hungry ones? Are they only the children from homes where there is not money to buy enough food? Is it actually possible for a child from a home like yours to be undernourished?

Emotional difficulties are just as likely to hit children in high-income homes as in those of the really poor. And often such upsets are the cause for poor eating at breakfast time. Worrying over homework, fretting for fear of being tardy, these or other causes for nervous tension can keep a child from eating an adequate breakfast. His lunch, which should in most cases be the big meal of the day, is vitally important.

In Columbia, Mo., children of all income levels share the same nourishing hot school lunch. Those who can afford it pay a small sum; others are fed free of charge. No one except the school principal knows which children belong to the paying, and which to the nonpaying, group.

Who starts a school-lunch program? Does the Government send someone from Washington to do the planning and see that the food is properly prepared?

People like you start school-lunch programs. People who love children and want to see them get a chance to grow up with strong bodies and good minds. People who are willing to pitch in and work to give the youngsters a chance.

In Columbia, a mother who was president of the Parent-Teachers Association in her child's school started the program with the help of the school principal. Later, the city council, men's clubs, and other local organizations lent a hand. The Government served in an advisory capacity through local War Food Administration representatives.

Isolationists, Nationalists, and Internationalists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Strange Words; Queer Bedfellows" published in the Iron Age of April 20, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRANGE WORDS: QUEER BEDFELLOWS

One of the advantages (or is it?) of being an engineer is that the words you use in your business have definite and well understood meanings. Thus when you speak of the cosine of an angle, or of an S. A. E. steel of a certain number or of so many kilowatts per hour, the people who talk the same language know exactly what you mean.

The disadvantage, if any, of such exact expression of thought is that you cannot do much finagling with it. You have to know what you mean when you say it, and you cannot twist the meaning later to mean something quite different.

In spite of this disadvantage and the burden it would impose of thinking twice or perhaps three times before speaking, I think it would be of great public benefit if statesmen and politicians were compelled to define clearly the terms that they use. As it is now, we are obliged to define them chiefly by knowing who says them and even then they don't stay put.

Take, for example, the terms "isolationist," "nationalist" and "internationalist." The common acceptance of an isolationist has become that of any guy who doesn't like the New Deal and has guts enough to say so. But as a matter of fact, the chief New Dealer was himself a professed isolationist when he was reelected for a third term on the promise to keep us out of war and that no American soldier would be called upon to fight on foreign soil.

Skipping the term "nationalist" for the moment, because we don't hear much about it now in this country, let's discuss that puzzling noun "internationalist." If you know what it means, you are indeed a better man than I, for I do not. I don't know whether an internationalist is one who puts the interests and welfare of all men and all nations on a par or whether he has mental reservations concerning enemy nations and so-called neutrals. And sometimes I am led to believe that an American internationalist is a person who favors the welfare of some other country more than he does his own. At least that's the impression that some of our leading American internationalists give me.

And now for that forgotten American, the nationalist. A nationalist is not an isolationist. Mr. Churchill is no isolationist but he stamped himself indelibly as a nationalist when he said that he would not preside over the obsequies of the British Empire. Mr. Stalin is a nationalist of the first order in that regardless of what his allies or his enemies do or do not do, he is for the survival and the welfare of the U. S. S. R., first, last, and always, which is as it should be.

Nationalism does not mean that you do not wish to give your neighbors a helping hand when they need it, and if you can afford it. It simply means putting first things first, your own country included.

Internationalism as it is preached in America is an expensive practice which invokes opening the safe to all comers. Only a rich nation can afford it and then not for long. Mr. Willkie's sad experience in Wisconsin is an indication that Americans are getting fed up with it.

J. H. VAN DEVENTER.

The Tennessee Valley Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address on the subject The Tennessee Valley Authority, which I made in Knoxville, Tenn., on Friday, April 14, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Knoxville Journal of April 16, 1944]

MCKELLAR SCORES LILIENTHAL'S DOMINATION—SEEKS ONLY TO FREE T. V. A.

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Below is the text of a speech broadcast here Friday night by Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR in review of his record in connection with T. V. A., from the time of construction of Wilson Dam down through the current controversy between himself and T. V. A. Chairman David Lilienthal.

The reader's attention is called to an editorial dealing with the subject on today's editorial page. The controversy referred to is a matter of public interest, not because of the personalities but because of the principles of government involved.—Knoxville Journal.)

I want to give to the public a short history of the building of the dams on the Tennessee River. I shall not give hearsay; I shall not give daydreams; I shall give the facts from my own experience and knowledge and backed up by the records in Washington. I have had two experts at work for the last 2 weeks obtaining the exact facts and verifying the history of this great project.

I have been led to do so because of the many false publications recently made in my own State and elsewhere that I am an enemy of the T. V. A. and opposed to the whole project. A more deliberately false statement could not be made, as will be shown by the history I shall give, backed up by the records in Washington.

In 1916 I was a Member of the House of Representatives; I had already been nominated for the Senate by the Democrats of Tennessee but I had not at that time been elected, and was still serving in the House. I was born in Alabama and the great falls at Muscle Shoals always intrigued me. When I went to Congress I was one of the many who felt that those falls could be made useful to navigation, to manufacturing, to business, and to agriculture. My opportunity came in 1916 when President Wilson came before the Congress requesting a national defense act. It was not long after the sinking of the Lusitania and probably the majority of the people felt that war must come, and soon. The President recommended large preparations. I was the second man on the Military Affairs Committee of the House. Mr. James Hay, of Virginia, was chairman, Mr. Hubert Dent, of Alabama, was first man and I was second man on the committee. The defense bill came before our committee and we promptly got to work on it. Mr. Dent joined me in recommending that a dam be built at Muscle Shoals in an amendment which we offered in committee providing for the building of a dam to manufacture war materials in time of war and fertilizer in time of peace. Mr. Hay was at first against us but he liked us both and he let it go in. When the bill reached the House Mr. John C. McKenzie, of Chicago, vigorously opposed the provision and it was defeated by a very small majority. The bill then went to the Senate and Senator SMITH, of South Carolina, introduced a similar amendment and it was adopted. Thus the matter was thrown in conference and the conferees adopted a compromise and it became the law.

WORKED ON BILL

The amendment was the work of Senator SMITH, of South Carolina, Mr. Dent, and myself, and I believe I was the most active of the three, but Senator SMITH the most powerful. The War Department at once began building of the dam at Muscle Shoals and when Mr. Wilson went out of office in 1921 the dam was substantially completed, although it required a million or two dollars, as I recall the amount, to finish it. I haven't talked to Senator SMITH about it, but I am sure he would say I had as much to do with that amendment building the Wilson Dam as any other human being. I find where Senator Norris did vote for the Smith amendment, but he had nothing further to do with it. He was in the Senate at that time.

This Muscle Shoals Dam was not completed in 1921 when President Wilson went out of office and I recall distinctly, verified by investigation, that Senator Smoot, a member of the Appropriations Committee, announced openly that he was opposed to furnishing any more money to finish that dam. He was opposed to sending good money after bad money. I earnestly took the other side of the question; the dam was nearly complete and in the meantime the Alabama Power Co. was earnestly seeking to take over the plant from the Government, Senator Underwood tremendously favored the Alabama Power Co. taking over the dam and I was just as strong on the other side, and doing everything I could to prevent them from taking it over. It was not long after this when Henry Ford made his offer to pay a considerable sum for this dam site, $8,000,000 if I remember correctly, and Mr. Ford's offer galvanized the Muscle Shoals site into life again. From the beginning of the Wilson Dam it was turned over by the administration then in power, to the Alabama Power Co. for what seemed to be a nominal sum as rent and it remained in the hands of the company until after Mr. Roosevelt was elected President.

INTRODUCED FIRST BILL

During the Coolidge and Hoover administrations a number of Senators introduced bills to complete the building of dams along the Tennessee River, the following Senators: McKellar, Norris, Tyson, Heflin, Sackett, and Harrison. I am advised that I introduced the first one in 1927. Senator Norris and the other gentlemen filed later bills. At that time Senator Norris was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, to which all these bills were referred and naturally perhaps, Senator Norris' bill was taken up, hearings were held on it, and the bill was reported out.

In this bill there was no provision for the payment of 5 percent of the gross receipts for power and fertilizer into the treasuries of the States of Tennessee and Alabama in lieu of taxes and I insisted that provision ought to go in. Norris opposed it and it did not go in and I held his bill up for quite a while, hoping to get it in and I was told by the majority leader, Charlie Curtis, of Kansas, he would guarantee the President would veto the bill. Mr. Coolidge did veto the Norris bill and there this development remained until 1933. During all of that time it was rented, as I said before, by the several administrations to the Alabama Power Co. for a nominal sum.

Now Mr. Roosevelt in his campaign had announced for the improvement of these dams on the Tennessee River. After he was elected and before he took his seat in 1933 he announced he was going to Muscle Shoals to look at the property and he invited a number of Senators and Congressmen to go along. I recall the most of them because I have a picture of the group. Senators Bankhead and Black, of Alabama, Senator Hull and myself, of Tennessee, Senator Norris, of Nebraska, and Senator Dill, of Washington, who had large power sites in his State. We saw the property and after we started back, as I recall, the President announced that he had a proposed name for the project, that he had several commissions in New York that he had named "authority," like the New York Waterway Authority, and he said he wanted to name this commission the Tennessee Valley Authority. That met the approval of everyone present. He then stated to my very great surprise, and I supposed to most of the others, that he had selected Senator Norris to introduce the bill to authorize the building of the Tennessee River dams.

AIDED STATES TO GET FUNDS

Naturally I supposed that he would select one of the Alabama Senators or one of the Tennessee Senators. Senator Norris had left the Republican Party 2 years before and had joined in the election of President Roosevelt. I realized instantly, however, that we could get nowhere without Mr. Roosevelt's concurrence, and that it was not an important thing as to who introduced the bill authorizing the dams, and we acquiesced in that procedure.

Senator Norris introduced the bill and I finally got my amendment for 5 percent of the gross receipts to go into the treasuries of Tennessee and Alabama, and the bill passed.

Now, gentlemen, it may seem peculiar to the uninitiated and to the dreamers, but it is a fact just the same that authority to build dams is but a small part of the dam-building operation. Perhaps 90 percent of the operation is getting the money. I was at that time on the Appropriations Committee and I got the money with which to build every dam that was built on the Tennessee River and its tributaries and the records of the Senate show it.

The first $75,000,000 was appropriated as follows:

"June 16, 1933. (Public, No. 77, 73d Cong.) Fourth Deficiency Act, approved June 16, 1933, carried an appropriation of $3,300,000,000 for N. I. R. A., of which $50,000,000 was allocated to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

"June 19, 1934. (Public, No. 412, 73d Cong.) Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933, carried an appropriation of $899,675,000 for carrying out a number of acts, including the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. Of that sum, $25,000,000 was allocated to the T. V. A."

Out of these two sums the money was used on the Wilson, the Norris and the Wheeler Dams.

At this point I should say or before, Dr. A. E. Morgan and Lilienthal announced that they were not in favor of competing with the private power companies and that they would build no more dams. The private power companies were very strong at that time. The Alabama Power Co. was especially strong a it had been for many years and so was the Commonwealth Southern. Morgan and Lilienthal said that they wanted to establish a yardstick to show the private power companies at what price they could afford to sell power to consumers. Such a policy seemed to me to be nothing but daydreaming. Imagine great power companies like the Alabama Power Co. and the Commonwealth Southern, of which Mr. Willkie was later the leading figure, even considering such a yardstick. And it was at this time the T. V. A. announced it was not going to build any more dams. The T. V. A. did not recommend any more dams to the President and the President did not recommend any more dams to the House and the House did not pass any provisions for any more dams. But in 1935 in the second provision of the bill there was an item as follows:

ASKED MORE DAMS

"August 12, 1935 (Public, No. 260, 74th Congress): Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, carried the first direct appropriation for T. V. A. amounting to $36,000,000."

When that bill got to the Senate I knew it was necessary to force the T. V. A. to build these dams and thereupon I put the following provisions in the law. I am not quoting from the expert who examined the Senate amendment put in each and every one of the bills hereafter mentioned. I quote the provisions of the law as they are now on the statute books.

The bill as it passed the House made no reference to any dams. The Senate subcommittee made the following amendment relative to T. V. A.:

"The continued construction of Norris Dam, Wheeler Dam, Pickwick Landing Dam, and the beginning of construction on a dam at or near Guntersville, Ala., and a dam at or near Chickamauga Creek, both on the Tennessee River, and a dam on the Hiwassee River, a tributary of the Tennessee River, at or near Fowlers Bend, and the continuation of preliminary investigations as to the location and desirability of a dam at or near Aurora Landing, a dam at or near Whites Creek." This amendment was approved by the full committee and by the Senate, and finally enacted into law.

June 22, 1936 (Public, 739, 74th Cong.): The First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936, carried an appropriation of $39,900,000. When this bill came to the Senate, the subcommittee added "the construction of a dam at or near Gilbertsville, Ky., and a dam at or near Watts Bar."

AMENDMENT APPROVED

This amendment was approved by the full committee and the Senate, but was lost in conference.

May 28, 1937 (Public, 121, 75th Cong.): The Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1937, carried an appropriation of $40,166,270. When the bill reached the Senate the subcommittee inserted the following amendment:

"And for the construction of a dam at or near Gilbertsville, Ky., and for preliminary investigations of sites for dams at or near Watts Bar and at or near Coulter's Site on the Tennessee River, Tenn."

This amendment was approved by the full committee, passed the Senate, and was enacted into law.

May 23, 1938 (Public Law 534, 75th Cong.): The Independent Offices Appropriation for 1939 carried an appropriation of $40,000,000. The bill as it came to the Senate from the House made no reference to the construction of the Gilbertsville, Ky., dam. An amendment was offered in the subcommittee as follows: "and for the construction of a dam at or near Gilbertsville, Ky."

That amendment was approved by the full committee and by the Senate, and was enacted into law.

March 16 (Public Law 8, 76th Cong.): The Independent Offices Appropriation Act for 1940 carried an appropriation of $39,003,000. The bill as it came to the Senate from the House made no reference to Gilbertsville, Ky., or Watts Bar dams. An amendment was offered in the subcommittee as follows:

"Continued construction of Gilbertsville Dam, and for construction of a dam at or near Watts Bar on the Tennessee River, Tenn., and for preliminary investigations of a site for a dam at or near Coulter Shoals on the Tennessee River, Tenn."

That amendment was approved by the full committee, approved by the Senate, and enacted into law.

April 18, 1940 (Public Law 459, 76th Cong.): The Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1941, carried an appropriation of $40,000,000. As passed the House the bill provided continued construction of Kentucky Dam at Gilbertsville, Ky.; Watts Bar Dam; and for construction of a dam near Lenoir City, Tenn. No change was made in the Senate.

July 31, 1940 (Public Resolution 95, 76th Cong.): This resolution provided for an appropriation of $25,000,000 for continuation of construction for the T. V. A. including the funds necessary to begin construction of a dam on the Holston River near Jefferson City, Tenn., to begin installation of two additional electric generating units at Wilson Dam, Ala., and one additional electric generating unit at Pickwick Landing Dam, Tenn., etc. The resolution was not changed as it came from the House.

FORTY MILLION DOLLARS ALLOTTED

July 16, 1941 (Public Law 179, 77th Cong.): This resolution appropriated $40,000,000 for (1) beginning construction of two additional hydroelectrical projects and two additional storage projects on the Hiwassee River and its tributaries, (2) installing additional electric generating units in existing hydroelectric projects owned by the Authority, and (3) building and transmission facilities needed to connect these projects and units to the existing transmission system of the Authority, and to deliver the power produced by these projects and units to the market.

There was no change in this provision by the Senate.

December 17, 1941 (Public, 353, 77th Cong.): The Third Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act 1942, provided two appropriations for the T. V. A.—one of $25,000,000 and one of $22,000,000. The $25,000,000 provided for (1) beginning construction of a hydroelectric project on the Little Tennessee River near Fontana, N. C.; (2) for installing additional electric generating units with a total rated capacity of approximately 324,000 kilowatts in existing hydroelectric projects owned by the Authority; (3) installing an additional steam electric generating unit with a rated capacity of approximately 60,000,000 kilowatts in the Watts Bar Steam plant and for developing units of other steam plants to their complete capacity as provided in original plans of installation, etc.

This item was not changed as it came from the House. The appropriation of $22,000,000 was placed in the bill as reported from the committee to the Senate, was adopted by the Senate and finally enacted into law. Originally it called for an appropriation of $24,000,000, but was reduced in conference. As finally enacted it read:

HOLSTON RIVER DAM

"For an additional amount for the Tennessee Valley Authority, fiscal year 1942, (1) for a site on the South Fork of the Holston River near Bristol, Tenn., as recommended by the Tennessee Valley Authority July 7, 1941, with an installed capacity of 75,000 kilowatts, $10,000,000; (2) for building a dam on the Watauga River east of Elizabethton, Tenn., as recommended by the Tennessee Valley Authority July 7, 1941, with an installed capacity of 60,000 kilowatts, $10,000,000; (3) for the completion of the uncompleted unit of the steam plant at or near Sheffield, Ala., $2,000,000; in all, $22,000,000."

January 30, 1942 (Public Law 422, 77th Cong.): The Fourth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act, 1942, carried an appropriation of $30,000,000 for (1) the construction of a hydroelectric project on the French Broad River near Dandridge, Tenn.; (2) the purchase or building of transmission facilities needed to connect this project to the existing transmission system of the Authority; and (3) the acquisition of land necessary for, and relocation of, highways in connection with the accomplishment of the above project.

There was no change in this item in the Senate.

It will thus be seen that I was very largely instrumental in getting the Wilson Dam built in 1916. The House was exceedingly close and at that time the Senate took no interest in it. My amendment in the House was defeated at first and was only put in in conference, showing how close the House was. It will also be seen that of the 12 great dams that have been finished or started, I was the author of the provision for building 11 of the dams. And in the Senate I got the money to build all the dams and every time by as close fights as I have ever had in my legislative history. It will be seen from the above statement from the Appropriations Committee proceedings that I lost 1 dam for a whole year, the Gilbertsville, and I got it put in the next year.

SUPPORTED WATAUGA

I also got the Watauga and the South Holston Dams authorized and started, but Lilienthal was opposed to both and his friend, Krug, who was on the W. P. B., got those two dams stopped by that body, no doubt at the instigation of his former employer, Lilienthal.

I said I got all the money for the dams and that is true, and over the greatest opposition that I have ever encountered, and that is true. I admit I was opposed to Douglas Dam because it needlessly took over one of the richest valleys in the State of Tennessee, when the dam could have been built elsewhere. When the Senate overruled me I went ahead and joined in the appropriation of the money even for that dam.

Now, I want to ask all fair-minded people, with these incontrovertible facts before them, how could any honest person say that I am opposed to the T. V. A. and the building of these dams? It is an absolutely false statement, known to have been false when the author of the statement, whose name is Lilienthal, put them out to the newspapers. He has been putting out false statements against me ever since he has been in office and that is the absolute truth. He speaks of me as a politician. He is a politician himself, holding office all his life.

Of course, President Roosevelt had no part in the credit in the building of the original Wilson Dam, but for the continuation and completion of the project he is entitled to every credit. If the President hadn't been for us in 1933, we couldn't have built those dams. The sentiment in the Senate was always strong against these projects, and unless we had had the approval of the President I could have gotten no appropriations for the dams. Not that all his friends on the committee were for the dams, quite the contrary, some of his warmest friends were opposed to them. But he had commended the original project, and, of course, he is entitled to the greatest credit for reviving it and for the building of the Norris and the Wheeler Dams. Whether he was over for Morgan's and Lilienthal's yardstick policy I do not know. If he was, he did not say anything about it. However, he did not recommend the building of more dams, and I supposed this was because the T. V. A. did not recommend the building of more dams. It just happened, however, that I was in a place where I could force the building of these dams if a majority of the Senate committee and of the Senate agreed with me, and they did agree with me, and that was the way the dams were built.

GAVE BEST YEARS

I gave some of the best years of my life to the building of these dams. I was more interested in them than I ever was in any piece of legislation in my life. For 28 years I have in season and out of season supported the building of these dams. As heretofore shown I supported them when the members of the T. V. A. were fighting them actively or fighting them silently. They were for the "yardstick" theory of dealing with these dams. It was on the occasion of one of these great fights that I had in the Senate to build these dams that I found Morgan and Lilienthal were here lobbying with the members of the Appropriation Committee against the building of the Gunterville, Chickamauga and Hiwassee Dams and I gave them notice that if they did not get out of town I would denounce them on the floor of the Senate and I had a man at the railroad station that afternoon to see if they left and they did leave. And yet this man Lilienthal whom his own colleague, A. E. Morgan, denounced as a corrupt and dishonest man in dealing with one phase of the T. V. A., the marble claims phase, is now endeavoring to besmirch my good name and bring reproach to me.

Now, how did all this new turmoil arise? Well, in the present fight in the Congress, Lilienthal came to the House and demanded that this almost billion-dollar investment of the United States Government in these dams obtained in the way I have outlined be turned over to him and managed and controlled by him as he sees fit.

The House of Representatives saw fit to pass the bill recommended by him to reappropriate some relatively small balances and to appropriate all his receipts for the coming year, amounting to some $89,000,000, for the purpose of giving him his claimed necessary appropriation for running his organization and besides that, a revolving fund of $8,659,298 for the coming year. The amount I offered in the Appropriations Commitee and which has aroused all this turmoil and which was adopted in the Senate gives him the $79,134,882 for running the establishment and only takes away from him his revolving fund of $8,656,298 to do with as he pleases. In other words, it requires the T. V. A. to pay its receipts into the general fund of the Treasury and to get its appropriations from the Congress just as the War Department does, just as the Navy Department does, and just as all the other departments, and as the Post Office Department does. None of these departments receives revolving funds, not even the War or the Navy Departments. It has already been announced by the Army that it expects to pay back into the Treasury of the United States $28,000,000,000. Why shouldn't the T. V. A. pay back its unexpended balances in the same way?

FUNDS DANGEROUS

To furnish T. V. A. with a revolving fund of this kind would be setting a precedent that this Government could not afford to set. If it was started in one activity it would soon be demanded in the others.

Let me again refer to the Post Office Department, which deals with sums small as 1 cent. It does a billion-dollar business a year. The Congress appropriates all the money for the Post Office Department every year. It has not injured that Department to come to the Congress for its appropriations. It has not injured that Department to pay its receipts into the general fund of the Treasury. That Department is substantially self-supporting but it does not ask for a revolving fund so that it may be turned loose and spend this money in any way it sees fit.

If, however, we make a special kingdom of the T. V. A., and crown Lilienthal king, and turn him loose with a reserve fund of more than $8,000,000 to spend as he pleases, I see no reason why the Post Office Department, which is splendidly run, should not have the same privilege.

Lilienthal has recently written and published an article in which he says that to turn this activity over to an independent agency like the T. V. A. and let him run it is what he calls grass-roots government. He must have gotten this advice from the Vice President, who seems to be a very close friend. I do not believe this country wants any such policy of government. Now, there is another reason and a very potent one, in my view, why this should not be done.

Article I, section 9, of the Constitution of the United States provides: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

In his report last July, Lilienthal said:

"I paid into the Treasury of the United States $13,148,000." And he claimed that he had done so until confronted with the testimony of the Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bell, that the Treasury Department had not received such money. Lilienthal then admitted that he had not paid it into the Treasury but that it was a part of the T. V. A.'s fund in the Treasury which he drew against from time to time. In other words, it was still in the hands of the T. V. A. and the Treasury could not touch it.

LILIENTHAL SCORED

Again Lilienthal has been in a constant state of disagreement with the General Accounting Office ever since he has been with the T. V. A.

Section 12 of the T. V. A. Act required: "The Board shall sell the same (current) to the ultimate consumer without discrimination between consumers of the same class"; and yet the hearings show that Lilienthal has entered into 20-year contracts with two aluminum companies, and the difference in price in favor of one of the aluminum companies over the other for the 20-year period of the contract is a tidy little sum of $7,000,000.

Under these circumstances the committee and the Senate thought that instead of turning the entire discretion over to Lilienthal to run the T. V. A. as he saw fit that the Congress ought to take care of the money it had invested in these dams just as we have always done heretofore and that we ought to see that Lilienthal obeys the Constitution and the laws under which he is operating. The Constitution requires that all appropriations be made out of the Treasury of the United States. The law requires Lilienthal to pay his receipts into the Treasury and to get his funds to operate the Authority from the Congress.

The Budget estimate of the cost of operating the T. V. A. for 1945 is $79,134,882 and the Senate has appropriated that sum, so that all this noise and clatter about being hamstrung and the like by Lilienthal and his satellites is absolute poppycock. The only thing taken away was a revolving fund of $8,656,298. We give no other activity of the Government any such fund to do with as it pleases. We also required T. V. A. to pay its receipts into the Treasury as required by the law under which it operates. I might add that the Budget undertook to set up a reserve fund itself and the Senate very severely sat down on them.

It seems that Lilienthal has recently written a book on the T. V. A. The book, T. V. A.—Democracy on the March, in one of the advertisements has this endorsement by Vice President HENRY A. WALLACE. "Of all the books I have head in the past 12 months, this is the most exciting." I am wondering if our Vice President was influenced in any way by this book in his violation of the rules of the Senate the other day. When our opponents in the Senate found that they did not have enough votes, Vice President WALLACE undertook to throw my amendment out on a point of order but the Senate severely sat down on him by a vote of 46 to 17.

SEES HARM IN SNIPING

I have also seen another advertisement of this book—I haven't seen the book yet—in which it is said, "Mr. Lilienthal's position becomes almost Olympian, for not only does he disbelieve in government by an elite, managerial class but his love of the democratic processes is so strong as to denounce the growing contempt of politics and of Congress. And he warns that while it is irritating for conscientious and overworked men to be sniped at by professional politicians, progressives, and especially those in administrative or technical posts, they are under a peculiarly heavy responsibility to recognize with scrupulous care, the role of politics in fixing of basic policies.

Mr. Lilienthal was born in Chicago some 45 years ago, and after he was grown he moved to Wisconsin and got into politics by being appointed by Gov. Philip La Follette to a position on some commission, and it is claimed he was transferred from this place through the tutelage of Donald R. Richberg, formerly with the National Recovery Board. Lilienthal was then appointed to the T. V. A. and has been in that place ever since. In other words, he has been in politics practically all of his grown life. He is a nice one to be talking about Congress and denouncing Members of Congress.

But, my friends, the great reason why this revolving fund of $8,856,000 should not be turned over to Lilienthal for such purposes as he chooses to spend it, is because that fund and all other excess profits ought to be used for reducing electric rates to all the people of this whole area. The cities in the State distribute a large portion of this electricity. The contracts ought to be renegotiated with the cities, and the surplus and earnings applied to a reduction of the rates charged in these contracts, and the cities required, as the basic law provides, to reduce the prices charged the people for their electric current. The home owners, the farmers, and all who use electricity, or who use fertilizer, should be given at least a 10-percent reduction instead of building up a reserve in the hands of the T. V. A. These dams were built because of the inordinate charges of the private power companies, and we ought not to slip back into private power company methods, but by all means should reduce the rates of electricity to the people.

NORRIS' ATTACK UNCALLED FOR

Lastly I come to the attacks that former Senator Norris has made upon me concerning the T. V. A. I refer to him only because of his unjustified and uncalled-for attacks on me and the wide publicity that has been given Norris' statements by Lilienthal. I never was more surprised in my life, because at one time during the marble claim controversy Norris criticized Lilienthal quite as vigorously as I have. While he was in the Senate he always appeared very friendly to me. I had no idea that he had toward me personal and malignant hate of which he now gives evidence.

Now, Senator Norris really had nothing to do actually with the building of the dams on the Tennessee River. He had supported President Roosevelt in 1932, and it was because of that fact, no doubt, that President Roosevelt gave him the honor of introducing the bill setting up the T. V. A., which I had always understood the President had prepared. This authorizing bill was passed practically without contest, because everyone knew it was the President's bill. He had in the campaign declared for the building of the dams.

The fights over the building of the Tennessee dams all came before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and before the Senate itself over getting the money to build the dams. In the Appropriations Committee and in the Senate itself there was simply tremendous and vigorous opposition to the building of every one of those dams. Senator Norris never took any part in these controversies and never helped to get a dollar for the building of the dams, so far as I know. Indeed, when Arthur Morgan and Lilienthal were for the so-called yardstick theory, Norris was with them in that contention. I am quite sure that Lilienthal appealed to Norris to say some word about this matter. I do not know, of course; but I can not believe that Norris of his own accord injected himself into this controversy. My understanding has always been that Norris recommended the first three men who went on the Tennessee Valley Authority. I was not consulted about Arthur Morgan or Lilienthal, but I was told that Dr. H. A. Morgan, of my State, was to be placed on the Authority. I had never heard of either Lilienthal or Arthur Morgan, so far as I can now recall.

Inasmuch as Senator Norris has so bitterly attacked me, I cannot refrain from saying that it is remarkable that he never got a dam built by the Government in his own State which, I am informed, has many dam sites. I have heard he has for many years been claiming credit for building the dams in my State.

I am sometimes falsely accused of being a patronage-monger. The accusation is wholly unjust. I doubt if any man in the Senate cares less about patronage than I do.

Lilienthal in his late book has much to say about politics and politicians, and how unwise it is for any people to be represented by politicians. He forgets that he has never been engaged in anything else in his life except politics. I am told that when quite a young man he was appointed to a place on a public-service commission of some kind in Wisconsin by Gov. Philip La Follette, and from that he was appointed to the Tennessee Valley Authority. If that does not constitute him a politician, then I am ignorant of the meaning of the word "politician."

Now Norris says that I ought to be removed from my office as Senator because I got these dams and am still in favor of running them for the benefit of the people of Tennessee and surrounding States. Maybe I ought, I do not know. Confidentially, I think the reason Norris failed of reelection last time was because he never got anything for Nebraska. He was always so busy talking that he never had time to do anything real for his people, and unfortunately the old gentleman is still talking and still venomous. I feel sorry for him, but he had no business attacking me.

Knights of Columbus Service Flag Dedication—Address by Hon. David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by me on April 16 on the occasion of the unfurling of a national service flag under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus, at the national headquarters of this organization at New Haven, Conn.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We have assembled here on this memorable day in the history of our order to give public expression to the esteem, affection, and gratitude which we entertain for our fraternity brothers who are in the military service of our country. The sentiments that overwhelm us on occasions like this are difficult, aye, almost impossible, to express. The reflected light of the eye, or a silent tear is, indeed, more effective than words in giving expression to our present emotion. The resistless urge, the ceaseless longing to give expression in a public way to deep human emotions is the answer to those who ask why this ceremony.

One may fail to properly interpret the significance of this event unless he fully comprehends what it really signifies. The stars on this banner do more than symbolize to us the 75,000 loyal, courageous, and patriotic members of our order who are in the military service of our beloved country. It represents to us the heartaches and tears, the sacrifices and sufferings of the wives, the mothers, daughters, and sisters of those brothers of ours who are giving their all that this great democracy should not perish.

It will also be a constant reminder of the spirit of unity that our order stands for and proclaims—namely, that the men of our faith and of our fraternal order have responded willingly and cheerfully, and will continue to respond, to the call of country—and can and will cooperate wholeheartedly with their fellow Americans of every race, class, and creed in defense of America.

Time does not permit me to describe in detail the magnificent spirit of service and sacrifice that all our members are making in this emergency. One thing we know—no Knight of Columbus has been found wanting. Our brother knights, and I can speak with some intimate knowledge and authority, are demonstrating in every corner of the world where our battle flag has been unfurled, a loyalty, a high degree of courage, and a devotion to their country's cause unsurpassed by any group of the millions of loyal men and women in our fighting forces. In the air, on the sea, and on land, in every clime, under every condition, enduring severe hardships, our brothers are responding nobly, gallantly, and magnificently.

We are proud of them and our meeting here today is to tell them so. These ceremonies are to let them know that they are not forgotten; that while absent they are in the loving thoughts, not only of their immediate families but of every Knight of Columbus throughout the land.

Many of them are far distant from us as we meet here at this shrine of their order. Many of them have already suffered much in body and mind. Some of them have already made the supreme sacrifice. Many of them are facing with hearts of steel the uncertainty and unknown dangers that lie ahead. Though we cannot see each of them, though we cannot be by the side of any of them, yet there is comfort to them and to us in the thought that we are in constant communication with them through the fraternal spirit and spiritual bonds that permeate our order and unite all Knights in a firmer faith with the Creator.

Today we honor, as these members of our order would want us to honor, their mothers, wives, sisters, and other loved ones who are carrying on the war on the hidden battlefield of their homes. All wars are great tragedies, but we must never forget that first, last, and foremost all wars are mothers' wars.

It is, therefore, with real sincerity and with a full understanding of the sacrifices they are making, that today, in the presence of this service flag, we ask the beloved archbishop to lead us in prayer to the God of Nations to save, guide, and protect each and all of these fighting brothers of ours, and also to protect and comfort their loved ones.

Fellow Knights, we owe these brothers of ours in the armed forces more than words of praise and gratitude. We owe them action and duty. First and foremost, we owe them the obligation to contribute our efforts to bring this war as soon as is humanly possible to a victorious end, to lessen in every conceivable way the loss of human life, and to bring them back to their homes and loved ones speedily.

There is another pledge we owe them. During this war there are forces that have been let loose which are threatening us not only on the battle front but on the home front as well. Many strange political forms are developing in America under the smokescreen of the war. One of these extremes, unbelievable as it must seem to real Americans, is that we must change our form of Government in order for us to cooperate successfully in the post-war organization of the world. While fighting regimentation abroad with all its strength and fury, let us not submit to regimentation at home, for after this war is over American regimentation can be just as intolerable as Fascist regimentation.

We pledge them, therefore, that we will endeavor at the end of this war to make an American, as well as an international, peace—a peace that will provide for the safety and security of America in the future; a peace that will assure the preservation of the free democratic institutions that we inherited from our American forebears. While they are fighting on the war front we insist that there shall be no surrender of the American way of life here at home.

In attempting to solve the gigantic task to bring America back to post-war conditions, let us not repeat the mistakes following the last war. Above all other considerations, we must provide for the safety, happiness, and security of our people here at home, and we must plan to defend ourselves against all aggressors by maintaining unhampered and undismantled the powerful Navy and Air Force we have built up during this war. It is our strongest, and, indeed, may be our only protection against the greed and selfishness, the power politics, and economic ambitions of other nations, and the jealous and vaulting ambitions of dictators.

The members of our order possessed, when they entered the service, two birth certificates. One they took with them; the other they left behind in our keeping. Their baptismal certificate—their faith in the Almighty we know they will preserve, for that faith is embedded in every fiber of the true Knight of Columbus.

The other birth certificate they left in our keeping. It is the birth certificate of all Americans—the Declaration of Independence. This certificate must not be mutilated.

Political principles that will destroy private initiative, and bureaucratic control of our lives, of education, and religion can destroy it. The regimentation, that the war has brought to the forefront, of men, women, and children in all their individual life activities can destroy it. Dissipation by waste and extravagance of our wealth and resources, and the abandonment of foreign-trade policies that have built up our industries and made our working men and women the most prosperous in the world, on the theory that free trade among nations will make for world peace, can destroy it. The book-educated specialists with the policy of exaggerated internationalism can destroy it. Our zeal and desire to help the world, unless restrained by determination to keep out of the present world brawls of ideologies and greed for power and plots to despoil people of their inalienable rights can destroy it. All these and many other subtle means in the political life around us can become as dangerous to our institutions as any foreign war.

The peace that America most of all wants after this war is that our people be left free to live their lives as their ancestors did; free to work, to play, to pray, and to live without the necessity of governmental permission or by direction of governmental edict.

Now, a final promise to our brother Knights whom we honor today: We shall plead and fight for the inspiring peace program proposed by the Knights of Columbus. No sounder or saner peace objectives have been presented by any of the many groups who have been planning after-the-war peace programs.

Our armed forces on the battle fronts are going to win the war, but it is folly to assume, what unfortunately is a prevailing opinion, that it can be done without sacrifices beyond measure and tremendous losses that no one can possibly calculate, during the days ahead. But are we, who have not the responsibility of military service and enjoying the comforts of home life, willing to serve and sacrifice to win the peace?

To succeed in obtaining a just and lasting peace will call for a high degree of courage and much of the spirit to do or die that our armed forces are displaying on every battle front.

If America fails in its efforts for a peace based upon justice it will not be because of defects arising from ill-conceived objectives, but from lack of bold and direct application of sound principles to changing realities as they occur during the war and following the war. Our after-war difficulties will be greatly lessened if our own Nation and our allies all realize that they possess no mandate to determine the forms of government, the policies or viewpoints of the peoples in Europe, whether powerful or weak, of varying customs and races, who during this war have become the victims of aggression and who have shared with us the heavy task of destroying ruthless aggression.

As we fight unflinchingly for a just peace we must keep in mind that such a peace is premised, from first to last, upon the faith on the part of our people and the peoples of the world in the basic value of such things as freedom—political, territorial, and religious. Unless the doctrine, that has gained ground alarmingly in recent years through the world, that the individual possesses no right which the state is bound to respect, and that force can be substituted for justice, is definitely crushed, we are certain to lose the battle for peace. Enduring peace will bless mankind only when the world becomes an association of truly free states recognizing as fundamental to the enjoyment of liberty and peace, as the American founders of this Republic did, the God-given rights of free individuals.

Our forefathers did not begin with the Declaration of Independence. They began with God. Freedom was not their creation. Freedom to them was a gift God had bestowed on mankind. They conceived their function was to create a government which guaranteed the protection of freedom. Only if the spirit—the spirit of In God We Trust is at the peace table when the war is over, will the hopes of lasting peace be realized "by men of good will the world over, who have seen and felt the folly and futility of war."

These ceremonies will be shortly concluded. Tomorrow and the day after, and for many days in the future, our brother knights scattered throughout the world serving our country on land, and in the air, and on the sea will learn about these ceremonies. We pray that it may be a source of strength and inspiration to them to know that we fully sense our responsibilities on the home front and that we will not let them down. I pledge, in your name, we will not let them down.

Address by Hon. Hugh Butler, of Nebraska, at Second Annual Convention of the N. R. E. C. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, on March 7 I spoke extemporaneously at the second annual convention of the N. R. E. C. A. in Chicago. Yesterday I received the stenographic transcript covering my remarks on that occasion. President Tate, before presenting me, had asked the Nebraska delegates to come to the platform, to which my opening remarks refer.

I ask unanimous consent that my remarks on that occasion be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Tate, honored guests, fellow Nebraskans, it really was a great surprise to me that Steve pulled in inviting my honorable constituents to be on the stand with me at this time, but I can assure you that it was a very pleasant surprise and in returning the compliment that he may have intended to pay me, I want to say that I think I am just as proud, if not more so, of men like this, and women, too, who support work of this sort in Nebraska than they can possibly be of me or any other representative that may work for you and others in this great program in the land.

It was one of the most pleasant experiences that I have ever had when I attended the first annual convention held by this association in St. Louis 1 year ago. I didn't know until just a day or two before the convention that it was going to be possible for me to be present and then I went simply to be a guest, to mingle with the people who represented R. E. A. and I thought at that time it was one of the most important and potent movements in America. I think it has set a record that has never been met by any organization of any kind in the attendance that it had in St. Louis and under the restrictions that govern travel at this time I think I can say the same as to the attendance of your second annual meeting here in Chicago.

Last year there were a number of Senators with me at the St. Louis meeting and I regret exceedingly that they were not able to be with us here tonight.

One of the very best friends that I have in the Senate is one of the best friends of rural electrification, GEORGE AIKEN, former Governor and now Senator from Vermont. I sit in the Senate at the left of Senator WILLIS, of Indiana, which State, I believe, is near the top of the States of the Union leading out in the organization and pushing the further extension of rural electrification.

I am a very close friend of JOHN RANKIN and of DICK RUSSELL, and others who have worked so diligently to get this movement under way during the last several years. But I should be amiss if I failed to mention at this time—having just come from a very short visit in my own State of Nebraska—if I didn't mention that one great citizen, not only of Nebraska but nationally famous, for the work that he has done in helping to organize and extend work of this kind. I refer to none other than the great Senator George Norris. [Applause.]

And I am sure that it will please all of you to know that when I called on them a few days ago for about a half an hour in his home in McCook, I found both he and Mrs. Norris in what I considered the pink of condition. And while he did not give me, and I did not request, his permission to extend to you at this time his very best wishes, I am sure that he would have given me that privilege had I asked it, and I am going to assume the responsibility of extending to all of you present and your coworkers his very best wishes. While he is living, you might say, in retirement from public service, he still serves. And, like many other men, the work that he has done through the years may, perhaps, really be more effective as time comes and goes. He was the coauthor and cosponsor of the Norris Act, approved May 20, 1936, referred to by the previous speaker, which took the R. E. A. out of the emergency category and extended its life for 10 years. He will long be remembered for the work he has done in this field.

I have attended a great many national conventions of different kinds—farmer, elevator, grain dealer conventions, etc.—and I can tell you that they have had some speakers of national note who would help to draw a crowd, but I have never attended a convention of an organization of this kind or any other kind where the enthusiasm and the interest and the spirit, as evidenced by those in attendance, equaled that at St. Louis, and I am sure that it will be the same in this convention here.

I really got something from your convention last year, something that is going to keep me active in this movement through the years of service that I may have in the Senate of the United States. I am sure that from talking to those who attended in St. Louis and, perhaps, are in attendance at this convention here this year, that I got a great deal more benefit from it than anything that I could have contributed myself.

One of the very interesting experiences last year was a meeting with a delegation from Nebraska. They had come from Nebraska to St. Louis. I came from Washington to St. Louis expecting to see, perhaps, a half a dozen, maybe 10 or 15 delegates from the State of Nebraska, but there were about 45. We had breakfast together and I can tell you very frankly that it did the cause of rural electrification considerable good so far as I am concerned, because it was a great inspiration to me to see the number of people who came and the interest that they displayed in this program, and, likewise, again at this meeting.

You have a great responsibility here. It gives you the opportunity to get together and talk over your plans for R. E. A., a program that will pay great dividends in the future.

President Tate in introducing the speaker ahead of me, my good friend, Mr. Casey, spoke of him as an active member of the R. E. A. He presented me as a farmer, for which I am very glad and proud. I hope at the next convention, Steve, that you can present me as an active member of the R. E. A. because one of the first things that I went to work on in cooperation with Senator Norris and others in the Senate was the development of the R. E. A. in Nebraska. The Senator and I came originally from the same county in Nebraska. Becoming a member of an active R. E. A. is one of the things that I am looking forward to for the coming year. [Applause.]

I think, perhaps, a word or two in connection with R. E. A. in Nebraska might not be amiss at this time.

When R. E. A. came into existence in 1935 only 9,544 of the 121,000 farms in Nebraska had any form of electric service. The number of Nebraska farms now having such service is in excess of 31,000. The percentage of electrified farms was then 7.1 percent and now it is 25.8 percent.

Not all of the recent increase is due directly to the R. E. A. Private power companies, due partly to R. E. A. activity, have greatly expanded their lines and their services to rural Nebraska.

Since 1935, R. E. A. has loaned $12,520,000 to the 21 borrowers in Nebraska. There were 28 borrowers but because of consolidation and other reasons the number now is 21 and I am glad to say that each of the 21 members are members of this cooperative association. [Applause.]

With the money thus loaned there has been constructed in Nebraska 10,731 miles of rural electric distribution lines.

Speakers who preceded me today and Mr. Casey, who just addressed you, have given you a great insight into the record and into the future possibilities of rural electrification so I am not going to dwell at length on that point at this time, but I would like to mention just one phase of the possibility in the further development of rural electrification and that is in connection with irrigation. Now, that doesn't interest many of you people who come from the Eastern States where you get all of the rainfall that you need, but in 17 other States you would lose crops frequently if you didn't have irrigation. It is one of the greatest and most important subjects that we can consider. I happen to have three irrigation pumps on my own farm in southwest Nebraska, operated by dilapidated, old, gasoline engines, which require considerable tinkering with from time to time. And one of my earliest attempts was to get the power line now in existence through the adjoining territory extended to my farm so that I could have the benefit of the electric current, but when we looked at the cost, and so forth, it was physically impossible. Under the plans that are now being made, the R. E. A. will have lines in that area within another year. And there are many of my neighbors who will be able to produce more because of this service. Our task of feeding not only ourselves, our troops abroad, and those for whom we will be responsible when we take over the new areas conquered will increase the demands upon America exceeding anything that you can imagine. Every additional ton of food that we can produce by installing irrigation is going to be needed and needed badly.

During the past summer I had the good fortune to make an extended trip through Latin America—some of you may have heard or read of it—and one of the sad things that I saw on that trip was the lack of development of irrigation in many countries which would enable them to produce their own food. I visited areas where they produce not to exceed a half to two-thirds of the food that is necessary to keep their people alive. I think it is perfectly proper for me to mention one such country and that is Peru. It is a beautiful country and they are wonderful people that succeeded the Incas. The Indians fed themselves. They had to, because there were no countries from which they could import. They had no facilities for importing food if they wanted to and, therefore, they had to produce the food that kept them alive. And, when you stop to think that the number of people who lived in that area at the time was far greater than the number of people occupying Peru today and that they are not feeding themselves, the waste of power and water from the Andes in abundance, you can appreciate how I understand the importance of developing irrigation not only here at home but helping others in a cooperative effort in their countries, especially our good neighbors to the south.

Perhaps the greatest example of the interest of Congress in rural electrification at the moment is the introduction in the House and Senate of six bills affecting rural electrification. The one that was mentioned by Mr. Casey, the Pace bill introduced March 7 of this year which reduces the interest payments on R. E. A. loans is one, perhaps, of the greatest importance, and I hope that it will soon have passed the Senate and have been signed by the President so that the benefit will be available for those who are extending this work in all parts of the United States. [Applause.]

A farming economy built around a steady source of electrical energy will be one of the chief bases for sound and prosperous agriculture in this country in the years to come. With the aid of electric power at a reasonable price food production may well meet unheard of records in the future. And, let me assure you of my own earnest desire to promote and support this program in every way possible for the best interests of agriculture and the Nation.

As I sat here and looked over this fine group this evening I was impressed with the idea, with the thought of the responsibility that is yours as trustees of this movement throughout America. The trustee of an R. E. A. cooperative has a responsibility that is important to the entire rural community it is impossible to overestimate. In many communities the R. E. A. cooperative enterprise is the largest business owned and controlled by the people themselves. Rural electrification holds no end of possibilities for the improvement of rural lighting. To be entrusted by one's neighbors with the guidance of so important an enterprise is an honor which fills every trustee with a deep sense of obligation and a firm determination to show himself worthy. The success of a national rural electrification program is directly affected by the national success of every local R. E. A. cooperative. For an R. E. A. cooperative to be successful it means that it must be effective both as a business and as a cooperative enterprise. It is, therefore, important that the board shall make use of competent, technical, and business management. It is also important for the board to do everything possible to make the enterprise function as a real cooperative. That means that the employee membership shall cooperate wholeheartedly with the board in building an enterprise of maximum service to the entire rural community.

There have been many tragic events in our life as a nation since this organization met in its first annual convention in St. Louis 1 year ago. Our country has gone through what is no doubt the most critical period in its history. Sweat, blood, and tears have punctuated the events of the past year. Blood was shed and continues to spill in Africa, Italy, and the islands in the Pacific area, and in many other places throughout the world. Sweat flows from the brow of agriculture and industry throughout the Nation in our unprecedented feat of production. Tears are shed by increasing thousands throughout America. You who are meeting here today well know the record of tragic events as they are being recorded daily in the homes of our rural communities. My own experience is no different from that of all the rest of you. I have no son who can offer himself to the service, but I have, as most men do, a number of nephews. I have in mind at the moment two in the southwest Pacific. One a pilot in the Marine Corps. Another who is a director of radar detector work and who, on Christmas Day last at the Gloucester Straits, took part in his one hundred and thirteenth engagement. I think that will give you some idea of the size of the task that we have accomplished and what still lies ahead of us.

In Congress the load has been no lighter. It grows continually in its intensity and it has taken its toll of life from the Members of both bodies. Among this group was one whose services to agricultural America will stand forever as a grand record of genuine statesmanship and stamped always with a devotion to all he deemed right. I refer to the Honorable Charles L. McNary, late Senator from Oregon and for many years our minority leader but always highly respected by the opposition. I pray that such devoted and able leadership will continue to flow from the homes of America into the Halls of Congress.

Yes; many strenuous days and sleepless nights are spent by those who represent you in the day-to-day consideration of $100,000,000,000 budgets, the draft, food subsidies, rehabilitation of war veterans, shortage of farm labor and farm machinery, the raising of money by taxation, the load of which is reflected in every home, aid to dependents of those in the service, war labor difficulties, and many other similar and even more serious problems. "What is past is prologue." That is a statement that appears on one of the public buildings in Washington which I see nearly every day. And how true it is. The future is the thing that is most important to all of us. What interests us most today is what the future holds for us.

I think all of you realize, to some extent, the size of the task that lies ahead with the debt approximating or exceeding, perhaps, three hundred billion when our total assets or the balance on the other side of the ledger is about two hundred billion. To balance that will task the earning capacity of America. The rapid development of rural electrification will tremendously increase the earning capacity of America. That is one of the real reasons why I am so interested in its further development. I am frequently in conventions where men speak discouragingly of the possibility of America working from under the debt that it has today. But I know of instances and you know of similar instances where some good businessman has met adversity in his business and has gone to his banker for assistance. He inherited a good business from his father, his father inherited it from his father and grandfather. The business through the years had established a wonderful record but at the moment is in dire straits. When the banker after questioning finds that he wants to borrow, perhaps, $100,000 more than his plant is actually worth, he first throws up his hands but after further consideration, taking into consideration the record that the business has made in the past and how it has worked out from under similar circumstances, he changes his mind. That, I think, is a practical illustration of what we Americans face today. We are going to have a tremendous task, going to have to borrow more money than our plant is worth, but by working together cooperatively we will get the job done and continue, perhaps, to be even a stronger Nation at some time in the future than we have been in the past.

I am a firm believer in the constant, continual development of electrical service to rural communities of America. I say constant and continual, because I don't think we want to attempt to do too much in 1 year. Let's take it in small allotments that we can take care of as a group, as a nation. The progress that we make depends largely on the contribution of time and work by you people who are here today. Also on the support you get from the Government. By Government I mean the people of America working cooperatively in solving all our problems. This is truly a cooperative enterprise, one that should interest every citizen of the country whether he is a resident of the city or rural area. As a nation we maintain mail service to the communities regardless of whether each community is in itself self-sustaining in that respect. Likewise we maintain protection for all parts of the country, to all citizens of the Nation regardless of their individual situation or importance. Education, police and fire protection is likewise a community project. Every R. E. A. project that is completed adds to our strength as a nation. You who are here will make your contribution as community builders in helping to organize and extend rural electric service to the farmers of America. National leadership comes from the small communities, and as we cooperatively make electricity available along the highways and byways of America, we thus become the community builders from whence comes the best leadership of our country.

In closing, I want to add my personal pledge to that of our Commander in Chief as it was read by President Tate here this evening as a member of the opposite party. There is no partisanship in an organization of this kind. In work of this kind we all join in to help develop it to the limit of our ability. [Applause.]

Pan-American Day Address by Secretary of State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, in connection with the celebration of Pan-American Day, before the Pan American Union on April 14, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Pan-American Day is an important anniversary to the nations of the Americas. We meet today to honor those whose vision and energy established and for more than 50 years have carried forward the Pan American Union and all that it signifies. It is well to ask ourselves why it is that we can meet in the midst of the greatest war of history and why it is that we have so great an achievement to commemorate. For in doing so we may more clearly see the guideposts which point the true direction in which we may go forward to new cooperation among ourselves and new cooperation with other nations of the earth.

Inter-American unity was not brought about by force and is not based upon the conception of a master race whose mission is to rule. It was not produced by nations with a homogeneous racial origin. It does not depend upon the bonds of a common language or a culture based on a common literature or common customs and habits.

Were these the only sources of international unity and common action, the future for the world would be dark indeed. But inter-American unity proves that there are other sources more subtle and even stronger—sources which offer hope to a world which can find no hope in the factors which I have mentioned. Our unity comes from a passionate devotion to human liberty and national independence which is so strong that it does not stop with the effort of each people to secure liberty for itself but goes on to respect as no less valid the desire of other peoples to achieve the same liberty in accordance with their own traditions and historic institutions. Although the language of Bolivar and San Martin was different from that of Washington and Jefferson, they were expressing the same purposes and principles and they led their countrymen along the same paths. These are the paths along which inter-American unity has developed, growing ever stronger as the American nations have come to understand one another and to have trust and confidence in one another's purposes and to work together for purposes so identic that they produced not division and jealousy but unity of thought and action.

As the years have gone on, the true principles underlying inter-American unity have been made more specific as one inter-American conference has followed another. In the years between the World Wars the trust and confidence between the American nations grew ever stronger while elsewhere the growth of ambitions of conquest by force brought division and fear. It is the common pride of the American Republics and the good fortune of all mankind that the torch of international cooperation has burned at its brightest in the affairs of this hemisphere precisely at a time when it was being blacked out elsewhere. It is natural that the history of an international association which has endured longer than any other should provide encouraging guidance for the future.

At the Montevideo Conference in 1933 the American Republics affirmed their belief in certain essential principles upon which cooperation between nations and international order must be based. Among them was the principle that every nation, large and small, was equal before the law of nations. Another was the right of every nation to develop its own institutions, free from intervention by others. We already see the beginning of a wider application of these basic principles. They were stated in the Atlantic Charter, the United Nations Declaration, and the declarations made at Moscow. Specifically, it was agreed at Moscow that membership in the world security organization must be upon the basis of the sovereign equality of all nations, weak as well as strong, and the right of every nation to a government of its own choice.

The American nations spoke with a united voice at Buenos Aires as early as 1936 and Lima in 1938 of the dangers to world peace which impended and took united action to defend the hemisphere against them. When the attack came many of the American republics immediately sprang to the defense of the hemisphere. Shortly after the conference at Rio de Janeiro others took the same course. This chapter in our American history will ever be a gallant and glorious one. It teaches that unity of purpose, a common and passionate devotion to the maintenance of freedom, and mutual trust and confidence are the essential elements without which no amount of international organization and machinery can succeed. But it also teaches us and other nations that international organization and machinery are necessary. Successful as our common action has been, it has not been complete. And it took time, which may not always be available. Therefore we learn that an international organization, whether in the field of inter-American cooperation or in the broader field of world peace, must have two main supports. It must gather its greatest strength from the rightness and justness of the principles upon which it is founded and the mutual trust of its members. It must also have such an essential framework and machinery and such an acceptance of their obligations on the part of its members as will enable it to act promptly and effectively in times of crisis.

Another guidepost for the future which our common experience before and during this war has raised is in the economic field. With the outbreak of the war the continent mobilized economically. The extent to which the products of the hemisphere have contributed to the growing success of the war against Germany and Japan cannot be overestimated. Millions of men and women throughout the hemisphere are devoting themselves unsparingly to the production of essential materials and to the forging of the weapons of our common victory. All this has been done under the great handicaps of the dislocations produced by the war.

At the end of the war all of our countries will be faced by problems of immense gravity. Out of the experience of our association in peace and in war, we have learned that the expansion of material well-being can only come with an expansion of production and trade and hence an increase in consumption. We have learned too that no one nation can solve its problems by itself. An increase in production requires financing, a wise selection of the goods to be produced, and wise and fair commercial policies to enable goods to flow to their markets and necessary purchases to be made in return. All of this requires cooperative effort and the creation of international arrangements through which that effort may have concrete expression. But it requires something more than this. It requires the respect by each nation for each other nation of which I have spoken in the field of political relations. International cooperation in the economic field is the opposite of economic imperialism, by which one country seeks to exploit another. It is also the opposite of economic nationalism, by which each nation seeks to live unto itself.

We citizens of this hemisphere have great opportunities before us. The community of action among the American nations, already highly developed, will at the end of the war be indispensable in the advancement of our economic well-being and in the establishment of an international organization to prevent the recurrence of world wars. Together, as I have said, we foresaw, pointed out, and prepared against the dangers of war. Together we must foresee and prepare for the ever greater common task of the peace. I believe that as in future years men of the Americas meet to commemorate this day they will see unfolded before their eyes ever-increasing evidence that the path along which inter-American cooperation has led is the path to human liberty and human welfare.

American Legion Must Not Be Used by Radical Groups for Political Purposes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a statement was carried in the press recently to the effect that some Legionnaires in Los Angeles, Calif., had accused me of misusing my franking privilege when I permitted C. Leon de Aryan, publisher of the San Diego weekly, the Broom, to mail out a few of my speeches.

I have never met or seen Mr. de Aryan, and know nothing about him except what I have read in the newspapers. I do not know, nor do I care, how he got any of my speeches—which are all 100 percent American, written or spoken, and paid for by me. But, if Mr. de Aryan did receive any of my speeches he had a legal right to readdress them the same as anyone else has under the law. I am informed that he was at one time under indictment, but his name was not included—for lack of evidence—on the list of the 30 defendants in the so-called sedition trial now being held in Washington.

I hold no brief for Mr. de Aryan, but in America every citizen is innocent until proved guilty. In Mr. de Aryan's case it is doubly so, as he was not even reindicted. I am also informed that his newspaper, the Broom, is still being published every week; and, therefore, I assume in accordance with our postal regulations and other laws. It now turns out that Mr. de Aryan, who may have readdressed a few score of my speeches, is just a straw man set up for political propaganda purposes.

I shall, at a later date when I am in the district, make a detailed reply to the report issued by the Los Angeles group. I desire to point out at this time, however, that the report is filled with inaccuracies, distortions, and innuendoes, and that it is nothing but a brazen attempt to revive the scurrilous smear attacks made on me last year. There is not a single statement or inference in the report to the effect that I have violated any law or regulation regarding the use of my franking privilege or any other, and since that was supposed to have been the basis of the original resolution it is now clear that it was created solely for political purposes and timed for release during the coming campaign although the alleged abuse occurred years ago.

The first I heard or saw of this report, emanating from a Los Angeles group of Legionnaires, was in PM, the uptown edition of the Communist Daily Worker. It is just the setting it deserved, and is best suited for. But even PM had this to say, "The committee makes clear that the [seventeenth] Legion department [of California] does not 'question Mr. FISH'S motives,' or charge that he is 'disloyal' to the United States," and might well have added that there was not even any charge of violating any law or postal regulation in respect to the use of my franking privilege.

I deny any abuse of my franking privilege. All the speeches that have been mailed under my frank, with two exceptions, have been my own, and I defy anyone to find one word or one statement of mine in the long time that I have been in public life that is un-American. I did send out a speech made by former President Herbert Hoover a few years ago, and another that included with my own speech some remarks of another Member of Congress and an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Taken as a whole, the Los Angeles Legion report is cockeyed. It concludes 16 pages of history and propaganda by quoting a statement I made in Congress on September 29, 1941, in answer to the question of whether it was proper for a Congressman to permit others to use his frank. I replied:

> I think if the organization has been under suspicion, then there might be some impropriety in turning over your speeches for addressing.

The fact is I never sent any speeches out to any organizations since September 29, 1941, and, as far as I know, there have been no claims that I did. The propagandists have shot themselves with their own propaganda. The speeches referred to—those addressed by Mr. de Aryan, of San Diego—were sent to an individual, and not to an organization, and, as I have stated, I never heard of him and, naturally, knew of no suspicion attached to him. Furthermore, he was not reindicted, for lack of evidence, which should remove any question of suspicion.

So why all the fuss and feathers, except just to keep alive contemptible smear attacks against pre-war noninterventionists for political purposes, emanating from radical sources which are even able to use units of the Legion against its own members. It is the old Communist stunt of half truths, distortions, lies, and condemnation through fake associations, which Representative MARTIN DIES has so clearly described in his exposure of the efforts being made to undermine the faith of the American people in their elected representatives in Congress and in constitutional government.

The report is a malicious and false propaganda document, going back 6 years to 1938 and, by quoting certain sentences out of my speeches, twists and distorts their meaning, all of which is deliberately designed to smear me and deceive the American people.

To illustrate the bias and fraudulent intent of this report, at no time does it mention in its supposed summary of my efforts to keep America out of war that I introduced a resolution, in January 1939, to prohibit the sale and shipment of scrap iron to Japan, which was opposed by the administration. I made repeated efforts to get action on this resolution in the Committee on Foreign Affairs and on the floor of the House. It was this scrap iron, sold and shipped by the millions of tons and turned into bombs by the Japanese, that sank our warships and killed 3,000 American soldiers and sailors at Pearl Harbor.

Neither does this prejudiced report show that I introduced legislation and repeatedly urged the acquisition of stock piles of rubber and tin and other strategic materials early in 1940, the construction of a tin refinery in the United States for Bolivian tin for use in any emergency, and the allocation of a million dollars to the Secretary of Agriculture for a survey looking toward the development of rubber resources in South America.

I am proud of every act, every vote, and every speech I made in trying to keep America out of war until we were attacked in a dastardly and cowardly manner by the Japanese. I believe I represented the views of 80 percent of the American people, and I know that I voted consistently with 90 percent of the Republican Members of Congress from 1938 to December 8, 1941, when all but one Member of the House voted to declare war. As a result of my efforts to keep this country out of war—along with other noninterventionists in Congress—I am convinced that we saved America from being involved in war at least 6 months earlier, in which case Germany would never have attacked Russia and we would have been left holding the war bag, which would have been the worst disaster in American history.

I have voted for every Army, Navy, and air force appropriation bill since 1938, and for all measures aimed to win the war as quickly as possible and bring our soldiers home.

Efforts by any group to revive the controversy between pre-war interventionists and noninterventionists is a disservice to the Nation, destroys national unity, and interferes with our efforts to win the war.

I do not question the character or integrity of the Legionnaires of the Seventeenth District of California, at Los Angeles, who may have had any part in writing this report, but merely believe they have been deluded and made use of to spread Communist, left-wing, and false propaganda for political and partisan purposes.

Most of the Legionnaires throughout the Nation, however, will resent this obvious smear attack by a small group of Legionnaires from Los Angeles because one of the fundamental principles of the Legion—and I know whereof I speak, since I was chairman of a committee of three that wrote the preamble to the American Legion constitution—is to keep the American Legion out of politics.

Let Us Face the Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that the American people are becoming increasingly disturbed about the conflicting policies of the leading members of the United Nations. The assurances that the many nations, all very peace loving and liberty loving and democratic, are united in a holy crusade against dictatorship and aggression seem to be weakening in some quarters. We feel we must carry this war through to a victorious finish if we are to have any hope of future peace. It is apparent, however, that we are fighting this war more idealistically, more unselfishly than any of the other great powers, There is in this Nation, thank God, a great measure of ability and determination to distinguish between right and wrong, of moral consciousness, of religious faith, and of plain common decency in human relations. But we must constantly be alert to see that advocates of foreign ideas and ideals do not gain a dangerous influence in our Government far out of proportion to their small number.

It is a strange fact that the political future of the world is discussed much more openly and frankly in England than in this country. Many Americans seem strangely hesitant to voice their doubts and anxieties, or to advocate what they believe this country should do. I do not see why we, who after all are the great advocates of government by the people, should, without justified criticism, acclaim our leaders as do the Germans. If our Government makes mistakes, we, all of us, must suffer the consequences, not only now but in generations to come. The late great liberal, Mr. Justice Holmes, declared:

> We do not lose our right to condemn either measures or men because the country is at war.

We must preserve the morale of this Nation. "Morale," in this connection, I take to mean a common faith in a cause sublimely just. "Morale" does not imply that we must applaud and sanction blindly the actions and policies of politicians, domestic and foreign. Woodrow Wilson, the First World War President, declared:

> We do not need less criticism in time of war, but more. It is hoped that criticism will be constructive, but better unfair attack than autocratic repression. Honesty and competence require no shield of secrecy.

It is particularly important for us to understand the purposes and the political strategy of our two major cobelligerents, the British Empire and the Soviet Union. If we do not understand what they are driving at, and the way in which they traditionally try to reach their objectives, the real meaning of political statements of their leaders, the real significance of the actions of their foreign offices, and the real objectives of their political and military ventures, then the purposes of this war become unintelligible indeed. Let me try to contribute to a better understanding, not by glorifying but by scrutinizing.

It is certain that many Americans do not understand the position of the British Empire in this world conflict. The most striking characteristic of that vast Empire is that it is run by a numerically small nation on one small, exposed isle. The British would be lost, and their Empire doomed, if any power, or constellation of powers, hostile to them, should become militarily stronger than they, combined with those of their friends on whom they can depend to render aid in world emergencies. Britain, therefore, must have friends if she is to survive, powerful friends, strategically located friends, to assure the protection of their island. Moreover, Britain must go to war as she did in 1917 and in 1939 whenever a power or a constellation of powers potentially hostile to her threatens to become too strong. The traditional British policy, therefore, has always been, and undoubtedly will always remain, that of maintaining a balance of power. It is merely wishful thinking, already refuted by the facts, when Mr. Hull expresses the expectation that in the postwar world the balance-of-power policy will be abandoned. We know that the British Nation, despite all of her tribulations in the past few years, has displayed a vitality and a will to survive that has found its classic expression in the persistent and powerful personality of Mr. Churchill.

In the economic field, Great Britain has two major interests, both of them essential to her very life. They are: Foreign markets for the products of her industries, and a principal share in merchant shipping. Only by the income from her sales and services can she maintain the living standards which are established in the British Isles. A threat against these interests is a threat against the very life of Britain. Such a threat, no matter from what source, is sure to be met with determined countermeasures on her part. One may, moreover, fail to understand British actions and reactions unless one realizes that the British have no other aim than to preserve intact the Empire, and no other policy than to attain that end by all available means.

Mr. Speaker, let us now turn to the Soviet Union and scan her basic purposes. The Soviet Union, despite the undeniable rise of Russian nationalism during the war, is fundamentally a dictatorship of the proletariat. All other social classes have been eliminated. As a consequence, the Soviet people have been hesitant in allying themselves with other nations. They have, instead, established intimate relations with the Communist parties of all other countries. The aim has been to weaken these other countries politically and militarily in case such other countries should contemplate action inimical to the Soviet Union.

Moreover, we cannot understand Soviet policies and their bearing on the future without appreciating that the Soviet people are predominantly Asiatics and not Europeans—Stalin himself is not a Russian, but a Georgian from beyond the Caucasus Mountains. In mental reactions and cultural tastes the Soviet people and the western nations do not have much in common.

The Soviet aim has been and continues to be a world communistic society built on the principles of Marx and Lenin. Politically the Soviet leaders are shrewd. It is not easy always to understand their moves if one does not keep in mind the stakes for which they are playing. It is often said that Stalin is a great realist, and he is. When he makes a move and encounters too strong a resistance, he does not run his head against the wall, but tries another time, in another way, and at another place. He makes clever use of the advantages he may derive from temporary alliances. He was one day the friend of Hitler, and the next day the friend of Churchill and Roosevelt. He opposes the Kings of Yugoslavia and Greece and makes friends with the King of Italy. We would be naive indeed if we did not realize that he is playing his game—not ours. That game involves the permanent absorption into the Soviet Union of at least parts of Finland, all the three Baltic republics, eastern Poland, and parts of Rumania. The second step is the establishment, to the west of the new frontiers, of a number of dependent states whose military foreign policy will be closely coordinated with that of the Soviet Union. The countries of this zone will have independence only in name and that probably only for a limited time. Today this appears to be the future fate of Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Balkan states, and perhaps of Austria.

As to her German policy, the Soviet Government has set up in Moscow a German national committee which, despite Mr. Hull's statement to the contrary, is still very active. Stalin has made no secret of the fact. The Soviet Union certainly does not want to be dependent economically on the capitalistic nations of England and the United States. Therefore, it is repeatedly stressed in Soviet propaganda that Russia does not desire to destroy Germany, not even as a military power, but only demands a change in government. However, the Nazis have so successfully eliminated their domestic Communists that there is not available, in case of a German revolution, the party machinery necessary for setting up a German-Soviet government. The Soviet Union, therefore, must achieve its ultimate purpose in several stages, the first being to assure a sort of democratic government in Germany under which it will be possible to reorganize the German Communist Party. That the Soviet leaders have designs even further west is evidenced by the fact that Soviet agents work in France, where an armed Communist organization, the Riflemen, has already been organized.

It is easy to see that the political expansion of the Soviet sphere of influence westward, even to the narrow channel between France and England, constitutes exactly that menace which again and again has forced Britain into a very real war of survival. This has brought forth several significant expressions, the most important being the speech of the Prime Minister of South Africa, Field Marshal Smuts, immediately after the Teheran Conference, to which I have previously referred. He pointedly suggested the necessity for the British Empire to expand on the European Continent so as to include within the Commonwealth a number of the western European nations which, in the opinion of the marshal, cannot exist as independent states in the post-war power constellation, the implication being, of course, that they would become independencies of the Soviet Union. It is also being stressed in England that at the end of the war it will be urgent to rearm France—not for the sake of France, but for the protection of the British Isles.

The opinion is now being voiced in England that Germany must be maintained as a strong nation. That point of view has even been stressed in a recent editorial in the London Times, the semi-official voice of the British Foreign Office. A story recently featured in the London Daily Mail stated that there is an important group of members of the British Parliament who favor some kind of a compromise peace with Japan in order to maintain that country as one strong arm of a pincers strategy directed toward the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, we are largely financing this war. We are "oiling" it. We are sacrificing our men and our money to achieve victory; and victory we must and will achieve. We must continue to fight for principles even though the world around us may be fighting for power as an alternative to annihilation. To the extent to which we can make our American viewpoints prevail, to the extent to which we may be able to ameliorate the cruelties and the strife and suffering of the post-war world, we shall have achieved a great victory.

We must guard our own strength. We must keep America a strong, sane, solvent nation, because upon us rests the tremendous task of leading the rest of the world out of fear, hatred, and war into the paths of security, confidence, mutual good will, and peace.

Not in the history of man has a greater challenge or a more noble work confronted any nation or people. The American people will not fail civilization. Whether civilization fails America will be determined within the next generation.

Retirement of Charles P. Couch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. OVERTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mr. Couch Retires," published in the Shreveport (La.) Journal of April 5, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. COUCH RETIRES

The retirement of Charles Peter Couch as chairman of the board of directors of the Kansas City Southern-Louisiana & Arkansas railways, which was announced here and in New York on Tuesday, was heard with genuine regret throughout the entire territory in which he has been for several years a powerful business and industrial factor. He had been closely associated with his brother, Harvey C. Couch, in various big enterprises in this area, succeeding him as head of the merged railway lines—the Louisiana & Arkansas, the old Louisiana Railway & Navigation Co., and the Kansas City Southern.

The operation of these lines under one management proved a great forward step, industrially, agriculturally, and in a business way—one of the greatest that has ever been made in this section. It provided a direct connection between Kansas City, the northern terminal, and the great port of New Orleans, from which the Kansas City Southern had been shut off. The finest and fastest of services, both freight and passenger, were provided, with Shreveport as the hub of operations, and under the Couch management the lines proved successful beyond the highest hopes of those who watched the merger from the beginning.

The system created by the Couch brothers specialized not only in upbuilding of the railroad lines included in the merger, but in the material improvement of every section of the country touched. Through the efforts of the late Harvey C. Couch, and those put forth by his brother C. P. (Pete) Couch, scores of new industries have been established in the territory served by their railway lines and the whole area has enjoyed an era of prosperity that might otherwise have passed it by. They were largely responsible for the great paper mills at Springhill, to cite an instance; their activities along such lines, however, were scattered over a wide section of the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas.

While full results of the changes made in the Kansas City Southern-Louisiana & Arkansas management are not yet discernible, C. P. Couch expressed the confident hope (in announcing his retirement) that the policy of development pursued under his direction would be continued. In this attitude he will have the support of many thousands of friends in the territory served by the railroads concerned, and especially in the city of Shreveport where he has made his home and where he is exceedingly popular. Mr. Couch is a builder and business-getter with few peers in any part of the country. Knowing the railroad business from the ground up, he has seen to it that the physical properties of the roads under his direction have been kept in the best condition; incidentally, these lines have met every requirement as to freight and passenger service. They have handled vast amounts of Army supplies and personnel for the many military camps and war plants, and with complete satisfaction to all concerned; this greatly enlarged volume of business has taxed all of the Couch-directed lines to full capacity, but they have come through in fine style. We do not hesitate to say that Pete Couch, with his great energy and ability, has been very largely responsible for these splendid achievements.

Additional Pay for the Members of the Armed Forces Engaged in Combat Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 21 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, under the leave granted me I present for printing in the RECORD the Gallup poll appearing in the Washington Post of April 21, 1944, and the radio address delivered by me on April 6, both having to do with the bill introduced by me providing additional pay for members of the armed forces who are engaged in combat service.

The poll and the address delivered by Senator TOBEY are as follows:

[From the Washington Post of April 21, 1944]

EXTRA COMBAT PAY FAVORED BY PUBLIC FOR FRONT SOLDIERS

(By George Gallup)

PRINCETON, N. J., April 20.—Newspaper Columnist Ernie Pyle's contention that foot soldiers ought to have their pay raised when they are at the fighting fronts meets with the approval of the vast majority of the American people.

Bills embodying such a proposal are being sponsored in the House of Representatives by Representative SAMUEL WEISS and in the Senate by Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY.

A survey of public opinion across the Nation on the issue discloses that 7 out of every 10 voters think servicemen who are in combat should be upped 50 percent in pay.

What makes the vote more significant is that a majority—three out of five—say they are willing to pay increased taxes necessary to meet the costs of the pay boosts.

Overseas soldiers in or out of combat already get 10 percent above base pay, and paratroopers and some specialists also get extra pay.

The question asked of a carefully selected cross section of voters in every State was this:

"It has been suggested that American servicemen who take part in actual fighting should get a 50-percent increase in pay. Should Congress pass such a law?"

The national results:

	Percent
Yes	70
No	23
No opinion	7

Similar high majorities approving the increases for combat servicemen are to be found in every major section of the country. This is shown in the following table giving the vote on the question by sections:

Vote by sections

	Yes	No	No opinion
	Percent	Percent	Percent
New England and Middle Atlantic	72	21	7
East Central	71	22	7
West Central	68	26	6
South	67	25	8
Mountain and far west	67	25	8

Here are the results when voters are asked if they would be willing to meet higher taxes to finance the pay increases:

"Would you, yourself, be willing to pay higher taxes to make this possible?"

The results:

	Percent
Yes	60
No	8
No opinion	9
Disapprove of plan	23

COMBAT PAY

Tonight I speak to you on behalf of the nurses and fighting ground troops of our armed forces and to explain the features of a bill which I introduced in the United States Senate on March 16 to provide for a 50 percent increase in the monthly pay of our men in the fox holes and mud of the combat areas and our nurses serving in these combat areas.

The suggestion came to me a few weeks ago direct from the Anzio beachhead in an article written by Ernie Pyle, Scripps-Howard writer, who has been on an extended tour of the fighting fronts, and more recently has been with our boys on the Anzio beachhead. He writes as follows. I quote:

"In my usual role of running other people's business, I've been threshing around with an idea. It's to give the combat soldier some little form of recognition more than he is getting now.

"Everybody who serves overseas, no matter where or what he's doing, gets extra pay. Enlisted men get 20 percent additional and officers 10 percent.

"Airmen get an extra 50 percent above this for flight pay. As a result, officer-flyers get 60 percent above their normal base pay and enlisted flyers, such as gunners and radio operators, get 70 percent.

"All that is fine and as it should be, but the idea I was toying with is why not give your genuine combat ground soldier something corresponding to flight pay? Maybe a good phrase for it would be 'fight pay.'

"Of any 1,000,000 men overseas, probably no more than 100,000 are in actual combat with the enemy. But as it is now, there is no official distinction between the dog face lying for days and nights under constant mortar fire on an Italian hill and the headquarters clerk living comfortably in a hotel in Rio de Janeiro.

"Their two worlds are so far apart the human mind can barely grasp the magnitude of the difference. One lives like a beast and dies in great numbers. The other is merely working away from home. Both are doing necessary jobs, but it seems to me the actual warrior deserves something to set him apart. And medals are not enough.

"When I was at the front the last time, several infantry officers brought up this same suggestion. They say combat pay would mean a lot to the fighting man. It would put him into a proud category and make him feel that somebody appreciates what he endures.

"Obviously no soldier would ever go into combat just to get extra fight pay. That isn't the point. There is not enough money in the world to pay any single individual his due for battle suffering.

"But it would put a mark of distinction on him, a recognition that his miserable job was a royal one, and that the rest of us were aware of it."

No one of us here in America can have an adequate conception of what goes through a man's mind and the extension of his hardship and suffering as he faces the full and continued blast of enemy fire, day after day and night after night, under the most trying of conditions. He feels alone and apart from the rest of the world. For him life may be a matter of minutes, hours, or days. All that he has cherished he has left behind him here in America. The least we can do is to give him some small but material recognition—the same recognition, in fact, that we have been giving for years to men and officers engaged in flight duty, submarine duty, and parachute duty where such activity is held to be hazardous.

Before introducing my bill for additional pay to our men in actual combat, I carefully reviewed the committee report and laws passed by both branches of the Congress from as far back as 1913. Few have known how long-standing is this principle of giving additional compensation to men serving in what the lawmakers have termed hazardous occupations. In that year of 1913 the Congress provided an additional pay of 35 percent for officers serving on aviation duty. In 1914 this service was extended from officers to aviation students who were given 25 percent additional pay and to military aviators who were given 75 percent additional pay, when engaged in flight duty.

There is no sound reason why our ground troops who are actually participating in battle should not be placed in the same position as our parachute troops, our men in the submarine service, and our flying men. No man can say that they are not all in equally hazardous duty.

In 1941 the Congress enacted a law providing a minimum additional pay for parachute troops of $50. Let me read from a letter which Secretary of War Stimson wrote on March 7, 1941, to the Chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, recommending this additional pay for parachute troops and, as I read it, see if you do not agree with me that the same reasons advanced by the Secretary of War on behalf of the parachute troops do not apply with equal force to our ground troops lying in the fox holes and mud in actual combat. I quote:

"DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: There is enclosed the draft of a bill to provide for increased pay for certain military personnel while engaged on parachute duty which the War Department presents for consideration of the Congress with a view to its enactment into law. * * * The purpose of this proposed legislation is to authorize increased pay for the officers and warrant officers who participate in this hazardous type of duty. * * * It is obvious that this personnel incur greater risks than those who fly as passengers or pilots of military aircraft for, in addition to the hazard of injury or death due to a crash of the airplane, there is the constant and continuous risk of the parachute jump which must be made as a routine operation not required by other flying personnel."

As a result of this request of the War Department, the Congress on June 3, 1941, passed a law granting its officers in the parachute division additional pay at the rate of $100 per month and providing $50 per month additional pay to enlisted men in the parachute division. This increase was granted solely with a view to the risks involved in that type of service.

It is not questioned that the risks and hardships being experienced by our ground troops in actual combat are just as great, and I hold that they are entitled to the same consideration.

On April 6, 1942, Secretary of the Navy Knox wrote to Speaker RAYBURN, of the House of Representatives, recommending enactment of proposed legislation to extend the increase in pay provision for officers and men serving on submarine duty. In favorably reporting the bill the House Committee on Naval Affairs wrote in part as follows:

"Since the pay authorized for diving operations is designed as compensation for hazardous duty, the committee is of the opinion that it should accrue to a person whether such duty is performed in depth greater or less than 90 feet, so long as it is in fact of a hazardous nature."

On June 27, 1942, the Congress enacted this bill into law and the bill had been introduced at the request of the Navy Department. Again I saw the same reasons for passage of that bill for men in the submarine service apply with equal, if not greater force, to my bill to provide for similar recognition to our men of the ground forces in the actual combat areas.

The question presented by my bill is, Shall the members of our armed forces who are engaged in the hazards of actual combat service be given the same recognition that we give to our men in submarine and flight service? The men in submarine and flight service receive additional pay on the ground that they are engaged in hazardous duties.

Let us not forget that our ground forces engaged in actual combat are face to face with the enemy in an all-out death struggle.

They know what it is to wait in the night for the second and the third and the fourth and the endless counterattacks that are inevitable. They are the ones who become prisoners of war. They are the ones who lie in the yellow mud and face the hazards of disease and wounds. They are the ones for us to think of tonight and in the months to come.

If you feel that the man serving in the equally hazardous duty of actual combat is entitled to this same recognition that is being given to the man on submarine duty and in flight service, then you have the right and the opportunity to write to your Senator in Washington, asking him to support the Tobey bill, S. 1787. Your Senator will be glad to send you a copy of this bill if you make the request for it.

Now is the time for action. Tonight thousands of the men in our combat troops are in the thick of indescribable hardship and fighting on the Anzio beachhead, in other parts of Italy, and on the isles of the Pacific. Though we are bombing the cities of Europe day and night most Americans feel that in the great invasion to come it will be the ground troops—the men who crawl through the barbed wire and face the machine guns and the enemy mortar fire—who will meet the test of actual invasion and bring final victory to the United Nations. It is to them that we owe a debt which we can never pay. It is of them that we are thinking tonight as we consider this bill to give them the recognition which they more than deserve.

Modern warfare is waged through many activities. Each complements and supports the others.

There is the onslaught of broadsides from our naval ships, preparing the way for invasion and advance of ground troops.

There is the work of demolition and destruction, so terrible in its results, as hundreds of tons of bombs are dropped from our great bombing planes.

There is the effective work of our artillery, as it sets up barrage after barrage of shell fire to destroy enemy positions and supply stations.

But in the last great effort to take enemy positions, and to clean out its forces, it has long been recognized that our final reliance must be on the infantry, the foot soldier, the combat troops.

So they carry on, bravely meeting the savage onrush of the enemy, digging in to hold their advance, facing the most trying experiences of warfare, often coming to grips with the enemy in fierce hand-to-hand fighting.

I hold a brief for these combat troops, and I maintain that justice and gratitude should stimulate us to give them the recognition of their heroism in our behalf.

As we live our lives here at home, enjoying the daily contacts with family and friend, remote from the actual conflict, and the hell our boys are going through that we may be victorious, let us put ourselves in their place, as far as we can visualize it, and by enacting this legislation, give them tangible evidence of the love and gratitude we hold for them.

Price Control Renewal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Price Control Renewal," published in the April 19, 1944, issue of the New Orleans Times-Picayune.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRICE CONTROL RENEWAL

Seemingly the report made by the four chiefs of the Nation's economic stabilization program to the White House the other day knocked some of the support from under the plan to rewrite and soften the price-wage-control law, now up for renewal. When Stabilization Director Vinson, O. P. A. Director Bowles, War Food Administrator Jones, and W. L. B. Chairman Davis put their names to the report, they destroyed much of the argument that was being used by various groups with various axes to grind to obtain relaxation of several features of the law.

One of the strong groups wants food subsidies prohibited so that agricultural products can seek their own price level. In other words, it wants the law changed to allow farm prices to rise. Another group has inveighed against the provisions authorizing wage ceilings and demanded their modification. But it is not easy to press such demands in face of a showing that the price-and-wage line is beginning to hold in all sectors without prejudice either to the wage earners or to farmers as a group.

Pressure blocs are aware that public support for stabilization and the enforcement of ceilings has steadily increased and that the report is likely to intensify it. That considerably lessens their chances of persuading Congress to recede.

The public attitude now is strongly reflected on Capitol Hill, where the fight over control seems to have declined into an effort to have the function of the O. P. A. and the War Food Administration consolidated into one agency to eliminate present confusion and contradiction in policies. But that undertaking is likely to fail in view of the evidence that both agencies now are achieving results, and either agency may be expected strongly to oppose any plan to have it take over the activities of the other.

It looks as if what was regarded as the hottest issue in Congress before the summer adjournment may turn out to be a rather mild argument. It may be that stabilization and its administration have passed from the picture as a serious political issue.

Extension of the Lend-Lease Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Encouraging Vote," published in the Baltimore Evening Sun of April 20, 1944. The editorial deals with the vote in the House of Representatives on the extension of the Lend-Lease Act.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENCOURAGING VOTE

The country has reason to be thankful that the House has again extended the Lend-Lease Act, for it has been made apparent that the operations carried on under this measure are essential to the prosecution of the war. Indeed, it was quite unthinkable that in this momentous phase of the conflict there could be any alteration of a major and basic wartime policy. The House has shown no disposition to consider any such alteration, and there is no reason to suppose that the Senate will be of a different mind.

It is true that a somewhat larger group of Representatives voted against extension of lend-lease legislation on this occasion than before. Even so, the adverse tally was so small as to be negligible—21 against 334—an indisputable showing of what undoubtedly is the overwhelming sentiment of the Nation. The isolationist views of some sections of middle western opinion obviously do not have any real authority; moreover, it is worth noting that in the House some of the negative votes were cast by men like Representatives KNUTSON, REED of New York, and WOODRUFF of Michigan, who are hold-overs from the Harding period. On the whole, the vote was so heavily in favor of continuance of lend-lease provisions as to give great grounds for encouragement.

The amendment to the act, adopted by a voice vote and stating that no final settlements shall be made by the President except "in accordance with established constitutional procedure," is designed to protect congressional authority in making post-war arrangements. Presumably, it is meant to put at rest fears that the administration would bypass the House and Senate by assuming future international obligations under the act's stipulation that "the benefit of the United States may be payment or repayment in kind or property, or any other direct or indirect benefit which the President deems necessary." However, the force of this amendment does not seem great, in view of the administration's disposition to consult Congress in such matters. Secretary Hull's recent proposal that the House and Senate create bipartisan groups to advise with the State Department in handling foreign policy shows that Congress would have been consulted even without this amendment.

Post-War Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, at the request of my colleague, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement called A Yardstick by Which to Measure Plans for Post-War Peace. This statement was worked out by John D. Pearmain and associates, an organization called Toward Freedom, Inc.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A YARDSTICK BY WHICH TO MEASURE PLANS FOR POST-WAR PEACE

APRIL 14, 1944.

Believing that a yardstick or standard of comparison is needed against which to measure plans for post-war peace, we submit the following as such a standard.

Do the terms of any post-war plan in question make provision for:

1. Establishment and maintenance of law and order between nations?
2. Orderly progress toward self-government for colonial and subject peoples?
3. Protection of existing civil liberties against overthow by force?
4. Equality of opportunity between nations and races?
5. Access by all, for purposes of peace, to raw materials and trade?
6. International agreement on conservation of natural resources?

And, to implement these principles, do the terms of any plan in question make provision for:

7. Establishment or reconstruction of an international organization, participated in on a democratic basis by all peoples, having judicial, legislative, and executive powers with effective control of the means necessary to enforce its decisions in support of such principles.

A plan for post-war peace which seeks anything less than these first principles will, we submit, be regarded as a betrayal of the hopes and desires of mankind by all but those blinded by narrow nationalism and prejudice.

We believe that such a yardstick is essential this time if we are to win both the war and the peace.

JOHN D. PEARMAIN,
Chairman, Toward Freedom, Inc.
ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX.

The Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THEODORE G. BILBO
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most convincing and logical presentation of the anti-poll-tax question, by Mr. Mark Sullivan, which appeared in the Washington Post yesterday. It is unanswerable, and I invite the attention of Senators to the article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLL TAX, LIKE WAR VOTE, INVOLVES STATE RIGHTS; SENATE CAN'T LOGICALLY REVERSE DECISION

(By Mark Sullivan)

The expectation is that within a short time the poll tax will again come before the Senate. This will raise an issue broader than the poll tax itself, an issue on which this Congress has already come to a striking decision a few weeks ago.

When soldier voting was before Congress the issue was not whether soldiers should have the opportunity to vote—on that there was practically literal unanimity. The real issue was how the voting should be done, whether by a ballot authorized by the Federal Government or by ballots authorized by State governments.

The debate started from the existing condition. At present voting is exclusively a State function. The question was whether, as respects voting by soldiers on the battle fronts, part of this function should be transferred to the Federal Government. For such a departure there were appealing arguments—voting by a Federal ballot would relieve the Army of much work and difficulty. And there was some justification—in the emergency of war there is always justification for temporarily giving enlarged powers and functions to the Federal Government.

STATES TO RUN VOTING

Nevertheless, after weeks of debate, Congress decided that soldier voting should be carried on exclusively by the States. In the law as written the Federal Government has no part except that of carrying State ballots to the soldiers, collecting them, and returning them to the States. Although the law authorizes use of a Federal ballot under some exceptional conditions, this ballot can be used only when and after a State has specifically authorized it.

The States are kept in complete possession of the whole authority and function. So far as the Federal Government has any part in soldier voting, it is as a messenger and carrier serving the States, in some cases an agent acting by authority of the States.

The reason Congress came to this decision was a widespread feeling that over a period of years the Federal Government has been encroaching upon the States. Congress felt that for such encroachment to extend to the function of voting would be dangerous to the very existence of the States as units of government. Voting is the most fundamental function any unit of government can have. To lose it, even partially, would be a dangerous step in the direction of almost extinction.

IT'S THE SAME ISSUE

Now, within 2 months of having come to this solemn conclusion, the Senate is to be asked, in effect, to reverse the conclusion. The proposal to abolish the poll tax, by action of Congress, raises exactly the same issue.

The poll tax, as a requirement for voting, is practiced in eight States. If it should be abolished by Congress, then Congress—that is, the Federal Government—would be telling these eight States that they must drop one of their voting requirements. And if Congress can tell eight States that they cannot have one requirement for voting, it can by the same authority tell other States that they cannot have other requirements. If Congress can abolish the poll-tax requirement in Texas, it can, in every other State, abolish other requirements which the States have—requirements having to do with citizenship, length of residence in the State or voting district, and the like.

The principle and precedent would be established that requirements for voting are a Federal function, to be exercised whenever the Federal Government chooses.

The merit or demerit of the poll tax is not the question. In late years public opinion has come to disapprove it. Formerly it existed in many States—in Pennsylvania as late as 15 years ago, in Massachusetts as late as 50 years ago. In the South, where it still remains, it is being abolished, State by State. Florida and Louisiana have repealed it during the last few years. Movements to repeal it are under way in three of the eight States that still have it.

If the poll tax is disappearing by action of the States, why should Congress act? The question should be answered by those who propose the pending measure. Without imputing particular motives to individuals and conceding that many who favor the proposed measure are moved solely by disapproval of the poll tax as such, nevertheless a motive for insisting on action by the Federal Government suggests itself. Such a motive would be to establish a precedent—that Congress can control voting requirements in any and all States. And, regardless of motive, there would be a sure effect. The breaking down of the States, the movement toward one great centralized Government at Washington would be furthered.

In the discussion about to take place a point should be remembered, in order to avoid confusion that has befogged the issue. The poll tax should be clearly distinguished from practices in some Southern States which distinguish between Negroes and whites, such as the one recently invalidated by the Supreme Court. The poll tax, where it exists, is universal—applies to whites precisely the same as Negroes. Whites and Negroes alike can pay the poll tax of a dollar or two a year and vote—or not pay it and not vote. To introduce the word Negro into discussion of the poll tax is as unjustifiable as to introduce Swede or Norwegian. Yet Negro, and another unjustified word, discrimination, have appeared over and over in arguments for the measure.

Night Club Mortality

REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention of the Members of this House to an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning, April 24, 1944. The title of this article is "Night Club Mortality"; think of it—night-club mortality. It states that some 15,000 cabaret performers will be looking for jobs about May 1 because the 30-percent tax on night-club checks will close their honky-tonks and hot spots. Well sir, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason for these people to be looking for jobs. The farmers in my district can use every one of them, so can the sawmills and the pulp mills. Agriculture, lumbering, and paper manufacturing are all essential industries producing for the war effort. All are short on labor, and if these singers and dancers feel that work in the fields, or woods, or mills is something they cannot do—then let me remind them that the armed forces are short on manpower, too. I am sure the ground forces of the Army that took 36,000 highly trained Air Corps cadets to help augment its desperate need can use the men and I know the Women's Army Corps is way short on enlistments and can use all the girls, so can the WAVES and SPARS and the Nurse Corps who are also still recruiting. And remember, every woman enlisting replaces a man for active duty. But read the editorial. I think it sums up the situation nicely.

NIGHT CLUB MORTALITY

The 30-percent tax on cabarets that went into effect on April 1 has already resulted in a high rate of mortality. Many establishments have closed their doors or are preparing to do so. Numerous restaurants have omitted the dancing and entertainment features that caused them to be classified as cabarets. The result, in both cases, has been to throw out of employment large numbers of dancers and entertainers. According to an official of the American Guild of Variety Artists, about 15,000 cabaret performers will be looking for new jobs by May 1.

Consequently Congress is being importuned to slash the 30-percent tax and give cabarets a renewed lease on life. One of the arguments advanced is that the next bond drive will suffer for lack of the services heretofore donated to the Treasury by performers resentful of the Government's discriminatory tax program. This dire prediction is not likely to cause Treasury officials sleepless nights, although it is true that many professional entertainers have been most generous in assisting the effort to sell bonds and further war activities.

While we sympathize with the plight of dismissed entertainers who may be too old or physically incapable of undertaking essential war work, we conclude that the evidence offered to support the demand for a reduction of the cabaret tax is an excellent argument in favor of its retention. For citation of the havoc wrought by the tax increase focuses public attention most unfavorably upon the enormous numbers of cabarets and cocktail bars that are exacting toll from pleasure seekers in the big cities at a time when the country desperately needs able-bodied men and women to fill gaps in essential industries created by the draft. Although a reasonable amount of amusement is essential as a morale builder and as a means of relaxation for hard-working civilians, it is neither essential nor desirable for a country engaged in all-out war to encourage the people to spend huge sums on luxury entertainment. The manpower utilized in maintaining cabarets is much greater than is generally assumed. For there are not only the entertainers to consider, but also those who provide dance music and equipment as well as the showmanship that makes the whole system function.

Congress raised the cabaret tax, along with other levies on luxury articles, not simply for the sake of revenue but also for the purpose of cutting down inflationary spending. The fact that the cabaret tax has worked toward that end by eliminating a good deal of the flashy entertainment that is an excrescence of war-induced prosperity is an encouraging indication that the American public is not scattering money about without counting the cost.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that if these cabaret entertainers are IV–F or overage and cannot get in the armed services, then they can still do their bit on the farms and in war industries. And for those who still want to sleep in the daytime arrangements can be made, even with the farmers, who in my district are plowing at night and any other time the weather will permit. The farmers need the labor, the war cost needs the tax.

Farmer's Loss on Feeding Lambs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, on July 5, 1943, I called the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. William Schlicht, of Manchester, Mich., had purchased 1,050 lambs in the autumn of 1942 and had sold them on the market in mid-summer of 1943.

In that speech, found on page A3461, was included correspondence with Mr. Schlicht which showed that the lambs cost him $18,202.17, and that he received $10,500 for their sale on the market.

These lambs were sheared before marketing; therefore, after they were sold Mr. Schlicht had in his possession the wool, in which he had an investment of $7,702.17. On July 13, 1943, this wool was sold on the market through Kerr & Kerr, of Coldwater, Mich. Mr. Schlicht has supplied me with a copy of the sales account which is, in part, as follows:

Authorized deductions

Commodity Credit Corporation service, at $1.12½ per hundredweight	$106.12
Primary handler, at $1.50 per hundredweight	141.50
Grading, at 75 cents per hundredweight	70.75
Secondary handler	141.50
Country service	None
In-bound freight	None
Out-bound freight, 9,590 pounds, at 81 cents per hundredweight, plus 3 percent	50.01
Trucking, 9,590 pounds at 8 cents per hundredweight	7.67
Reappraisal (if any).
Total deductions	547.55
Amount due producer or second handler	3,644.88
Second handler charge	141.50
Gross amount	3,786.38

Total net weight, 9,433 pounds.

Mr. Schlicht calls special attention to the Commodity Credit Corporation service deduction of $106.12. He insists that no service was rendered warranting any such deduction, and at his request I am calling the attention of the proper Senate and House committees to this entire transaction.

To summarize, Mr. Schlicht, as stated in my previous remarks, is a typical lamb feeder in my State. Lambs are purchased from the ranges in the fall, fed throughout the winter, and sold in the spring or summer on the market. It will be observed that no charge has been made by the farmer for his labor. Nevertheless, the entire cost to him of the original shipment was $18,202.17. He received $10,500 for the sale of the lambs. He received $3,644.88 for the sale of the wool. Therefore, his net loss on the transaction was $4,057.29. I cannot stress too strongly the words "net loss."

Mr. Schlicht's experience has been the experience of many lamb feeders. How long can the farmer be asked to take such losses? If we are to have food and fiber, then the producers of this food and fiber must be allowed at least the actual cost plus a reasonable profit.

I am calling this matter to the attention of the Congress, to its committees, to the Department of Agriculture, and all other Government agencies having to do with the control of sales and prices entering into the cost of farm production. I cannot urge too strongly that immediate action be taken to prevent such losses to our farmers in the future.

Report of Farm Security Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and table:

FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION,
MILWAUKEE COUNTY COURTHOUSE,
Milwaukee, Wis., March 29, 1944.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: Recently we received and acknowledged several requests from Congressmen in this region for specific information relative to Farm Security Administration activities in their respective congressional districts and States. They were interested in knowing the number of families Farm Security had helped, amount of loan funds advanced, the repayments made, etc.

It has occurred to me that you too would be interested in similar data relative to your congressional district and to your State as a whole. I am taking the liberty of forwarding such data to you.

No reference is made in our compilations as to the families that have been able to join cooperatives through F. S. A. participation loans, nor to the families helped through feed and seed loans during the drought years.

Very truly yours,

HARRY S. MUIR,
Regional Director.

Report as of Dec. 31, 1943, on Farm Security Administration activities in region II (Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin)

Congressional district	Number families helped through rural rehabilitation loans [1]	Rural rehabilitation loan funds advanced	Principal repaid, rural rehabilitation	Number farm-ownership loans made [2]	Farm-ownership loan funds advanced	Principal repaid, farm-ownership
WISCONSIN
First	1,366	$1,118,860	$736,194	7	$65,780	$10,451
Second	1,121	1,021,633	675,578	48	426,962	53,852
Third	5,184	4,079,214	2,490,685	144	1,042,691	157,902
Fourth and Fifth	145	55,092	31,771	0	0	0
Sixth	391	352,498	200,531	34	298,105	41,618
Seventh	6,582	2,480,836	1,620,723	163	398,966	24,959
Eighth	2,793	1,341,732	790,162	87	169,120	9,710
Ninth	10,184	4,681,131	3,077,200	307	1,204,078	136,801
Tenth	11,246	3,861,906	2,477,689	483	951,629	77,107
Wisconsin total	39,012	18,992,902	12,100,533	1,273	4,557,331	512,400
Region II total [3]	105,485	59,299,220	34,159,397	3,421	13,343,870	1,606,538

[1] Rehabilitation (chattel operating loans).
[2] Farm-ownership loans (real-estate loans).
[3] Region II comprised of States of Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin.

What About France?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include what I consider as a timely article entitled "French Renascence," written by Edgar A. Mowrer, and published in the Washington Post of April 22, 1944.

The article follows:

FRENCH RENASCENCE
(By Edgar A. Mowrer)
EUROPEAN FEDERATION

ALGIERS.—Defeat by the Germans, humiliation by their Allies, and—let us add—the sting of their own consciences have awakened in Charles de Gaulle a consuming passion to restore the grandeur, power, and prosperity of France. It is this passion that makes the stubborn general invulnerable to criticism of men like Roosevelt and Churchill when such criticism goes against what he considers the will of the French people in France. It is this passion that causes Frenchmen on the committee and in the consultative assembly to accept the leadership of this tall, insistent brigadier and his sometimes arbitrary ways. It is this passion that causes the French divisions fighting both in Tunisia and in Italy to earn the unstinted admiration of their British and American comrades by their indifference to danger and privation. It is this passion that has brought Frenchmen from the tail to the head of European resistance groups under the Nazis, so that for each of the hundreds of French patriots shot or exiled, two or three others kiss their lives goodby and join the good fight.

CONSCIOUS OF HIS MISSION

After dining with the general in his Moorish villa on a hilltop behind the shining city, I am convinced that he is intensely conscious of his mission, and, therefore, of the propriety of his remaining magnetic center of the French renascence and head of what he steadily calls, not the "Committee," but the "Provisional Government." People here deny he ever compared himself to Joan of Arc or Clemenceau, but if he did he means just what he said, like Joan, like the Tiger, he intends to pull France out of its historical slump.

Personally, I don't believe De Gaulle is a royalist, and he's certainly not as reactionary as certain American and British generals with whom I have dined in Washington and in London. He wants a reformed French republic with a strengthened executive closer to the American model. In his attitude to contradiction he reminds me of Roosevelt and Churchill. His leadership—in my opinion—is the result of his ability to give expression in words and action to the aspirations of the French people.

It must be understood that the Frenchmen you meet in Algiers, including newly arrived leaders of the French underground, have not accepted and don't intend to accept any diminution of French influence in the post-war world if they can help it. To them the French are still a great people and France a great power, temporarily in eclipse but bound to emerge again.

When they hear Allied talk of post-war rule by the United States, Great Britain, the Soviets, and China without France, they writhe with indignation. What they say is, Shall an empire of 100,000,000 like the French be classified probably after an organism like China? De Gaulle himself certainly doesn't admit the elimination of France from the Pacific. Algiers is full of vivid posters appealing to the people to "rescue Indochina." De Gaulle doesn't admit either that French influence will be eliminated from the Middle East, where, incidentally, he expects the Soviets to play a major role and "new developments are just commencing."

FRENCH ECONOMY

France, nearly everyone here believes, will be a reformed democracy. According to present plans one portion of French economy will be nationalized outright, one portion controlled by the state, and one portion will remain free. Next, the people in Algiers believe, France must again assume leadership of a united "Christian and liberal" western Europe. It is to secure this that the French troops are hoping to conquer Rome for the Allies.

De Gaulle personally expects speedy formation of a western European federation, including Scandinavia, the Low Countries, France, a new Italy, and democratic Spain. Practically everyone thinks that France, while remaining on the friendliest terms with the Soviets, will wish to work closely with Great Britain. Leading Frenchmen count primarily on the Soviets to eliminate the German danger for a long period, yet they admit that Stalin, if disappointed in his allies, might just prefer a not too prostrate Germany linked to Russia. Here in Algiers people still hesitate to believe in American willingness to join a world organization with real power.

Would the French themselves join such an organization with enthusiasm? My belief is yes, but only if Roosevelt and Churchill turn over a new page and decide to treat nascent France as an equal.

Confusion in the Barnyard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARION T. BENNETT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is confusion in the barnyard today. There has been confusion in the barnyard and market place since the war started. I would like to talk for a few minutes about some of the causes of this situation as it relates to the farmer and to offer some constructive suggestions on what we can do about it.

To reduce the farm problem to its simplest equation, I would say that the source of our trouble is in failure to heed the warning of that great Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, who said, "If we wait on the Government in Washington to tell us when to sow and reap we shall soon want for bread." Yes, for several years our farmers, instead of being left free to collect their profits at the stock scale and the elevator, have been encouraged to get their checks from some Federal employee with offices in the county seat.

WHAT IS THE FARM POLICY?

Let me make it clear that I believe the Government has an important educational function to perform for agriculture. That function has been performed efficiently and well through county agents. But, departing from the educational ideals of soil conservation and good farm management, a new idea has grown up in the minds of some of the bright boys who make their living by farming the farmers. This idea was most frankly and eloquently stated by one of the officials of the Department of Agriculture in the present administration. Mr. Franklin Carter, who served as an official in the Resettlement Administration in the Department of Agriculture under the New Deal, voiced his attitude toward the farmer in these shocking words, which I quote:

> The problem of farm relief will become not how shall we relieve the farmer, but who shall relieve us of the farmer? The farmer has abrogated to himself all virtue and all knowledge, he has voted against progress, against civilization, against the city, against science, against art. He has made and unmade Presidents in the image of Main Street. He has exhausted our soil as he will exhaust our Treasury if given half a chance. He is the great obstacle to human progress, the great threat to political stability. Sooner or later we shall discover, as England discovered, as Soviet Russia has discovered, that the pagan, the landed proprietor, the kulak, is simply so much mud on the path of progress and must be swept aside if society is to advance.

What do you think of one of our public servants, a high official in the present administration, a policy maker for the Department of Agriculture, making such a statement as that? Some might suggest we just dismiss that statement as another of the crazy and irresponsible rantings of one of the "brain trust" bureaucrats appointed by the President. But we cannot do that. We cannot lightly dismiss the statement. The reason we cannot dismiss it is that we have seen under cloak of various so-called emergencies the policy described by Mr. Carter being followed in the United States.

Let me call another witness. This witness is also an employee of the Department of Agriculture in the present administration. This witness is Dr. F. F. Elliott, in the office of the Chief Agricultural Economist of the Department of Agriculture. Dr. Elliott has recently been quoted as saying that part of the Government's plan for agriculture in postwar America is to move 20 percent of the farmers to the city whether they like it or not. Now, why should we reduce our farm population? Dr. Elliott answers that question by pointing to the administration plans to create a hugely industrialized United States with Latin America and other sections of the world supplying the food. The market will be controlled by the Government with fixed prices for the farmer, the market man, and the consumer.

CREATING FOREIGN COMPETITION

Already we see the outlines of this plan going into effect. American agriculture is being destroyed and foreign agriculture is being built up with American tax dollars. Food, including butter, meat, and grain, was being imported in competition with that produced by our own farmers even before the artificially created grain shortage here which has made us dependent on foreign grain for our livestock and poultry. The so-called Atlantic Charter calls for free trade in the post-war era. I could cite scores of examples. A few more will suffice, however. There is no serious farm machinery shortage in Mexico. We are providing Mexico with almost all of her farm machinery. We are, indeed, building factories at our own expense in South American countries to manufacture farm machinery for use by these foreign peoples. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHNSON] established here, to the dismay of Congress, just recently that about half a million items of our farm machinery badly needed by American farmers have been set aside for distribution abroad through the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

At the same time, production in this country is curtailed by excessive draft of farm labor, high wages in the war factories which have siphoned off much farm labor, and severe restrictions on distribution of farm machinery in this country. Our farmers have been paid not to grow things. Even with a sugar shortage the Federal Government paid beet-sugar farmers in Colorado not to plant sugar beets. We paid $1,067,665 to a corporation in Florida and $961,064 to our island possession, Puerto Rico, not to raise sugar. The total amount expended by the Federal Government to persuade persons and corporations not to raise sugar exceeds $41,000,000. I do not want to talk about too much water over the dam, but in passing I want to point out that when some of us were insisting that we did not have overproduction but rather underconsumption, that the answer to depression was more production, that those in power in Washington were plowing under and burning and knocking in the head food we now sadly need, food which is now rationed. Some of the good citizens of my congressional district were indicted in Federal court because they grew too much wheat, which ever since we have had to import. But enough of that.

COLLECTIVIST REGIMENTATION

We have seen, also, in the Sixth Missouri Congressional District, the effects of this policy against the farmer in establishment of the $1,078,150 Communist farm project in Bates County, which project I exposed in 1943 as a failure and requested Congress to halt before any more public funds were spent on it. Other projects of this kind cover the Nation. They are part of the new plan for a socialized and regimented agriculture. A plan to take the farmer's freedom and make him a ward of the Government. A plan to make him the scapegoat for Government failures and a whipping post for labor racketeers who have had the gravy while the farmer has been deplored and discriminated against in Washington. Speaking of regimentation, the House of Representatives on March 24, 1944, actually had to pass legislation prohibiting bureaucrats from continuing their policy, in certain areas of the country, in forcing farmers to join the triple A to get gasoline, machinery, fertilizer, and deferment as essential farm labor.

THE BUREAUCRATIC MERRY-GO-ROUND

The farmer is now confronted with conflicting policies which can only result in chaos for the Nation. The farmer is told he must increase his production. He has to make several gasoline, time, and rubber-tire consuming trips to the county seat to struggle with bureaucracy to get sufficient equipment. He finds that the bureaucrats have hamstrung him with rules and regulations and have even added to his woes by monkeying with the clock so that his labor quits in the middle of the afternoon and stores and ration boards are all closed up when the day's chores are done and he can finally go to town for supplies and official permissions. But, over these and other obstacles he gets out a big crop, goes in debt, raises more livestock and poultry, and works his daylights out at the request of his Government and on the assurance of his Government that he will be contributing to the war effort by so doing.

Then he picks up the morning newspaper and sees that the Administration overnight has abolished the unit plan, that all farmers under a certain age will be inducted into the Army regardless of the importance of their contribution to agriculture, that he has done too well and must bear the loss of a reduction in his poultry flocks and livestock, and that corn and other feeds will not be available because of price ceiling differences and other artificial, Washington-generated, New Deal blunders. Thousands of acres of land in my district will produce nothing but weeds, insects, and erosion this year because of that kind of inconsistent farm policy. And, the farm auctioneers will continue to profit.

What some bureaucrats in the executive department of this Government do not seem to understand is that farming is the largest business enterprise in America. Farming is a complicated, technical business. Many risks are involved. There is the weather risk, the price risk, the health risk, the insect risk, and the risk of insufficient manpower. On top of all this the farmer now has the risk of unwarranted Government meddling and controls. This is the greatest risk ever to confront the American farmer. It is the risk of losing his independence and the self-control of his affairs which has heretofore left him free to create the highest level of agricultural productivity and the highest rural standards of living in the world.

The farmer is not unpatriotic. He does not want to avoid military service if he is needed. But he simply wants, and is entitled to, fair play from his Government. He wants his Government to make up its mind about where he can serve the best and then to stick to that policy. The present treatment leaves only the conclusion that the administration farm policy was correctly stated by the Agriculture Department official, Franklin Carter, whom I have already quoted.

EXECUTIVE INCOMPETENCE

During this war, Mr. Speaker, the Government has dealt in piecemeal fashion with the various sides of our food question. Farm production has been within the province of the scores of bureaus and agencies of the Department of Agriculture. Farm equipment and machines for the processing of food is controlled by the War Production Board. Farm labor has been a joint headache of the War Manpower Commission and Selective Service. Transportation is in the hands of the Office of Defense Transportation. Price fixing has been in the hands of the O. P. A. and the rationing of food has also been directed and controlled by the O. P. A., but by conflicting agencies within O. P. A. Congress has insisted that the President appoint a single responsible Food Administrator, but he has not done so. Several able men who tried to bring order out of the food muddle and conflicting agencies resigned in disgust.

As a result, we have seen food wasted; food spoiling in Government storage; spoiled food released for civilian consumption; spoiled food, rationed food, put on the public dump. We have seen Government officials issuing crazy orders, such as the one by Edward R. Gay, Chief of Civilian Supply in the War Production Board, who told farmers to take off their horses' shoes each night to rest their horses' feet and save metal. We have seen unsound, expensive, and inflationary programs, such as consumer subsidies advanced, even though repeatedly rejected by Congress, and by each and every economist, except those on the Federal pay roll. It is a wonder that food production has not collapsed completely. The reason it has not is because of the patriotism of the farmer, the independent American farmer, who has, with his wife and children, worked from before daybreak until after dark, through rain and cold and heat, to feed our armies and our people. If the farmer could be given freedom from red tape, freedom from governmental restrictions, freedom from artificially generated forces which make it impossible for him to forecast from one day to another whether he will produce at a loss or a profit, then the farmer would be happy and prosperous and could multiply his production much easier.

WHAT DOES THE FARMER WANT?

I have had some people say to me lately, "You can never satisfy the farmer. He is always howling and dissatisfied." It is true that the farmer is never satisfied. We should thank our lucky stars for that. It is this spirit of always demanding something sounder and better that has made America the greatest nation in the world. If the American farmer had been satisfied, we would still be living in the days of the oxcart, the squirrel rifle, the ax, and the hoe. I might add that only the rugged, independent spirit of the farmer could have survived all that has been done to him by those who have professed to be doing for him in the past several years. But there is one thing our American farmer is very well satisfied with, indeed. That is our American Constitution and our republican form of government. He knows that under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights he has a chance to fight back at those who would seek to make him a political puppet, to be moved back and forth to satisfy the whims and ambitions of bureaucratic would-be dictators in seats of the mighty. The American farmer makes reasonable demands of his Government. He is asking simply for a guaranty of the cost of production, some machinery and fertilizer and protein feeds to produce with, some of his sons who understand farm work to help him, some common sense in rationing, freedom from confusing questionnaires and forms, and then he just wants to be left alone to do the day's work. Since he has often to work at night, he appreciates the rural electrification we have provided him, and some of us in Congress hope to extend after the war when materials are available to those who have not yet received its benefits.

I am grateful to the farmers of the Sixth Congressional District for loyally standing by me while I have represented them in Washington. I am grateful for the loyal support of all the farm organizations. I am grateful that my folks are farmers and my wife a farm girl for that brings me even closer to rural problems and helps explain why I can talk the farmers' language.

FARM INCOME

I know that the farmer does not have an easy time. Although he has made some small profit lately he has had many lean years through which it has been hard to hang on. His average monthly income of $62.43 still compares unfavorably to that of his city cousin's monthly average of $209.40. His worst enemy has been his best friend—the weather. Dame Nature, who was lavish in her gifts in 1942, quickly turned her back on men of the soil. She sent rains and floods which destroyed land, crops, poultry, livestock, and barns. But the farmer came back, as he always comes back. He devised short cuts to make his meager labor supply go around. With baling wire he kept his groaning machinery rolling and with a watchful eye cocked on Washington he made his own rules until the official ones came along. He saw the importance of his task, cooperated when cooperation speeded its completion, and fought back when others tried to impede its progress.

He talked and suggested. Yes, he disputed, too. But he worked while he talked. How well he worked is evident in bulging granaries, in the bawling animals that overflow the stockyards, in the milk and cream splashing through separators across the land. The Nation is short of food. We have rationing. Yes. But it is not the farmer's fault. And remember, the farmer has made American boys the best-fed fighting men in the world. He has sent nourishment to the fighting fronts of Russia and the bomb shelters of Britain. He furnished the first full meal in years to the liberated people along the Mediterranean shores. He gives substance to the belief of some that America must feed the world until it gets on its feet. Whether you subscribe to that theory or not, you must take your hat off to the man who, by his energy, skill, and ingenuity, has proved that he is big enough for the job. No other nation in the world could make such a boast based on the productive capacity of its farmers. As a contributor to the war effort, the farmer, despite Government handicaps, did well in 1942 and 1943. He says he will do still better in 1944. He deserves the cooperation of the public and of the Congress. I believe he knows from past experience that he can count on the understanding cooperation of his Representative in Congress from the Sixth Missouri Congressional District.

Tribute to His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. CURLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, the dean of the Catholic hierarchy in the United States has passed to his reward after a lifetime of service to God, to country, and to humanity. The rise from his humble home of immigrant parents, his father being a mill worker in the city of Lowell, to that of American leader of the Catholic faith is an achievement unsurpassed in the history of our country. William Cardinal O'Connell, whose death is mourned universally, was familiar with the hard road over which the poor were required to travel when he first saw the light of day. To overcome the trials and tribulations of youth and attain the priesthood bringing to that exalted office and the even more exalted one from which the angel of death called him, a realization that the material well-being of the individual was entitled to consideration in the same manner that the church gives consideration to the spiritual well-being. He never forgot, even in the exalted position held by him in later years, the long hours and the meager wages paid by the leading industry of the city where he first saw the light of day. I can well recall an address delivered by His Eminence at a meeting over which it was my pleasure to preside in November of 1930 of the American Federation of Labor, convening at that time in the city of Boston, when His Eminence in the presentation of his views as to the responsibilities of labor and capital made a notable contribution to the cause of organized labor.

It is a very great pleasure to all of us to welcome here in this beautiful church President Green and the officers and members of the American Federation of Labor. This association which began as all great things begin, very humbly and quietly, has grown to be of gigantic proportions. This association contributes not only to the welfare of the individual members of the organization, but to the whole country, and indeed, to the whole world. It is rather a singular thing to look back a very short time, even within our own life, and remember the apathy, the indifference which capital, the employer, had for laborers. The laborer was paid the smallest possible pittance. His condition was despised, his labor sweated and he was cheated out of his wages by a type of inhuman employer who had not heart for his employee and no brains to understand his responsibilities. It is almost incredible that that condition should exist in our lives.

In those early days, so changed from what they are even in our own lifetime, it is hard to realize that such hard-hearted greed and inhuman oppression could exist among the very class that prided themselves on their moral and intellectual superiority.

Finally the day came when the great Leo XIII raised his voice, and that voice was so just and so strong that the power of no one could close his ears to it. It was the voice of Leo calling out to employer and employee, to labor and capital, to cease in God's name this bitter fratricidal war and come to terms of understanding and cooperation. It was that voice which said that the basis for success was not greed and power, but cooperation.

From that day the rights of the laboring man have been more and more respected, until today the laboring man understands perfectly well the dignity of his life, he understands perfectly well that brutal greed and oppression will crush him and ruin him unless there is cooperation on both sides. Why is it that those who possess wealth, the greedy capitalist, the tyrannical boss, continue the quest for gold and more gold? It is insanity, but we see it all around us.

But in these days the laboring man has a voice that must be heard. My dear men of the Federation of Labor, lift up your hearts and thank God and ask Him to preserve you from the greed of the rich, the heartless rich, not the rich who have plenty and who are all the time trying to do something for their neighbor. God bless them. I am not condemning them, I am talking about the greedy, wealthy, heartless rich.

May God's blessing rest upon you, as it does rest upon you here this morning, and may the times which we all hope for be brought about so that this land will be what it really was intended to be, a blessed land of peace and prosperity.

It was my very great privilege to have served 12 years as mayor of Boston and 2 years as Governor of Massachusetts during the period that His Eminence held the exalted office of cardinal and our relations at all times proved most cordial. It was likewise my very great pleasure as mayor of Boston to appoint His Eminence as a trustee of the Boston Public Library Department, to which position he brought a wealth of attainments, possible to few other men in the Nation. He was not only great as a leader of his faith but as an executive he displayed most unusual attainments, since under his administration Catholic charities of every character were expanded and kept free from debt. The contribution to Catholic education during his administration was most notable, parochial schools being found in every section of the archdiocese and on the lintel over the entrance to each school the motto "For God and country." The motto "For God and country" was ever his guidance and inspiration and it is the sincere wish of all privileged to know him that he may rest in peace after a lifetime of service and sacrifice to God and humanity.

The Case of Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN B. BENNETT
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, according to a dispatch in the Washington Star of yesterday, the Soviet peace terms were rejected by Finland. The Russian terms were as follows:

1. Rupture with Germany and immediate internment of enemy armies and warships, or their expulsion before the end of April.
2. Restoration of the Finnish-Soviet treaty of 1940 and withdrawal of Finnish troops to the 1940 frontier.
3. Immediate repatriation of Russian and Allied prisoners and civilian internees. This repatriation to be reciprocal.
4. Fifty percent demobilization of the Finnish Army.
5. Reparations of $600,000,000, payable in 5 years.
6. Return of Petsamo to Russia.
7. If these conditions are accepted the Soviet Government will renounce its claim to Hango without compensation.

These terms do not embody any mere armistice or conditions upon which a cessation of hostilities only is to be effected. On the contrary they embody final, uncompromising and permanent conditions of peace. Everyone agrees upon the desirability of getting Finland out of the war. But ought it reasonably to be expected that this small country ought to agree to its own national destruction in order to obtain peace?

The Soviet Union has completely ignored the Atlantic Charter in its peace negotiations with Finland. Most of the major conditions laid down by the Soviet Union, such as reparations and boundaries, are questions which involve the settlement of permanent peace. All such questions ought to be settled at a peace conference in which all of the Allies are represented.

If this country is going to silently acquiesce in the piecemeal settlement of international problems before the war is ended, what will there be left to decide when peace finally comes? If we do not adopt a uniform pattern during the progress of this war by which the settlement of permanent questions will be delayed until peace finally comes, we will be circumvented into frustration at the final peace conference. If the Russians enter into peace settlements with the Finns and other small nations during the progress of the war, who will be in a position to challenge such settlements at a later date, even though they may be contrary to every concept of international justice and fairness?

We better watch our step from now on, Mr. Speaker, or we may find that peace settlements, interim agreements, unilateral commitments might pave the way for another Versailles.

I hope that peace will shortly come between the Finns and the Russians in accordance with those principles of common fairness and justice for which our boys are fighting so valiantly.

The American Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the following splendid address by the distinguished mayor of Knoxville, Tenn., the Honorable E. E. Patton, is timely, and I am glad to insert it in the RECORD for the benefit of the Nation:

A great American has well said: "The thoughtful mind, when it sees a nation's flag, sees not a flag only, but the nation itself, and whatever may be its symbol, its insignia, he reads chiefly in the flag the government, the principles, the truths, the history which belong to the nation.

"When the French tricolor rolls out on the wind we see France. When the united crosses of St. Andrew and St. George, on a fiery ground, set forth the banner of old England, we see not the cloth merely; there rises up before the mind the noble aspect of that monarchy which, more than any on the globe, has advanced its banner for liberty, law, and national prosperity."

When you see the flag of America—the flag of freedom—you envision 13 small and sparsely settled colonies along the Atlantic seaboard, daring to fight that they might have liberty of conscience and freedom of the mind and body under law and right and justice.

We see Washington and his committee visit Betsy Ross, the Quaker seamstress, with their design for a new emblem for a new country, fighting for its very life and existence. We see the stripes unfold, the stars shine forth in all their glory, the most symmetrical and the most beautiful flag in the world.

We see the Continental Congress, on the 14th of June 1777, pass the shortest act in the history of the world: "Resolved, That the flag of the 13 United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

This flag of ours had its birth in the trials and tribulations, the storm and stress of war; bathed in blood and tears, it shines forth a beacon light for all the oppressed of earth; it is the world's last, best hope for democratic ideals. May God protect it and preserve it is the prayer of every loyal and patriotic American.

When the flag was born, this Nation had a population of 3,000,000 souls; now it has a population of 135,000,000. By thrift and courage, persistency, and perseverance, our ancestors carried that flag across the great rivers, over the waterless and treeless deserts, over the snow-covered mountains, and in 250 years they planted that flag on the shores of the Pacific.

What does that flag stand for? It stands for freedom of speech, and of the press, trial by jury, and last but not least, the right of religious freedom. And right here let me pay sincere and frank tribute to Roger Williams, a missionary Baptist, for his brave fight that all of us might have this liberty. America owes a debt of gratitude to Williams and the members of the Missionary Baptist Church that we shall never be able to repay except to see that we do not lose this liberty.

Quoting again: "It was no holiday flag gorgeously emblazoned for gayety or vanity. It is a solemn national symbol. It is not a painted rag. It is a whole national history. It is the Constitution. It is the Government. It is the free people that stand in the Government on the Constitution."

"Flag of the free heart's hope and home.
By angel hands to valor given;
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.
Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe that falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us?

"I believe in the United States of America as a government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

"I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it; to support its Constitution; to obey its laws; to respect its flag; and to defend it against all enemies."

—William Tyler Page.

Permit me to quote briefly from the Man Without a Country: "He said: 'Look in my Bible, Danforth, when I am gone,' and I went away. I had no thought it was the end. I thought he was tired and would sleep. I knew he was happy, and I wanted him to be alone.

"But in an hour when the doctor went in gently, he found that Nolan had breathed his life away with a smile. He had something pressed close to his lips. It was his father's badge of the Order of the Cincinnati.

"We looked in his Bible, and there was a slip of paper where he had marked the text:

" 'They desire a country, even a heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city.'

"On this slip of paper he had written:

" 'Bury me in the sea; it has been my home and I love it. But will not someone set up a stone for my memory at Fort Adams or Orleans that my disgrace may not be more than I ought to bear? Say on it: "In memory of Philip Nolan, lieutenant in the Army of the United States. He loved his country as no other man, but no man deserved less at her hands." ' "

I now quote from Jacob Riis' incomparable book The Making of an American:

"I have told the story of the making of an American. There remains to be told how I found out that he was made and finished at last. It was when I went back to see my mother once more and, wandering about the country of my childhood's memories, I had come to the city of Elsinore. There I fell ill of a fever and lay many weeks in the home of a friend upon the shore of the beautiful Oresund. One day when the fever had left me they rolled my bed into a room overlooking the sea. The sunlight danced upon the waves; the distant mountains of Sweden were blue against the horizon. Ships passed under full sail up and down the great waterway of the nations.

"But the sunshine and the peaceful day bore no message to me. I lay moodily picking at the coverlet—sick, discouraged, and sore—I hardly knew why myself. Until all at once there sailed past, close inshore, a ship flying at the top the flag of freedom, blown out on the breeze until every star in it shone bright and clear.

"That moment I knew. Gone were illness, discouragement, and gloom; forgotten weakness and suffering, the caution of doctor and nurse. I sat up in bed and shouted, laughed, and cried by turns, waving at the flag out there. They thought I had lost my head, but I told them no, thank God. I had found it and my heart, too, at last. I knew then it was my flag; that my children's home was mine, indeed; that I had also become an American in truth. And I thanked God, and, like the man sick of the palsy, arose from my bed and went home healed."

It is not often that a poet is a preacher or that a preacher is a poet, but Dr. Henry van Dyke was a great in both capacities. In 1907 he spent about a year in Europe; he saw their wonderful industries; their educational and banking institutions; he gazed in rapture at the great art galleries. Just before he started home he wrote a little poem entitled "America for Me," and by your permission, I shall quote briefly from it:

"Oh, London is a man's town; there's power in the air;
And Paris is a woman's town, with flowers in her hair.
'Tis sweet to dream in Venice and it's great to study Rome,
But when it comes to living there's no place like home.

"And so it's home again; and home again; America for me.
I want a ship that's westward bound to plow the rolling sea
To the blessed land of room enough beyond the ocean bars,
Where the air is full of sunlight and the flag is full of stars."

O. W. I. Revises History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED ROWE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of Wednesday, April 19, 1944, entitled "O. W. I. Revises History." This editorial comments upon the history of the United States as written and edited by persons unknown and distributed through the O. W. I. to the Allied Nations abroad. I am confident this sort of propaganda by the O. W. I. does not meet with the approval of the citizens of this country. The editorial elaborates on this conclusion:

O. W. I. REVISES HISTORY

The fantastic document entitled "A Handbook of the United States of America," compiled by O. W. I. for distribution abroad, is further evidence that this Federal agency is dissipating public funds for partisan, political purposes.

The people of America, who pay the costs of publication and distribution of the O. W. I. handbook, are indebted to Congressman TABER, of New York, and the New York Sun for knowledge of its contents. Representative TABER read excerpts into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, whereupon the Sun moved heaven and earth, in Washington and New York, in an effort to obtain a copy and finally succeeded.

The book purports to present a summary of American history and an analysis of the American Government and its mode of operation. It goes back a thousand years to the voyage of Leif Ericson, yet in 10 centuries O. W. I. sycophants find only 2 women worthy of mention, Jane Addams and Eleanor Roosevelt.

So far as one can learn from the handbook, Franklin Roosevelt was the only President ever inaugurated on a blustery 4th of March. In 1,000 years only the following "historic documents and speeches" enriched national philosophy: Preamble to the Constitution (but not the Constitution itself), Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, Wilson's Fourteen Points, numerous speeches by President Roosevelt, and one by HENRY WALLACE.

Washington is ignored as the commanding general of the Revolution and as a statesman. The only Revolutionary officers mentioned are John Paul Jones and British General Cornwallis. The 1,000 years from Ericson to Roosevelt consume only 8 pages, the remaining 12 years, 14 pages. The C. I. O. gets more attention than the Congress of the United States. The O. W. I. historians also turn facts upside down by recounting the Federal Government's fight against attempts of States to seize unlawful powers.

In this age, when the telegraph, radio, and airplane make possible rapid transmission of the written and spoken word to all parts of the world, propaganda is a powerful weapon. It is manifest that the United States has an inescapable obligation to distribute among all the nations of the globe an honest exposition of its history and its aspirations.

The influence which this Nation will bring to bear at international conferences designing the new world after the war will depend in large measure on the respect and good will we command in Europe and Asia. This good will can be won by our deeds and by dissemination of democratic ideals and the precepts of world peace. But we do not play fair with our allies nor the peoples under Hitler's heel who look to us for freedom by hitching their hopes to one political party through Roosevelt panegyrics.

The Late Jesse S. Cottrell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HADWEN C. FULLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, the sudden death of our friend, Jesse S. Cottrell, was a severe blow to this House and, as each day goes by, his presence and his reports of the Washington scene are more keenly missed.

A newspaperman of unusual skill, he had an acquaintanceship at the Capital second to none, and his ability to find facts and to report them with crystal clear exactness won the respect and admiration of all with whom he came in contact.

The people of the Thirty-second District of New York, which I have the honor to represent, loved and respected Jesse Cottrell. He was the confidant of many and accomplished things for them which touched their lives in a most helpful way.

It would not be fair to the people of the Thirty-second District if I did not pay, in their name, this tribute to a great newspaperman and one of the soundest Americans who ever served the free press of this country.

With the permission of the House I would also like to include in my remarks an editorial on the death of Jesse Cottrell which appeared March 25, 1944, in the very able Watertown Times, one of the many outstanding newspapers which Mr. Cottrell represented as Washington correspondent. Said the Times:

Jesse S. Cottrell, long-time Washington correspondent of this newspaper, passes away suddenly in Washington. His name and his work are familiar to innumerable persons throughout this area. He was not only a Washington newspaper writer who kept our people in close touch with important national events, but he was a northern New York ambassador at large without portfolio who looked after the interests of north country people in Washington. Persons who went from this area to Washington on business, private or public, consulted Jesse Cottrell. His thoroughly seasoned knowledge of Washington was always available to them and there was no sacrifice he would not make to assist them. Frequently he accompanied them to the departments, arranged for interviews for them with Senators, Congressmen, and others. This was all outside his regular work as a newspaperman but he did it cheerfully for northern New York people.

Save for the period in the 1920's, when he was American Minister to Bolivia, he had been in newspaper work in Washington almost continuously for a generation. He went there from Tennessee as a young man, first as a secretary to a Senator and gradually he moved into the work of a special correspondent and as such he developed well.

He knew nearly everyone of importance in Washington. He had a rare faculty of remembering backgrounds of individuals. He knew the communities of northern New York almost as thoroughly as though he had lived here and had been engaged in newspaper work here for years. Mention nearly any person here who had appeared in the news, and he had some knowledge of them. The Times had no more thorough reader than he, and this over a long period of years. He knew our communities thoroughly and our problems even though he had not lived here.

His service in Washington began before the last World War opened in 1914. Senators and Congressmen came and went; administrations ran their course, but he went on and on. His knowledge of public men was intimate. He knew their alinements and their reactions. They all called him Jess or Jesse. Employees had confidence in him. Public men would tell him all and rely upon his discriminating good sense to present the facts accurately and well.

He was a kindly man and a friendly man. He had warm friends everywhere, from the Capitol to the White House and all points between. He was richly endowed with intuitive good judgment and common sense. He could penetrate a sham quickly. He could see truth and justice wherever and whenever it appeared. Withal he was a mellow man. He had no deep dislikes or hates.

This newspaper feels deeply his passing. We know our readers and those of our people who knew him in Washington will miss him. He served all of us long and well. His passing ends a career of rich service.

The New Air Liner

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the Manchester Union, Manchester, N. H., April 20, 1944:

THE NEW AIR LINER

The crossing of the continent by the giant Lockheed Constellation in 6 hours and 58 minutes seems almost like a dream. Nothing could better indicate the degree to which commercial aviation has profited by the intensive study of planes and engines that has accompanied the war.

At a single stroke the transcontinental flying time for a transport plane is cut from 10 hours and 22 minutes, achieved from Los Angeles to Washington in 1935, to 6 hours and 58 minutes. The sustained speed of 355 miles an hour was an actual increase of 133.4 miles an hour over the 221.6 sustained speed of 1935.

The Constellation, moreover, carried 17 persons on its trial trip and there was room for 40 more to have luxury accommodations. As a troop transport, the ship is designed to carry 100 soldiers with their full equipment. The ship will be turned over for Army transport use for the duration of the war, but she was designed not only for this purpose, but in anticipation of the increased commercial service that is certain to open when the war is over.

War is a grim affair and not one to be desired by anyone. But like all the unpleasant side of life it has its compensations. One of these is the progress that is forced upon us by the pressure of grim necessity

Most human gains have been made under the pressure of necessity. Forced to meet critical situations to survive, man's inventive genius has been stimulated to a point that it otherwise would not have reached. War provides one of these ciritical situations when human genius must be keyed to its highest point to survive.

In the present war, the race to win efficiency in the air has been a vital factor. Under the pressure of this race, planes and engines have been refined and perfected at an amazing speed. As a result when the war is over, aviation will be found to have made a phenomenal advance that otherwise might have taken many years to accomplish.

Far Eastern Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion on the Lend-Lease extension bill I referred to three memoranda prepared by Carl Neprud, a Wisconsin friend of mine who has spent the major part of his life in the Far East. I declared that Neprud's memoranda were well worth embodying in the RECORD for others to read. In touching on Japan's decision to move southward I drew special attention to a pre-Pearl Harbor memorandum which was sent to the President under cover of a letter dated July 9, 1940.

As will be seen Neprud strongly urged that more naval strength be thrown into the Singapore area so as not to leave the door open permitting the Japanese to come south and pick up oil, rubber, tin, and other strategic materials required for conducting large scale warfare. There can be no question about it, instead of stopping the Japanese in the Solomons it would have been better to have stopped them at Singapore. Also, as pointed out in the memorandum, the Japanese would then not have been able to have captured Burma and closed the Burma Road.

The memorandum and its covering letter read as follows:

HAY-ADAMS HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., July 9, 1940.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I beg to append hereto a memorandum stressing the importance to the democracies of maintaining control of the Singapore area. Briefly there are, in my opinion, three vital points at stake, namely:

1. Preventing an important world-trade channel from being developed for the Axis Powers.

2. Preventing the closing of China's communication line through Burma, so essential in keeping Japan bogged down.

3. Preventing such important units of the British Empire as India, Malaya, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand—all of which are dependent in some measure upon Singapore for their defense—being exposed to possible domination by Japan and the Axis Powers.

With our fleet in the Pacific, it is suggested that part of it—possibly a third would be sufficient—be based on Manila with an understanding being arrived at with both the British and Netherlands East Indies Governments that should an emergency arise our fleet could use both the Singapore and Surabaya naval bases, where they could cooperate with the existing British and Dutch sea, land, and air forces. It would be a case of being there first instead of letting the Japanese get in to establish a hornets' nest of their own from which it would be difficult to dislodge them.

The move could be announced as a precautionary measure designed to safeguard the Philippines and our trade channels in that general area, and so would not be directed against any particular power.

Copies of this memorandum are being sent to Col. Frank Knox and Mr. Henry L. Stimson, your recent nominees for Cabinet defense posts, and to Secretaries Hull and Morgenthau.

Respectfully yours,

CARL NEPRUD.

IMPORTANCE OF DEMOCRACIES MAINTAINING CONTROL IN THE SINGAPORE AREA

Having lived in the Far East during the last 27 years and, besides, having traveled extensively in other parts of the world, I have had an opportunity to study conditions—particularly those pertaining to foreign trade and international politics—and to form some views, some of which, with your permission, I should like to bring forward for consideration. The thoughts I have particularly in mind at this time center around the importance of the Singapore area in the world struggle now waging.

It is heartening to know that the fleet is not deserting the Pacific. It would seem that there can be no question that as long as the British Navy is functioning effectively in the Atlantic, then the place for the American Fleet is in the Pacific.

Fully desirous of exploiting the situation which has developed by the collapse of the French armies in Europe and by Britain's preoccupation in home waters, Japan has turned her eyes southward—talking in terms of French Indochina, the Dutch East Indies, and contiguous territories yet to be mentioned specifically. It would seem that at present the only country which is really in a position to keep Japan from entering upon such an adventure is America—who, in my opinion, has it in her power to do it without being involved in war. So far, Japan has been slowed up by the timely statements made by your Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, on each and every occasion that Japan's Foreign Minister, Mr. Arita, has seen fit to speak in regard to the different territories to the south of China. I should like to submit for consideration the thought that what would definitely check Japan in her aggressive designs southward would be moving part of our fleet—possibly a third would be sufficient—from Hawaii to the Philippines—at the same time arriving at an understanding with both the British and Netherlands East Indies Governments whereby in case of need we might use both the Singapore and Surabaya naval bases. We would then be assured of being in the happy position of being there first. The tables would be reversed with respect to Japan. Thus, in the event of an emergency, instead of our fleet being in the awkward position of having to think in terms of going far afield from its bases and entering a hornets' nest, as it were, in Japanese waters, the Japanese Fleet would have to consider whether it would be prepared to leave its main base at Sasebo and venture some thousands of miles away to put itself into a hornets' nest in the Manila, Singapore, Surabaya area, where in addition to our units there would be substantial British and Dutch forces—land, sea, and air.

Surely the democracies must realize that the time has come when they can no longer stand on ceremony—at least vis-à-vis one another. There would seem to be no valid reason why democracies should always be late. Letting Japan move part of her fleet into that area first—thereby creating a second Japanese hornets' nest—would, in my opinion, be most dangerous for the democracies. There would then be the danger of the Japanese and the Italian Navies linking up to permit the important raw materials obtainable from Malaya, the Dutch East Indies, China, and other nearby territories to flow to the Axis Powers.

Not only is control of the Singapore area vital from the point of view of not permitting the aggressors in Europe from obtaining an important avenue for the development of their commerce, but if the Axis Powers succeed in overcoming British resistance on and around the British Isles, then maintenance of the British dominions overseas which, in reality, constitute the British Empire itself, rests in large measure on whether or not Britain has control of Singapore—the base which is so uniquely situated with respect to such important units of the Empire as India, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and Malaya.

I think history would record it as a stupendous error were we to permit Japan to maintain her bluff to the extent that she succeeds in this, her next great adventure.

In my opinion, Japan would not dare to attempt to take over those regions by force were part of our navy in those waters—with two such strong naval bases as Singapore and Surabaya from which to operate should necessity dictate. Japan is overextended now. After 3 years of fighting she has not succeeded in defeating China, her gold supply is about exhausted, and her opportunity of obtaining war materials is gradually being lessened—especially with the power recently conferred by act of Congress to prohibit the export of articles considered essential for our own defense. Japan continues, however, to put up a bold front—speaking with a voice far beyond her power.

Instead of being able to defeat China, Japan's Armies have been spread out over a wide area and are now bogged down with no graceful retreat in sight. The Chinese Armies instead of getting weaker have, in reality, become stronger. They have learned more about conducting warfare and are more effective in the field today than they were when the war first started. In fact, the democracies of the world owe a debt of gratitude to China for the fight she has been waging against aggressive Japan these last 3 years. The maintenance of a free China is of great importance to the cause of the democracies. Control of the Singapore area will permit continued communication with China via Burma, thus assuring that Chinese resistance will go on. China's almost inexhaustible manpower and the vastness of her territory are important factors in wearing down the Japanese, but they are not enough in themselves. A continual flow of war equipment is necessary, which requires that supply routes remain open.

Such a movement of part of our fleet need not be announced as aimed against Japan. It could be declared that the additional units have been detailed to the Manila area to give added protection to the Philippine Islands and to safeguard the trade channels through which flow the bulk of our requirements in rubber, tin, and some other products. It could be a precautionary measure against any aggressive designs on the part of any power or group of powers and hence not necessarily against Japan. We would need make no statement except to say that the serious political situation in the world necessitates that we take appropriate measures to protect our interests in that general area.

I might add that I quite realize that moving part of our fleet might conceivably go counter to a more or less fixed policy of having our fleet operate as one unit. There is the thought, however, that the whole fleet would continue to be in the one ocean, and that the fleet's two units would be so situated with respect to the Japanese Fleet that they could cooperate effectively should any hostilities arise.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1940.

India-China Air Route: Need of Large Transport Planes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the plea which I made a few days ago for larger transport planes for use on the Assam-China air route, I referred to several memoranda prepared by Carl Neprud relating specifically to this very subject, which in my opinion should go into the RECORD. In his long stay in the Far East, Neprud has had a unique opportunity to become acquainted with transportation conditions in Assam, Burma, and China.

In his memorandum written in March 1943, Neprud strongly urged that greater use should be made of the India-China air route, now China's only line, so that China's resistance can be strengthened, especially as regards air power by which that great tactician, General Chennault, and his American and Chinese airmen are producing such astounding results on but a trickle of supplies. The memorandum reads:

MEMORANDUM

There is no question but that America regards Japan as public enemy No. 1. This I think has been borne out ever since Pearl Harbor, and more particularly in recent weeks by the results shown in Gallup polls and by the views expressed by Members of Congress in both Houses at the time the lend-lease extension bill was up for passage. In fact, I believe that I am not overstating the case when I say that there is unanimous feeling in Congress that every effort should be made to assist China and our own forces operating in the Pacific area against Japan. On the floor of Congress, in the press, and over the radio we constantly hear the earnest desire expressed that more aid should be sent to China.

Mere expressions of opinion, however, will not produce the necessary aid—the fact of the matter is that aid can be sent to China. I fear that many people believe that nothing can be done until the Burma Road is reopened. However useful it is to have this other avenue to reach China, there is no need of waiting for the realization of that event before sending more supplies to our ally in the Far East. Practically all the supplies entering China today are sent in over the India air route from upper Assam to China. The amount of goods shipped can be expanded by the addition of more transport planes and the building of additional airfields in upper Assam. Many people do not realize that supplies can be sent from New York to Chungking by water for the entire journey except for a hop of approximately 550 miles from the head of navigation on the Brahmaputra in upper Assam to Suifu (Ipin) or Kiating (Loshan) on the upper Yangtze. Each new month sees an increased amount of supplies being sent to China by this route. With America producing ever larger numbers of transport planes, it would seem that it is but a matter of assigning more of such planes to that part of the world to strengthen the military position in China, which is the only territory under allied control at present from which air attacks can conveniently be made upon Japanese industry and power units in Japan proper, and on Japan's communication lines to China and to Japan's newly acquired empire to the south.

The importance of this point of attack has been recognized by our high command only recently by placing General Chennault in charge of a separate Army air force command in China. Aside from carrying out air raids over Japanese controlled territories, General Chennault's air forces will, if properly strengthened, be able to give material support to China's Armies who are engaged in fighting Japanese troops over a front of some 2,000 and more miles. In fact, increased air power may be sufficient to enable the Chinese forces to break into a general offensive which as it develops may succeed in driving the Japanese Armies out of many sections of the country.

With the great advance that has been made in aviation and the plans that are now being carried out with respect to development of ever larger and larger transport planes by such men as Kaiser, Higgins, Douglas, Johnson of Boeing's, and others, there is no doubt but what we are entering upon a new phase in transportation history. It will no doubt be found cheaper when new transportation routes are required across rugged, rough, mountainous country to inaugurate aerial routes instead of building motor roads or railroads.

Even railroads and highways have their limitations. The Burma Road, for instance, was limited in what it was capable of delivering to China and was expensive. The rail system in Burma, even before the war when functioning normally, was wholly inadequate for supplying the war needs of China. At no time would more than 30,000 tons ever reach Lashio, the terminal of the Burma Road in Burma, by rail, and the largest amount that ever reached Kunming, at the end of the Road, in any 1 month was 17,000 tons. The average tonnage was, of course, much lower than that, probably 10,000 tons, and a large portion of that amount was gasoline required for moving war equipment to other points like Chungking, which is another 700 miles further. The total haul from Rangoon by rail and throughout to Chungking is approximately 2,000 miles. Aside from the fact that both the railway and the highway are limited in what they can carry even in normal times, it is safe to say that even if they are recaptured, it will be a long time before they will be able to carry anything approaching the amounts carried in the months immediately preceding the war. Much of the railways' rolling stock was no doubt destroyed by the Allied armies before they left Burmese soil, and in the event the Japanese are driven out of Burma and western Yunnan, one can expect that they will leave very little railway equipment and very few trucks for use on the highway. The chances are, too, that bridges will be destroyed, and at least as far as the bridge over the Gohtiek Gorge is concerned, that will be a serious matter, as the work of rebuilding such a bridge is an engineering feat which will take considerable time to complete.

By the addition of more large transport planes to the fleet operating from upper Assam, it should soon be possible to deliver 10,000 tons every month at an airport like Suifu on the Yangtze River, from which the supplies could be floated on down the river to Wanshien and other points by native junks and small steamers. To increase that amount would be largely a matter of increasing the number of transport planes. Less than 25 miles from the airport in upper Assam there is an oil field, and with a refinery which is capable of producing by the addition of ethyl the quality of aviation gasoline sufficiently high in octane content to fuel transport planes. As the hop to airports in China is less than 600 miles, transport planes can carry sufficient gasoline in their tanks for their return journey.

It is only natural that in a life-and-death struggle every person or every nation is thinking about his or her own security, and everyone will regard whatever struggle there is on one's own doorstep as being the most important one requiring solution. One must not blame Mr. Churchill too much for feeling strongly that Hitler must be disposed of first before anything much is done in the Far East, even though it is necessary to allow several years to elapse in the process. The Chinese, of course, cannot be blamed if they feel that the struggle on their doorstep is a most vital concern, and certainly when one reflects on how they have fought their strong, aggressive neighbor these 5½ years, and how they have suffered in their effort to remain a free people, one cannot blame them for expecting to receive something more than 1½ percent of our lend-lease output.

When Japan attacked Pearl Harbor, she planted the war of the Pacific directly on our doorstep. The people of this country feel that it is our war. On that there can be no question but what there is absolute unity. The country is undoubtedly prepared to produce the best war effort in meeting the menace from Japan. I greatly fear that for us to mark time in the Pacific for several years while we continue to throw practically all of our support to Europe will not help to promote the best possible war effort on the part of the people of this country. It would seem that maximum results can be attained if we conduct an offensive war against Japan at the same time as we are giving strong support in the European theater. The Japanese must not be given time to consolidate their position. Time is definitely on Japan's side, and she should not be given the opportunity to have it work in her favor.

If no strong, effective opposition is waged against the Japanese, the people now under her control are apt to believe that their only hope is to cooperate with Japan. Even the Chinese in occupied China may ultimately come to feel that the Japanese armies and the Wang Ching-Wei regime in Nanking have come to stay, and that the best thing to do is to cooperate with them. By supplying General Chennault with more air power, he will be able by periodic raids throughout the occupied area and in Hong Kong, Indochina, and elsewhere, to show to the people of these territories that military opposition does exist and that there is some hope of their eventually being released from their bondage. That in my opinion is the best propaganda this country has to offer.

CARL NEPRUD.

COON VALLEY, WIS., March 25, 1943.

China Theater of Operations: Need of More Supplies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, in a recent discussion of China's supply problem, I had occasion to refer to several memoranda prepared by Carl Neprud, who has an intimate acquaintance with the far eastern situation. In a memorandum written November 15, 1943, and headed: "Question of supplies: Where a little can do a lot," Neprud stresses the need of increasing the volume carried "over the hump" to China for assisting General Chiang Kai-shek's forces and Chennault's Fourteenth Army Air Corps. While it is appreciated that every commander wherever he is located—in the Pacific or anywhere else in the world—will continue to press for more and more materials to be sent in his direction, still it is difficult to believe that commanders of any other Pacific areas will begrudge General Chennault some additional supplies—in view of the great damage he is inflicting on the Japanese communication lines, airfields, and so forth, within Japan's inner zone. With such striking results being achieved by the trickle of supplies now being sent in by the Assam air route, it would seem that every effort should be made to protect that route and to increase the amount flown in, thereby enabling General Chennault to make greater use of China's air bases with correspondingly greater effect on the enemy's inner defenses and communication lines. Naturally, whatever damage is done to Japan in this area will serve to lighten the task on Japan's distant perimeter.

If China were not in this war one can be quite sure that we would be pleading with her to permit us to use her bases so that we could more easily attack the Japanese homeland and the communication lines southward. The importance of China's geographical position on Japan's flank would then perhaps be a whole lot clearer to us than it is now.

The memorandum reads as follows:

FAR-EASTERN THEATER OF OPERATIONS—QUESTION OF SUPPLIES: WHERE A LITTLE CAN DO A LOT

On page 68 of October 1, 1943, issue of the United States News the following item appears:

"Gen. Douglas MacArthur is protesting what looks to him to be a diversion of available materials from his active war theater to what now is an inactive and long-range theater of operations, in Burma. There are signs that General MacArthur's attitude is not far out of line with some United States naval opinion."

It would seem only natural that General MacArthur, having been driven out of the Philippines, should regard the recapture of those islands as the first important move in the Pacific area. Likewise, one might reasonably expect that from the point of view of Lord Mountbatten and the British in general, no step can be of more urgent a nature in the far-eastern field of operations than the recapture of Singapore, which occupies such a unique position—from a natural defense point of view—with respect to many important units of the British Empire. One must also not blame General Stilwell if he should believe that no move of any consequence should precede the recapture of Burma from which he and his gallant men were driven out.

One need not be an authority on military matters to realize that to carry out even one of these enterprises will require strong sea power, large, well-equipped land forces, and huge air armadas, not to mention mountains of supplies of all kinds. And speaking of supplies, a large part of them require to be transported half-way around the world either from the west or east coast of America. It would seem that any strategic plan which has shown that it has merit and admits of expansion in a comparatively easy manner and without the employment of huge forces—air, land, or sea—requiring to be transported from the other side of the world might reasonably be given greater support than has heretofore been allowed. I have reference to the great work being done by General Chennault and his Fourteenth Army Air Corps, and the Chinese Air Forces which are cooperating with him.

Any man who has had an opportunity to study the military situation in the Far East first hand has come back loud in his praises of General Chennault and his small force. As Senator RICHARD RUSSELL said on the floor of the Senate in rendering a report to his colleagues on what he had found on his world tour of American battle fronts: "In my opinion, General Chennault is one of the most brilliant soldiers that this war has produced. With an incredibly small number of effective airplanes, he is contributing greatly to keeping China a factor in the war. Certainly no man has ever done more with so little. * * * It is requiring a superhuman effort to furnish General Chennault's air forces, but the maintenance of air bases in China is of such great importance that we should attack the problem of supplying him with redoubled vigor."

In his last biennial report, released on September 8, 1943, Gen. G. C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, said with respect to the importance of the present supply route to China:

"* * * The first flight of the air ferry command into China over the Himalayas was completed 6 days later. Moving personnel, equipment, gasoline, and other supplies over the mountains into China following its transportation by sea and air half-way around the globe imposed an unparalleled logistical problem.

"The operations of our air forces in India, Burma, and in China held in that region Japanese airplanes which might have been employed elsewhere; losses were inflicted on the enemy's air force, depots, and communications; and, most important of all, Chinese morale was greatly stimulated by this evidence of America's intention to support China in every way possible.

"There have gradually developed since the summer of 1942 increasingly destructive bomber attacks over Burma and out of China with targets from Hopei to French Indochina, including Hainan Island. The enemy's retaliatory attacks have also been repulsed with astonishingly heavy losses to his flyers. Day by day the power of our air offensive in these regions is growing, and forcing a dispersion of Japanese means along their southern front, extending from Burma 5,500 miles to the Solomon Islands, to meet our attacks, which are involving them in losses so destructive as to threaten the maintenance of their air power and the efficiency of their sea forces."

Hardly a day passes but the papers carry official reports of exploits of General Chennault's American and Chinese flyers in which they have done damage to Japanese communication lines along China's coast or on the Yangtze River, or have rained bombs on power stations, cement plants, colliers, and other useful war adjuncts in occupied China, Hong Kong, or Indochina. In addition, this small air force operating from bases in China is playing an important role in the support of China's armies on the 2,000-mile front, enabling units not only to repel attacks launched by the Japanese but in several instances, notably a recent one in the rice-bowl area below Ichang, to launch an offensive, albeit of a minor nature. The point which should be stressed, however, is that with so much being accomplished with so little, it would seem highly advisable to study the possibility of increasing the aid in that direction and accomplishing a great deal more.

While the grand strategy may have been mapped with the idea of ultimately launching a wide pincer movement with MacArthur's forces moving north and west and Mountbatten's units moving east to points on the Malayan Peninsula with a view to playing havoc with the enemy's communication lines to the rich Netherlands Indies from which Japan gets the bulk of her oil and other important requirements for war, the fact still remains that such an ambitious program from the point of view of men, ships, planes, material, and all manner of supplies, requiring enormous expeditions, would be an expensive venture and in view of the strength of air and other forces which the enemy no doubt has concentrated in that natural hornet's nest may even involve some risk of failure.

The formulation of sound strategy presumably revolves around the idea of doing the greatest damage to the enemy at the smallest losses to one's self. According to Winston Churchill that is the reason why Britain and America have so far not attempted any invasion across the channel but have preferred to concentrate their efforts in that theater to bombing operations against Germany's industrial cities, her transportation lines, and her airports and other military establishments. As Churchill indicated, such a procedure might produce the desired result with a great saving of men, ships, and material. One might reasonably ask, Has not General Chennault established by the damage he has done to the enemy's transportation lines, wharves, docks, industrial plants, air bases, and troop concentrations at such low cost either in initial supply of planes, bombs, oil, and other materials used, or in actual losses sustained that serious consideration might reasonably be given to the idea of using the Assam air route to a much greater extent than it is used at present? No doubt each succeeding quarter shows some increase over the previous quarter in tonnage carried, but why not launch forth in a bigger way by doubling or even trebling the amount now flown into China? The amount would still be relatively very small in comparison with the amounts being stored up for eventual use by MacArthur and Mountbatten but unquestionably the good which would be achieved in damage inflicted on the enemy would be far more than a like amount of material could produce in any other theater of operations.

The question naturally arises, How can a substantial increase in tonnage carried "over the hump" be attained? To that question I would reply the same as I did to a high American aviation official in China who, believing the obstacles too great, was unable to agree with a recommendation which had been made for the establishment of a direct air route between China and India. The reply was: "Make the planes bigger and put more spinners on out in front." At the instance of my chief, Dr. H. H. Kung, vice president of the Executive Yuan and concurrently Minister of Finance, I had gone to Upper Assam in the spring of 1941 to study conditions there—airport development, transportation facilities by river and rail, gasoline supplies, etc.—as they might bear on a direct air route to China, the thought being that if Japan attacked Britain the whole of Burma might soon be overrun, giving China no practical and convenient route to the outside world except by air to India.

Since that time great progress has no doubt been made in the development of facilities for increasing the air traffic to China. With supply lines by both water and rail from the seaport of Calcutta it should be possible to convey to the steamer and rail terminals in Upper Assam, both of which are not far from the original airport, all the bombs, gasoline, and other aviation supplies which General Chennault might require—even if he is given the 500 planes which, according to newspaper reports, he claims would be sufficient for his purposes in playing havoc with the enemy's communication lines, industrial centers, and ports; and, in cooperation with the Chinese Armies, developing a general offensive which will ultimately drive the Japanese out of China. The importance of keeping China's morale up should also not be overlooked at this critical time. Senator CHANDLER, of the Military Affairs Committee, who was one of five Senators who made the recent inspection trip which took them, among other places, to China, said in part, with respect to the situation there: "* * * The Chinese people are weary of the war, and if by starvation or exhaustion they are forced out of the war, it will be a serious set-back for us in our war against Japan. If the Japanese can make a determined offensive from Indochina and capture our Kunming base (General Chennault's main base), we are through in China, and China is out of the war." Earlier in his report Senator CHANDLER said: "We are in grave danger of losing our bases in China, and if we lose these bases, the war against Japan will be greatly prolonged and the cost to us in American lives will perhaps run into the thousands."

A well-known writer on military matters recently declared that any properly equipped division participating in the invasion of Europe would require the inclusion of an air force of 300 planes. With that being the case the request on the part of General Chennault for but 500 planes for the operations which he carries on over a wide area in China and surrounding territories seems a modest one indeed. In fact, considering the way Chennault and his forces have been producing results with possibly but a fraction of the 500 planes requested, it would seem that the high command might reasonably give serious consideration to General Chennault's plea. After all, as far as the war planes are concerned—whether fighters or bombers—they can be flown in on their own power.

The main task would naturally be to increase the amount of aviation gasoline, bombs, munitions, and other aviation requirements needed by the larger air unit. It would seem that this could be achieved by allocating for the Assam-China route more and larger transport planes. Fortunately, with the great advance in aviation which this generation has the privilege of witnessing, men of wisdom like Higgins, Kaiser, Douglas, and Boeing's Johnson are producing ever larger and larger transport planes to meet the requirements of war in all parts of the world. The Douglas Skymaster—a four-engine job reported to be capable of carrying 30,000 pounds—is now being manufactured in Chicago on an assembly line basis. It is said that such a plane can carry enough gasoline for the round trip to Kunming or to Ipin (Suifu) and still be able to deliver a pay-load of not less than 7½ tons of cargo at destination. Assuming that to begin with only 50 such planes were to be assigned to the Assam-China route and assuming that they were to make but one round-trip per day it would mean a monthly delivery to China of 11,250 tons. And were the fleet to make two round-trips a day, deliveries would total 22,500 tons. Even the Burma Road in its record month did not deliver any larger amount at Kunming. In this connection it should be noted that the air line has a distinct advantage over a motor road in that the road leads to but one place whereas the skyways are wide ways and will permit deliveries in any direction. While I understand that Kunming has been the main delivery base, there should, in my opinion, be no reason why the larger transport planes capable as they are of flying 1,000 or more miles without refueling, should not make deliveries to such points as Ipin (Suifu) Kiating, and Chengtu from which points supplies can be sent on by boats down the Yangtze River to Chungking, Wanhsien, and even to points nearer the enemy lines in the vicinity of Ichang.

Many people seem to labor under the impression that delivery of supplies to General Chennault is a well-nigh hopeless task on account of the distance involved, the assumption being that all of his supplies must start from New York. As regards supplies from America, it should be remembered that to whatever theater they are sent in the Far East, whether to Mountbatten or to MacArthur, they must also leave from New York or other American ports and that the only difference in distance as regards supplies destined to General Chennault is—apart from the steamer or rail haul to Upper Assam—the air hops of approximately 500 miles to the air bases at Kunming, Suifu, or other points in that general area. It is, of course, only natural that it should be a longer haul to reach General Chennault as he is not operating on the perimeter of Japan's newly acquired territories in the tropics but is close to the Japanese homeland—its heart and vitals, as it were—where Japan's main war industries are located and from which hub radiate her communication lines to the far-flung outposts of her new possessions. Surely one of our main objectives is to get into closer striking distance to Japan proper, and naturally the nearer we come to Japan the longer the supply route will be.

In this connection, one must not overlook the fact that when Mountbatten finally decides to use the supplies—which he has been storing up in India—either in Malaya or in Burma, or in both areas, he too, will require to arrange for further transportation which, in view of the obvious risks involved, may prove as expensive, if not more so, than moving supplies to General Chennault by large transportation planes.

It should be noted that one very important item, namely gasoline, which is one of General Chennault's main requirements, is produced in the Indian Ocean basin. A quality of gasoline suitable at least for use in transport planes is refined at the oil fields at Digboi which is but 25 miles away from the original Assam airport, while 100-octane aviation gasoline is produced at Abadan in the Persian Gulf area.

However disturbed General MacArthur may be concerning the amount of supplies going to Lord Mountbatten, or conversely, whatever Lord Mountbatten may think about the volume of stores and equipment being sent to General MacArthur, it is inconceivable that either of these gentlemen would begrudge General Chennault some additional supplies, that great air man having demonstrated time and again, that he and his combination of American and Chinese flyers can produce astonishing results on very little and with remarkably small damage to themselves or their equipment. Given some additional support, General Chennault should be able to inflict on the Japanese correspondingly greater damage which, in the end, can but serve to lighten the tasks which Lord Mountbatten and General MacArthur have before them.

CARL NEPRUD.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 15, 1943.

False Rumors About Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, there have been many false and unfounded rumors about lend-lease and its operations, and Hon. Leo T. Crowley, Administrator of the Foreign Economic Administration, and his general counsel, Oscar S. Cox, assisted by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in its recent hearings on lend-lease to explode many of these unfounded and false rumors, and the printed hearings upon the recent extension of lend-lease sets out in full the facts about many of these unfounded and unsupported rumors.

Mr. Frank R. Kent, a newspaper columnist of recognized ability, has written an article relative to this matter, which appeared in the Washington Star on April 21, and under leave granted, same is submitted herewith:

CROWLEY PERFORMED PATRIOTIC SERVICE IN EXPLODING ANTI-BRITISH RUMORS

(By Frank R. Kent)

Mr. Leo T. Crowley, under whom lease-lend is now operated, performed a patriotic service and executed as well an effective piece of personal strategy the other day when, by providing the answers before the questions could be asked, he vaccinated against the anti-British and anti-Russian (but particularly anti-British) rumors that have been current here for weeks and weeks and which, if they persist unchecked, are sure to seep through the country.

The Crowley statement was made before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and should have had much wider publicity than was given. For these reports have had great circulation and are promoted with such detail as to make them easy to believe.

Among those exploded by Mr. Crowley were:

1. That the British had a habit of removing the labels from lease-lend articles and substituting their own, retransferring the goods to other countries and taking the credit.

2. That the lease-lend was selling gasoline to the British in various places for 2 cents a gallon which the British resold to our Army for 42 cents.

3. That alcohol sent to Britain on lease-lend had been converted into whisky and sold back to us.

4. That we had sent huge quantities of diaper cloth to north Africa which the natives were using for headdresses.

5. That the Russians had traded some of our planes to the Japanese in return for rubber.

6. That the Russians were using lease-lend butter to grease their boots, etc.

DENIAL BADLY NEEDED

These and kindred stories were denounced by Mr. Crowley as without any trace of truth and as having emanated from enemy propaganda sources. Unquestionably a clear-cut, unequivocal denial of these poisonous reports was badly needed. It should have been made long ago, and Mr. Crowley deserves credit for taking the initiative.

The amount of harm such things can do if permitted to go unchecked is hard to exaggerate. In effect, they attribute a degree of depravity to our allies which is almost unthinkable. They play directly into German and Japanese hands at the most critical period of the war. And they create resentment and distrust when good will and complete faith is vital to the common cause.

If there is anything better calculated to weaken the war effort and hamper the essential post-war cooperation than the stirring up of bad blood between ourselves and our allies, it is not easy to give it a name. So clear is this that it would seem worth any exertion upon the part of the administration to render it impossible; that the President himself might take cognizance of these things and use his great influence to disabuse the public mind.

Neither the British nor the Russians can afford to take notice of such reports. Yet both are aware of their harmful potentialities and are deeply resentful over injustices which they are powerless to correct—or even to direct to the attention of the people. It is a situation disturbing to thoughtful men in Washington. To them Mr. Crowley's statement seemed particularly timely and needed.

The question is whether it is going to be let alone or followed up. The hope, of course, is that it will be followed up and that this especially damaging enemy propaganda can be wholly nullified. In this connection, our military authorities could very greatly help.

ANTI-BRITISH FEELING

It is an unfortunate but quite well-known fact that there is a considerable anti-British feeling among some of our higher Army officers; that these have somewhat industriously spread the notion that the British want to get back their possessions in the East without having to fight for them; that their fighting planes are better designed for defending England than aiding in the devastation of Germany; that the British are holding back on the channel invasion because they are unwilling to pay the price, etc., etc.

It is a little shocking to hear this sort of talk from men of high rank in the American Army. But it can be heard from them, both in private conversation and around not-too-private dinner tables. These slurs and insinuations are just as false as those so flatly contradicted by Mr. Cowley and which, he asserted, originally had been, put out by Berlin and Tokyo radio.

It is true that the great bulk of American officers are wholly free from any anti-British feeling; have nothing but praise of the British as fighters and friends. But, there are enough others who, one way or the other, have been irritated by individual Englishmen and who have been expressing themselves, to cause concern at the top.

It is time something were done about all this, and it can be stated that disciplinary measures are under consideration. Certainly, nothing could be more worth while. With the war about to reach its climax and the effectiveness of the peace resting largely upon British-American cooperation and understanding, discord of this character is about as bad a thing as could be.

All these baseless anti-British reports ought to be firmly dealt with and the atmosphere cleared. The O. W. I. might well find a field here. Putting an end to this kind of disorganizing propaganda would be very much more useful than most of the things it has done or is doing.

"* * * for Purple Mountains Majesty"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. EATON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a message written by the 15-year-old son of a well-known citizen of West Virginia, now resident in Washington.

I hope that my colleagues will read this extraordinarily beautiful and powerful message which comes in the midst of wars, alarms, and confusions like a healing breath of peace from the high places:

"* * * FOR PURPLE MOUNTAINS MAJESTY"

(By Charles J. Farrington, Jr.)

Among the great unrecognized wonders of this country are the numerous heights of mountain terrain which expand from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, and from the Canadian border to the gateway of Mexico. These mountains, no matter how wild and desolate they may seem are fine in their symbolic meaning of what this country stands for. The things the American soldier puts in his memory pack as he sets out for battle are his reminders of the democracy he is fighting for. Among these, along with the prairies of waving grain, the blue waters, and the sky that looks over them, are the mountains upon whose slopes he can stand and breathe the clean, pure air of a freeman's land.

The mountains have had such a large part in the history of mankind, the development of government and religion, that I cannot believe that the great outstanding events so allied to the mountains were due to mere chance. They, no doubt, were the result of inspirations stirred by the majesty of the bulk and the height of these great monuments which the Creator has used to beautify the world, and the idea that those who climbed their rugged slopes left behind, somewhat, the taint of the restless world's ignoble strife and gained a higher spiritual atmosphere, closer to their God.

The mountains are inseparably linked with the origin and growth of our religion. Moses, on Mt. Horeb, attracted by a burning bush, gave attention and talked with God. The thunders of Mount Sinai and the tables of testimony written with the finger of God, and the shining face of Moses when he came down from the mountains, are living today, for a thousand parliaments and legislative bodies since then have patterned their legislation after the laws and ordinances of Sinai.

Jesus Christ, himself, was a mountain man, for His home, Nazareth, was among the rugged hills. The mountains were the scene of many of the most important events of His life. His Sermon on the Mount is the sweetest expression of lofty thoughts that has floated into speech in all time. Mount Tabor was the scene of the transfiguration, one of the most wonderful manifestations connected with His mission. Mount Olivet held a prominent place in His ministry. Then, at last, there was Mount Calvary—time's sublimest tragedy. It stands out in the minds of the millions that have come and gone since then, as a symbol of the rescue of all the lost of Eden.

The mountains in our religious history and development make the keys of a great organ on which the fingers of divine love play the grand march of a world redeemed.

The religion of the mountain people in our country, while primitive according to city standards, is heart-deep. Among these people of the hills there is a general reverence for all things religious, but they practice no superficial observance because of custom or style. Mountain people are good and kind and honorable. I have seen them stand before a rude platform in a narrow valley, listening to a mountain preacher tell in simple language, the story of the life and death of Jesus. And this speaker held his congregation under a majestic spell as he plainly, but heart-warmingly, related the splendid life of the Great Teacher and His death to redeem all mankind.

A young mountaineer boy passed away after a brief illness and his friends and family carried his body to a small hillside house and sat with him through the night. They sang old songs—"In the Sweet Bye and Bye," "There'll Be No Sorrow There," and many others. It was several years ago that I witnessed that captivating scene, but sometimes in the cool of a summer's night as I sit on the lawn in front of my home, I seem to hear them again, their voices coming from the far-off hills where the mansions are, in a song of peace and joy that will never end while power divine measures the eternal years.

The preachers are great men in the mountains and the most impressive monument on this continent, I believe, is one standing before a courthouse in a mountain county. It is the portrait figure of a pioneer preacher standing by his pulpit with the open Bible before him. I asked a man as I pointed to the statue, "What did he do to gain a monument like that—was he a soldier?" The reply was, "No, he was not a soldier, nor a rich man, nor a statesman." "Well, what was the monument erected for?" And the man answered, "I do not know, unless it was because he was such a good man." This monument was built by the contributions of the mountain people—they build monuments to good men.

Mountain people have a strength of character, and they are strong in the principles that make a free people. In these mountain folk God has seen a new hope for eternal success. The Creator lavished his blessings upon the mountains. He filled them with mineral wealth and adorned their slopes with flowering vine, shrub, and tree; He crowned their peaks with the glory of vistas beautiful and charming; He caused health-giving fountains to bubble up for the healing of the people; He made swift streams to flow in the narrow valleys, ready to be harnessed to do the world's work; He showered on them the majesty of Himself and put the feeling in men's hearts that those who walked there were closer to Him, for it was on the mountains that He talked with men. He fills the sunshine of the mountain days with the chirp and the hum, the buzz and the song of winged creatures and the call of wild things, and He sweetens the mountain night with the subdued voice of nature falling into restful peace, and paints it with the miracle of soft shadows and lights it with silvery beams that seem to shine through the open doorway of celestial palaces.

In conclusion let me say that when you read some sensational screed, or hear people say that the mountain regions are benighted and uncivilized, remember that such things are unfair and unfounded. There are many, it is true, who have not had opportunities and advantages in comparison with thickly settled communities, but among the citizenship of the hills are many of God's noblemen. They are meeting the modern-day problems which face them squarely; they are firm in their good citizenship, and hopefully and earnestly looking to the beacon lights that burn on the hills, "from whence," the Good Book says, "cometh our strength."

Republican Aims and Objectives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW] over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Sunday, April 23, 1944, at 1:45 p. m.:

Ladies and gentlemen, we are living in a period of world-wide upheaval. This is a time of deep and universal changes. National and international affairs are in an unparalleled state of flux. This war and the subsequent peace are integral parts of the same globe-rocking disturbance. In these hours of stress and strain, strife and suffering, conflict and catastrophe, we are confronted with many difficult economic, social, and political problems. If men are to live in prosperity and peace, solutions to the questions raised by a scientific age filled with limitless power must be found.

The people of the United States are turning with confidence to the Republican Party for leadership. Republicans will soon be entrusted with the task of concluding the war and making the peace. By its liberal, constructive and forward looking policies, our party will lead the Nation in paths of great accomplishments. It is the party of youth. It will save the Nation from the mismanagement, the bad administration, and the ruinous policies of the New Deal. The Republican Party will return the Government of the United States to the people. It is the instrument by which this Nation will build a post-war economy on the basis of individual freedom and lead in the reconstruction of the world.

The Nation is supporting the Republican Party because the American people are seeking freedom from the inexcusable blunders, the reactionary policies, and the destructive practices of the New Deal. The opposition to the present administration is a consequence of the cumbersome, flagrant, and irresponsible administrative methods of the party in power. Since 1932 a top-heavy and incompetent bureaucracy, staffed in many instances by people, whose heads have been turned with the authority they possess, has come into existence. Through executive decrees the administration has taken lawmaking into its own hands. The Republican Party dedicates itself to removing the strangle hold which the New Deal has upon the country.

During the 1930's the Congress supinely submitted to the dictates of the White House. It rubber-stamped legislation drafted by the bureaucrats, delegated vast power to the President and surrendered without a murmur to the Chief Executive. As a result of congressional capitulation there developed rapidly the New Deal bureaucracy from which has streamed thousands of needless, nonsensical, and arbitrary regulations. In many cases the intent of the laws written by Congress has been ignored, circumvented, and by-passed. Attempts to control American agriculture, American industry, American business, yes, every activity known to American life are constantly being made. If the principles of the New Deal are not repudiated, they will wreck beyond repair the American system. The fearful thing about this administration in my opinion is that underlying its activities we find a philosophy the goal of which is the complete regimentation of the people of the United States. Such a philosophy is foreign to the heritage of this Nation and will be vigorously opposed by the Republican Party.

Republicans in the Seventy-eighth Congress have fought for congressional independence, for the restoration of legislative leadership and for the curbing of a power-crazed, power-drunk administration. The recent enactment of a law to provide for the service men and women a complete ballot and the overriding of the President's tax veto are the outstanding victories for constitutional government in recent years. The overriding of the tax veto is an excellent illustration of the way in which the system of checks and balances operates. Congress has checked the President in his attempt to arrogate unto himself limitless power. The Republican Party is working for the preservation of representative constitutional government. To thoroughly clean house in Washington, to curtail and control the bureaus, to eliminate waste and inefficiency, to bring about economy in the spending of public money, to end the pernicious philosophy of the present administration and to save from destruction our form of Government, it is necessary to elect in 1944 a Republican President as well as a Republican Congress. Never has there been a greater need for sanity and common sense in the administration of public affairs. Never has it been more imperative to elect a President and a Congress thoroughly devoted to the principles of government as established by those statesmen of the ages who formulated the Constitution of the United States and established the principles of freedom undergirding this Republic.

American industry has done a most praiseworthy job in producing the weapons of war. As peace approaches the questions of taxation, reconversion, employment, and the termination of war contracts will be prominent issues. Machinery to make the transition from a war economy to a peace economy must be set up by the Congress. The industrial life of America will flourish through private effort and not by Government control. The Republican Party is the party of free enterprise, individual initiative, and economic freedom.

Republicans are taking a firm stand for the simplification of the tax structure and the revision of the entire revenue system. Congressman MARTIN recently appointed a Republican committee to make a thorough study of the tax field. This committee will develop a post-war tax program designed to encourage free enterprise and to produce the maximum employment for returning soldiers and displaced war workers. The simplification and the revision of the Federal tax system must be accomplished in such a way as to stimulate business activity and produce a healthy national economy. Thus we will save small business which is the backbone of America, bring about the expansion of industry, and provide employment for all our people.

The farmers have been called upon to produce in abundance. They should be freed from the burden of hampering restrictions emanating from Washington. They ought to have adequate support prices to cover the cost of production and to provide reasonable profits. Sufficient manpower and machinery are essential. An experienced administrator should be put in charge of the production, distribution, and the pricing of food. It is necessary to continue the price-stabilization law but the act should be amended so that the control of food will be in the hands of men who know what they are doing rather than in the hands of inexperienced people. The policies of the Republican Party will keep farmers in business instead of driving them out of business.

The veterans' G. I. bill of rights is now pending in the House. We must develop a full and integrated plan to properly care for the needs of the veterans of this war. No matter what aid we extend or how much we give or what we make available, we can never do too much for those who today are carrying our flag to victory on the battlefields of the world. It is the duty of Congress to enact a complete program of relief and rehabilitation. It is the duty of Congress to pass all the legislation necessary to care for those who have borne the brunt of battle that this Nation and all it stands for may not perish.

The first and most pressing problem in the field of foreign affairs is to win the war. We are making excellent progress in the achievement of this objective. Today the Nazis are being overwhelmed in Russia and harassed by incessant bombing in western Europe. Under American fire the Japanese are retreating from their outposts in the Pacific. In 1944 we will see the dawn of victory. The collapse of Hitler and his military machine may be only a matter of months and the fall of Japan will doubtless be realized next year. We know that our men and our arms will crush the enemy wherever he may be found. Let us make sure that our statesmanship will win the peace.

The foreign policy of the United States should be decided upon with the interests of this country clearly in mind. The Republican Party by the declaration at Mackinac and by the voting in Congress for the Fulbright and Connally resolutions has expressed itself as wholeheartedly approving international cooperation and collaboration. All are agreed that we must strive to prevent future wars and endeavor to replace world anarchy with international good will. Any political party to exist must be in favor of an international organization to end wars. I personally have long been an advocate of international machinery to prevent conflicts and to promote the general welfare of all the people in this world. The best thought and the wisest statesmanship will be required as we construct the international community of tomorrow. This Republic must assume leadership commensurate with the power we possess. No longer is it possible for any people to remain in isolation or to remain apart from the stream of world affairs, either in war or in peace.

Only recently Congressman MARTIN called for congressional representation at the peace table. The Secretary of State is discussing foreign affairs with the Members of Congress. Congress must take an increasingly active part in the formulation of our foreign policy. It would be a most constructive move to have a joint committee of both Houses work with the executive department in the field of foreign relations.

In his recent statement on international affairs the Secretary of State referred to the Atlantic Charter as "an expression of fundamental objectives toward which we and our allies are directing our policies." A year ago last March I introduced a House Concurrent Resolution which, if passed, would place Congress on record as endorsing the principles of the Atlantic Charter. I have long felt that we should have congressional discussion and congressional approval of the principles contained in this famous document.

The Constitution should be amended to permit the House to share in the treaty-making power of the Federal Government.

In speaking to the young Republicans of Ohio last January 22, I employed these words: "One of the most needed reforms is now to amend the Constitution so that a simple majority of both Houses of Congress will be able to ratify a treaty. This should be the next step in developing a foreign policy to meet the complexities of this modern scientific era." On April 13 the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs introduced a joint resolution which has as its objective the amending of the Constitution so that a majority of both Houses may ratify treaties.

A discussion of the Atlantic Charter, the appointment of a committee of both Houses to work with the executive department on foreign affairs, the submission to the people of a constitutional amendment so that treaties may be ratified by a simple majority of Congress, the construction of a world organization to preserve the peace and the development of plans for an adequate defense policy after the war are practical and much needed courses of action.

Never in the history of this Republic has there been such an urgent demand for courageous leadership and intelligent statesmanship. The Republican Party has great tasks to perform. No political organization in any country has had heavier responsibilities or finer opportunities to write an imperishable record of high achievement. In fighting this war it has been necessary to delegate many powers to the Chief Executive, but as soon as the war is over, these powers must be returned to Congress. We must make certain that we will have a healthy economic life in the post-war period. We must clean up the administration of domestic affairs and free the Nation from those who are trying to change this system of government. We must strive to implement the Connally resolution and build that type of an international organization which will become the hope of the future and the hope of those who bleed and suffer and die today that the institutions of democracy may endure. The victories which our armed forces are winning must not be subsequently lost.

As we approach an unknown and uncharted future let us be resolved that the Republican Party shall be the instrumentality of making this Nation truly free economically, socially, and politically. Let us be resolved that this party shall be the instrumentality whereby this Republic will assume its rightful place of leadership in the march of humanity toward the goal of world unity. Let us be determined that from the ashes of this globe-encircling conflagration, that from the pain and the blood and the sacrifices of those who are fighting for freedom, there will arise a structure of international understanding and good will that will afford to all nations the richest possible economic development at home and freedom from cruelty and aggression abroad.

Why I Would Like To Be a WAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, Miss Billie Maye Runyard, Antioch Township High School, Antioch, Ill., is the Tenth Congressional District winner of the WAC essay contest in which high school and junior college girls participated during the civilian WAC recruiting campaign last fall. I have just presented her with the prize—a $25 War bond. She has made an excellent contribution to the victory effort and I take pleasure in including her winning essay in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

WHY I WOULD LIKE TO BE A WAC

America has been very slow to realize the enormity of this war. Stories like Bataan and Wake Island have gradually shocked us into a consciousness of our importance in this war. With this consciousness of a need for support from every American came that ever-ready cooperation which one finds only in America.

Men had the Army as an outlet for their patriotic spirits, but women, who wanted to be more than mere spectators, who wanted to "get in there" and help win, had no such opportunity until the Women's Army Corps was formed in the fall of '42.

A WAC does not fight, but she does take the place of a soldier by doing noncombatant work in offices, hospitals, communication centers, and post exchanges.

As a WAC, I'll be helping to protect our American liberty, the one and only kind for me; I'll help to avenge those bloody sacrifices on Bataan and Wake; I'll be helping my country win.

BILLIE MAYE RUNYARD,
Antioch Township High School,
Antioch, Ill., Congressional District No. 10.

Resolution of Creston, Iowa, Chamber of Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, considerable interest has been shown in the bill H. R. 4184, which prohibits the transportation of Army and Navy personnel and property at other than the regular rate and fare on land-grant railroads, and the Creston, Iowa, Chamber of Commerce has adopted a resolution which I desire to call to the attention of the House. Under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I include copy of the resolution adopted April 19, 1944:

CRESTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Creston, Iowa, April 19, 1944.

"Whereas it has been called to the attention of the Creston Chamber of Commerce that H. R. 4184 has been introduced in the House of Representatives and proposes to correct certain inequalities in rates authorized by the Transportation Act of 1940 and acts prior thereto. Such inequalities of rates are permitted to exist to the detriment of private citizens as well as other businesses and organizations. We therefore resolve that the Congress of the United States be and is hereby requested to pass H. R. 4184 for the following reasons which to us are pertinent:

"1. The present land-grant rate permits discrimination and inequalities in favor of one shipper competing with another.

"2. We believe the Government should pay the same transportation charges as are paid by its own citizens.

"3. We believe that the Government has received full payment many times over for the lands granted because the railroads have added to the settlement of the continent, the building of the Nation, increased the wealth and taxable rescurces of the country, enhanced the value of the lands it has retained and has consistently reduced its transportation costs throughout the many years, and

"4. The present land-grant rate with land-grant reductions conceals the extent to what reductions are made so that it is impossible for shippers to deal with the Government on equal terms known to all."

This resolution unanimously passed and adopted at a special meeting of the Creston Chamber of Commerce held at 2 p. m., April 19, 1944, and ordered forwarded to Congressman K. M. LECOMPTE.

———, ———,
President, Creston Chamber of Commerce.

The Last Stand Against Bureaucracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, as part of this extension of remarks, I include an address, entitled "The Last Stand Against Bureaucracy," delivered at the meeting of the Committee on Administrative Law at the Hotel Biltmore, New York City, March 30, 1944, by Judge James A. Emery, general counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers:

The past 5 years have witnessed the rise of a continuing public interest in, and an unusual endeavor by the Congress to meet, the ever more serious problem of the control of the agencies engaged in the administration of law. The public demand for such action, expressed in often vague but rising criticism of bureaucracy, is now confined to no group. The farmer, the laborer, the merchant, and the manufacturer are equally insistent on correction of the abuses in the administration of our multiplying agencies, which they believe have invaded their respective rights through arbitrary action, marked bias, frequent errors of interpretation, unauthorized formulations of public policy or distortions of discretion, for which the victim has an inadequate remedy or none.

This universal recognition of a dangerous tendency toward Federal administrative absolutism is not a complaint against the natural growth of rational regulation of national trade or commerce, nor is it an unwillingness to perceive the necessity for emergency limitations upon rights of person and property necessitated by the prosecution of the war; nor is it any failure to recognize that there must be necessary and practical delegations of authority and discretion in the discharge of both the executive and legislative functions as the economic and social life of the United States becomes increasingly complex. It is a widespread perception of the dangers to the practical and necessary liberty of the farmer, the worker, the businessman by the unparalleled multiplication of executive agencies, boards, and commissions, formulating binding public policy, writing rules and regulations for the conduct of persons and the uses of property which have the effect and penalties of congressional legislation without uniform procedure, or adequate judicial review, which our traditions and constant experience have demonstrated are essential to the perpetuation of limited government and effective protection for individual liberty.

The President cannot personally execute the laws. He has 3,000,000 civil assistants to aid in their administration and an army of officials to whom he delegates authority. Our courts have held from the beginning that Congress cannot delegate the power to make a law. But it can make a law to delegate the power to find some condition, fact, or circumstance upon which a previously established congressional rule of conduct becomes effective. The Congress cannot find the facts upon which it levies an export duty or a tax, so it authorizes the President, whom it may make its agent for the finding of some condition, or it creates a board, a commission, or an agency to fill in the details or find the facts or circumstances to which the necessary, preestablished congressional standard or rule is then applied.

But the President or his representative or the board or the bureau or the commission is not dealing with merely arithmetic. It has within its reach, with the vast growth of Federal power by both assertion and interpretation, many social and economic relations of the citizen, which but recently were in their nature local in all the details of their management and legal supervision.

The area and subject matter of Federal Government has within a generation suffered a revolutionary expansion. Let us take a familiar example, the commerce power. A popular as well as a legal distinction between production and commercial intercourse between the States was clearly recognized by far more than a century of undisputed judicial decision. If it were sought to extend the commerce power to include control over manufacture, mining, agriculture, or factory workers, because the product of such activities either contemplated or hoped to move into the markets of other States, or competed in its own locality with their goods; the public shared the view of generations of judges:

"The result would be that Congress would be invested to the exclusion of the States with the power to regulate not only manufacture but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry."

Today the persons, natural and corporate, engaged in all these innumerable activities, the nature and amount of their crops, or output, their hours, wages and salaries, the form of their individual and collective relations—to the extent that individual employment relations are still permissible—the price and amount of goods that may be marketed and privacies of individual and community life once presumed to be not merely remote, but immune, from Federal control and supervision, are the actual or proposed subjects of detailed management not as a temporary wartime policy but as permanent subjects for varied direction through individual agents, boards, and commissions, operating under Executive orders, directives, and proclamations or congressional delegation of authority.

Each of these agencies has its origin presumptively, either in the constitutional authority of the President or an act of Congress making him the executor of its policy or authority directly from the Congress which the agency is to administer. The officer or body in question establishes rules of procedure and often major regulations by which it interprets its powers and gives effect to its authority. If it must ascertain facts before making decisions, it must have rules of evidence, the power to summon and examine witnesses and require the production of records and make ultimate orders profoundly affecting persons and property under penalty of fine, imprisonment, or the impairment or deprivation of livelihood. But neither the President, Congress, much less the agencies both create, have, or can have, unlimited or indefinite authority. The two former are constitutionally restricted, the agencies by the nature and terms of their delegated authority. Ours is a deliberately limited Government and to that end its limitations were written. But if the action of any agency in violation of such limitations may not be subjected to judicial scrutiny, any agency of government may exercise uncontrolled discretion or power. All distinction between arbitrary and limited government is soon lost. If the restraint, either of the Constitution or the enactment of Congress is not enforcible, what officials may do and what they may not do is equally permissible. For that reason every grant of power must be clearly defined. But if the agency has a biased interest in the subject committed to it, or is open to partisan influence, if it can act without a fair hearing, or upon anything it calls evidence on an uncontrolled finding of fact, if it may be at once prosecutor and judge; if in any or all such things it may elude judicial control, it substitutes personal rule for government by law. It is confined within neither statutory nor constitutional limitations. It becomes, by public tolerance or neglect, a bureaucratic outlaw.

There is but one control whose deterrent influence was designed and prevents administrative error or misconduct, the rise of arbitrary official power, and thus protects the liberties and rights it is the primary purpose of our form of government to secure. That is adequate opportunity for judicial review of questions of law and the examination of facts found, to determine whether they support orders issued, are relevant to the issues presented, credible, and substantial.

Every sensible person recognizes the value and necessity of empowering administrative officials and tribunals to fill in the detail and ascertain the facts and conditions to which Congress wants its regulation applied or the circumstances ascertained under which a valid Executive order is to be made effective. But we are solemnly and repeatedly warned that administrative law must be surrounded with effective safeguards for private right or we develop an anonymous bureaucracy, not by accident but by design, as dangerous to our native conception of responsible government as any which threatens the people of Europe. It is this continuing danger, confirmed by experience, that causes Congress and many eminent authorities to demand curbs, not on the use but the abuse of administrative law.

Listen to former Chief Justice Hughes as president of the American Bar Association:

"The power of administrative bodies to make findings of fact which may be treated as conclusive, if there is evidence both ways, is a power of enormous consequence. An unscrupulous administrator might be tempted to say, 'Let me find the facts for the people of my country and I care little who lays down the general principles.'"

Now the Supreme Court describes the danger and emphasizes the necessity for judicial safeguards:

"Legislative agencies, with varying qualifications, work in a field peculiarly exposed to political demands. Some may be expert and impartial, others subservient. It is not difficult for them to observe the requirements of law in giving a hearing and receiving evidence. But to say that their findings of fact may be made conclusive where constitutional rights of liberty and property are involved, although the evidence clearly establishes that the findings are wrong and constitutional rights have been invaded, is to place those rights at the mercy of administrative officials and seriously to impair the security inherent in our judicial safeguards. That prospect, with our multiplication of administrative agencies, is not one to be lightly regarded."

The Lord Chief Justice of Great Britain was so convinced of the dangers in this field within his own country that in a series of letters in the public press he illustrated, with numerous examples, exercise of administrative authority which at once invaded the dearest rights of the subject and denied him judicial protection. The distinguished Englishman even outlined with shrewd practicality the method by which an official could and did hold and create arbitrary power:

"This course will prove tolerably simple," he said, "if he can (a) get legislation passed in skeleton form; (b) fill up the gaps with his own rules, orders, and regulations; (c) make it difficult or impossible for Parliament to check the said rules, orders, and regulations; (d) secure for them the force of statute; (e) arrange that the fact of his decision shall be conclusive proof of its legality; (f) take power to modify the provisions of statutes; and (g) prevent and avoid any sort of appeal to a court of law."

How often that fits American administrative legislation.

President Roosevelt as Governor of New York called in 1930 for a halt to the steady extension of commissions and regulatory bodies. As President he appointed a Committee on Administrative Management to study, report, and recommend a method of controlling the numerous Federal agencies. Reporting in 1937 the committee identified 134 administrative agencies and commissions, and remarked, "Perhaps the chief reason for worry about regulatory commissions, is that they are continually being created." It thus described their nature and characterized their operation:

"These independent commissions have been given broad powers to explore, formulate, and administer policies of regulation; they have been given the task of investigating and prosecuting business misconduct; they have been given powers, similar to those exercised by courts of law, to pass in concrete cases upon the rights and liabilities of individuals under the statutes. They are in reality miniature independent governments set up to deal with the railroad problem, the banking problem, or the radio problem. They constitute a headless 'fourth branch' of the Government, a haphazard deposit of irresponsible agencies and uncoordinated powers. They do violence to the basic theory of the American Constitution that there should be three major branches of the Government and only three. The Congress has found no effective way of supervising them, they cannot be controlled by the President, and they are answerable to the courts only in respect to the legality of their activities." (President's Committee on Administrative Management, Report With Special Studies, 1937, p. 39.)

The President transmitted the report to the Congress for their information, with his approval. Three years later the Congress, after elaborate hearings and extensive study, enacted the Walter-Logan bill, "to regulate the regulators." The measure defined the procedure by which the rules and regulations of such agencies should be formulated and proclaimed, together with safeguards to assure impartial hearings and operation, and a uniform system of judicial review. The measure was vigorously opposed by the agencies involved, its consideration obstructed, and its passage opposed by the administration. It was vetoed December 18, 1940.

The subject, however, will not down. On the contrary, it excites increasing public anxiety and renewed congressional determination to enact practical remedial legislation. This movement is reinforced by the unparalleled increase of executive agencies and further evidence of arbitrary action. Furthermore, a numerous school of administrators and their satellites boldly demand final authority for many boards and commissions to exclusively interpret the statutes which are the source of their authority and determine for themselves the character and extent of their powers. Whatever their individual antecedents they hold, appointment qualifies them as "experts" in their field, and are, therefore, generally irritated by the suggestion of judicial review. They point the farewell admonition of Washington to vigilantly watch, "that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart."

Groups that sought the creation of administrative bodies in their own interest are now repenting in sackcloth and ashes. They find themselves confronted with Frankensteins. No severer criticism of the National Labor Relations Board has been uttered by any employer than by the representative officers of both the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., and the U. M. W. The farmer has found himself covered with restrictions on production and marketing. He may not kill his own stock on his own farm for his own use without administrative permission. The Securities and Exchange Commission directs a company to issue stock rather than bonds and thus substitutes its judgment of business policy, without appeal, for the customary discretion of executive management. Its counsel declares, "We do make the law. If our regulation is valid it supersedes all laws that are contrary to it." The National Labor Relations Board declared, without statutory authority, that no employer would be heard who petitioned it to determine which of two contesting labor groups he was obligated by law to recognize at his peril. Until stopped by the Supreme Court the Board declared sit-down strikers employees entitled to reinstatement and back pay during the strike. It gave secret instructions to its officers with respect to the issuance of subpenas affecting one party only. The Federal Communications Commission proclaimed a rule requiring broadcast to foreign territory to reflect American culture. But in the midst of public derision withdrew a rule it could neither explain or define. Shortly after the same body asserted the right to determine for the radio industry whether television had reached a point in its development that it could be offered to the public.

Within 6 months the Switchmen's and Firemen's National Unions have discovered, through the Supreme Court, that their right to represent their members is finally determined by an administrative tribunal, and no court may examine the circumstances or the conclusion. Although, declared a powerful dissent: "No intention to refuse judicial aid in administration of the act is apparent." The Union of Red Caps recently found no court could review the finding of the Railroad Mediation Board, that it cannot represent its own members but must be represented by a union to which they may not belong.

Mr. Justice Frankfurter in a recent opinion, pointed out that nearly every administrative body had not only different powers but varying procedure and limitations upon court review. For some it is denied altogether. For some it is limited severely. Such limitations apply not merely to questions of fact, but of law. Some powerful agencies make their own rules of evidence, and under the specious plea of avoiding "technicalities" have, as in the case of the National Labor Relations Board, not only disregarded plain precepts of law and equity, representing the experience of the race, but permitted, according to a Congressional investigation, the taking of evidence outside the record and the writing of preliminary opinions for the Board, by what were described as "juvenile judges".

Confronted with similar but less grievous conditions, a notable English parliamentary committee, including Prof. Harold Laski, investigating British administrative agencies concluded and recommended:

"We are, therefore, unanimously of opinion that no considerations of administrative convenience, or executive efficiency, should be allowed to weaken the control of the courts, and that no obstacle should be placed by Parliament in the way of the subject's unimpeded access to them."

The invincible demand for uniform judicial review is reinforced by enumeration of the volume of administrative rules and regulations and Executive orders under which we now live. Remember these govern you. For, said the Brookings Institution, speaking of American administrative law:

"It is more than a mere machine for the application of law. To an increasing extent it has become a creator of law; in this sense and within the limits of their respective competences, the administrative departments and agencies resemble a group of special legislative bodies."

The Superintendent of Documents, under the provisions of the Federal Register Act, advertised a few years ago the publication of the Code of Federal Regulations. It was first made available during 1940, embracing "all documents of the various administrative agencies which had general applicability and legal effect June 1, 1938." It then consisted of 50 titles in 17 volumes or from 1,000 to 1,200 pages each. It has now reached more than 26 volumes of some 9,000 additional pages.

At the moment Senator SHIPSTEAD of Minnesota is vainly endeavoring to secure an investigation by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary to determine "the source of constitutional or legislative authority for some 3,500 Executive orders issued between 1933 and 1942." Meantime a select committee of the House is investigating executive agencies. It recently reported there are in operation policies of the War Labor Board, in its opinion "highly dangerous and menacing to the system of private enterprise and the constitutional right of judicial review of administrative decisions."

The Judiciary Committee of the House declared 3 years ago:

"It is practically impossible for a Member of the Congress, much less for an individual citizen, to find their way among these many agencies or to locate the particular officer or employee in any of the agencies with whom any particular problem should be discussed with a view to settlement."

But Congress is not alone in its bewilderment. Not only the private citizen but the courts and the executive officials have been equally perplexed in locating Executive orders. In 1935, in the midst of the N. I. R. A., the case of the Panama Refining Co. and the Amazon Petroleum Co. in the Supreme Court of the United States to test, among other things, appeared the validity of section 4 of article III of the Petroleum Code. During the argument Mr. Justice Brandeis vainly endeavored to discover from the representatives of the Government where the original Code was. The case had gone through the District Court and the Court of Appeals, but not until argument in the Supreme Court was it discovered that the provision in question had been eliminated by an Executive order, "with the result," said the Court, "that the persons affected, the prosecuting authorities, and the courts were alike ignorant of the alteration." The attack was upon a provision which did not exist. The Government sought to revive the case by an Executive order, but found it impossible to make it retroactive.

Let us not forget that for 3 years the people of the United States lived under the N. I. R. A., which sought to give to the President and those required to formulate codes of fair practice the power to legislate for themselves with such unfettered discretion that Mr. Justice Cardozo described the grant of power as "delegation run riot."

Such is the condition crying for correction. It is essential, said the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and House in 1940, "that the governors shall be governed and the regulators shall be regulated if our present form of government is to endure."

These are grave words addressed to a grave situation. Once again the Congress engages in the same task. Once again aroused public interest can focus congressional attention and secure congressional action on this vital subject.

Far more important than stopping or correcting the maladministration of a particular bureau or commission, or the amendment of a particular Executive order or administrative statute, is the establishment by Congress of a general plan of control over all administrative agencies that assures in definite terms a return to fundamental principles of impersonal government, limited in its nature and protected against the abuse of official power, by the great or the small, through judicial enforcement of the great limitations.

"Among freemen," said Edmund Burke, "restraints on government are to be numbered among their liberties."

The opportunity to secure relief and reform is here. Have we the determination to seek and obtain it? If we have, our people may make this the last stand of arrogant bureaucracy.

Address of Admiral Ernest J. King

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Admiral Ernest J. King, United States Navy, commander in chief, United States Fleet, and Chief of Naval Operations, at the graduating exercises, twenty-fourth session, F. B. I. National Police Academy, Departmental Auditorium, Washington, D. C., April 15, 1944:

Mr. Hoover, distinguished guests, members of the graduating class, ladies and gentlemen, strange as it might seem to the unobserving, there is a curious but very tangible connection between the job the United States Navy is doing today, and what law enforcement officers in hundreds of American communities are doing. Our objectives are the same. You are protecting the American home, the individual rights and privileges on the domestic front. We in the Navy and in the other armed forces are now working, chiefly overseas, for a similar purpose. None realize more than we that the battle against lawlessness, against espionage and sabotage, which you are fighting, is as essential to overall victory as those engagements in which ships, aircraft, or land forces participate.

The Navy, and especially the officers charged with administering intelligence matters, realize full well what effective work the law-enforcement officers throughout our land have done to make this country more secure before and since the outbreak of war. Many of these law-enforcement officers received their training in this school. It can be said that naval intelligence officers have been working hand in hand with officers of the Federal Bureau of Investigation for a long time. The absence of foreign-directed sabotage is proof enough of the results of the work of this Bureau and of the spirit of earnest cooperation which exists between the F. B. I., the Army, the Navy, the three principal agencies charged with safeguarding military secrets, industrial production, and the general welfare.

There was widespread apprehension at the outbreak of war that America might be riddled with foreign agents ready to wreck our industries, destroy our communications, scuttle our ships, and otherwise disrupt the normal defense measures we were hastening to perfect. This alarm was not without foundation. We have a heterogeneous population; many of our citizens were born in other countries; some of them might reasonably be expected to feel a blood tie with peoples now our enemies. But the F. B. I., aided by efficient and loyal police departments in hundreds of American communities, had most potentially dangerous characters catalogued before Pearl Harbor. At the first warning of danger they were apprehended. Our relative freedom from sabotage and from interference in military movements and plans at home has been the result of such farsighted planning on the part of the agencies concerned.

The development of this school has been interesting. We in the Navy realize that an inadequately educated naval officer, or a poorly trained bluejacket, cannot be expected to carry out his duties with any degree of success. An unskilled gunner can cause the loss of a ship and the death of many shipmates. In like manner, untrained or halfhearted law-enforcement officers do little to combat crime and secure the safety of local communities. The tangible evidence of awakening community interest in training specialists in your profession, such as you who are graduating here today, is a clear indication that communities which sponsored your period of study here are supporting your efforts to combat crime and thus help to preserve individual rights and liberties.

Through your local police bureaus, you actually are working more directly than you perhaps suspect with the Army and Navy, as well as with the F. B. I. You know, I am sure, of the interdepartmental conference which meets in Washington, when matters affecting national security are discussed between officers of the Army's G–2 Division, of the Navy's O. N. I., and the F. B. I. These conferences are valuable, and have resulted in close liaison between the several investigation and law-enforcement agencies. For instance, the Navy frequently desires an investigation of individuals who are not in the naval service. In such cases a request is made to the F. B. I. to conduct the inquiry. The F. B. I., through its field officer, frequently utilizes the local law-enforcement agencies for such information or assistance as is required. In this way, all energies, in an interlocking manner, are turned toward the common objective of national security with the minimum of duplication or red tape.

You can realize the value of this close cooperation when I tell you that during World War No. 1 no less than 21 agencies were charged with the work the 3 existing organizations are now doing; naturally there was more overlapping authority with consequent delay and duplication.

The fact that at least 100,000 law-enforcement officers have been directly assisted and affected by the F. B. I.'s National Police Academy and its graduates is an indication that former days of lawlessness and disrespect for law and order will not return. Peaceful citizens of this country can be thankful for the men whose vision and whose labor brought this about; similarly we in the Navy are appreciative of the splendid and efficient cooperation we receive from this Bureau and from the local police agencies throughout the country.

One of the greatest essentials in waging war is the ability to surprise our enemies. To catch them off guard is our constant endeavor. We have done this time and again. At Kwajalein, for instance, we caught the Jap planes on the ground on our first day's attack. Not many of them were able to get into the air, and we shot down most of those that did. On the second day, so complete had been our surprise, that of the few planes that came up to offer resistance, not one attacked our surface forces. That, of course, was possible only because complete military secrecy of the plans, as well as the movement of our ships, for this campaign was maintained. Secrecy during the planning and initial phases of naval operations is essential. No better example need be cited than the necessity to deprive the enemy of all information concerning the movement of convoys.

To you, as representatives of police bureaus of these cities and ports, I would like at this time to express the Navy's gratitude for the cooperative spirit you have shown in helping us guard these secrets from the enemy which could be of such vital importance to our cause. Local police cooperation, as well as that of the F. B. I., has been especially valuable and graciously given in all parts of this country.

I know you are interested in what the Navy is doing and what it plans to do, and so—keeping within security myself—I would like to review some of our recent actions and in general discuss some of our plans for the future.

Our objective in the Pacific, it goes without saying, is Tokyo. But we do not underestimate our enemies. We give them credit for determination and tenacity, skill, and ingenuity, as well as a savage disregard for humanity and for lives—even their own.

Our recent successes in the Pacific reflect, in a large measure, a single factor. For the first time since the war with Japan began we are well on the way to having an adequate number of ships, planes, and supplies so that when we find a soft spot in the enemies' defenses we can strike with overwhelming force. Heretofore in the Battle of the Coral Sea, at Midway, and again in the battles in the Solomons, we tore great gaps in Japan's outer defenses. But on each of those occasions we lacked the reserve of ships and aircraft which would have enabled us to follow up and capitalize on our hard-earned opportunities.

I think we could rightly define a major part of our policy with respect to the Pacific as "seizure of opportunity." So far it has been impossible, for lack of Japanese cooperation, to stage a major sea battle. We are willing, but the Japs do not seem to want to gamble with that type of battle. So we are seeking opportunities to strike whenever we can get within range of their warships or bases, and I think you will find, within the next few months to come that we shall create more of these opportunities. For example, I have only to cite the recent successful attacks on Palau, Yap, and Woleai Islands.

Recenty in a weekly magazine someone claimed the discovery of the fact that all things which have been done in the Pacific conform to a pattern. That is correct. What we have accomplished and what we shall accomplish in the near future are integral parts of a pattern, the key design of which is the defeat of Japan.

It is gratifying to report to you today that we have reduced Japan's merchant fleet to not more than two-thirds of what it was when we were attacked. We have sunk well over 2,000,000 tons of her cargo tonnage and have so seriously damaged her fleet of warships that she can never hope to make up losses by building new fighting ships or repairing those that we have damaged. One indication that Japan's shipping problem is becoming acute is the wide use she is making of self-propelled barges, many of wood, for long interisland hauls of both men and materials. If she had enough ships she would never resort to such transportation. To date we have sunk, probably sunk, or damaged by submarine action at least 600 Japanese merchant vessels. She cannot stand such a rate of loss for any length of time and keep her Empire together. The dissolution of that Empire, of course, is one of the primary objectives of this war.

All in all the operations of the past 12 months have been highly encouraging. In the Atlantic we have reduced the submarine situation from the status of a menace to that of a problem. Today we know that Germany is concentrating on the building of submarines to the exclusion of other shipbuilding, and we know how many she is producing. But it is unlikely that Hitler will be able to terrorize Atlantic shipping lanes again as he did 2 years ago.

In the Pacific the strategy of the enemy has been fairly simple. While we were pulling ourselves together after the shock of Pearl Harbor the Japanese quickly overran large areas in the Far East. They reasoned, and rightly, that if they succeed in retaining possession of the inner portion of these areas they will have won the war. The outer ring of islands which they occupy serves chiefly as their fighting front. Through their persistence in holding these islands they hope to make our advance so costly that we will give up the effort to break into their inner defense.

But whatever the cost we know that we cannot regard victory in the Pacific as anything short of the dissolution of the Japanese Empire as a military power. To accomplish this objective we must deliver the heaviest attacks of which we are capable, as frequently as we are able, where they will hurt the most. This will require every ship, every landing craft, every airplane, and every piece of matériel—and the trained personnel to man them—that can be made available.

Our fleet, I can assure you today, is growing at a pace that is little short of miraculous. Its growth could only have been made possible by the energies and the skill of a great and resourceful people. Most of all, the progress we have made in arming ourselves within the past year constitutes in itself a lasting tribute to the American workman. He is doing more than I can tell you to win this war.

I can reveal to you here today that, since July 1, 1940, the Navy has increased the number of warships in our fleet by 130 percent; we have built the greatest fleet of supporting vessels and landing craft that the world has ever seen; we have tripled the fire power of our fleet; we have multiplied our air force by 14; and we have expanded our personnel almost 15 times—the greatest marshaling of men and materials the world has ever witnessed.

Operations we have carried out in recent weeks are evidence in themselves that the accumulated experiences of previous campaigns have been made to count. As time goes on, the Japs will learn that we are not relying on so-called orthodox methods of warfare. We are meeting each situation as it arises or as we can create situations, and our enemies are finding that when we strike, we now have the force behind us to carry the strike through to a finish. Certainly we can look forward with resolute but realistic confidence to future triphibious naval operations, now that we have the men, the guns, the ships, and the planes to carry them out.

I want to reemphasize to you that, while I am talking of the war that the Navy is conducting on land, at sea, and in the air, we are not unmindful of the battle you face here at home. Were these efforts not successful our difficulties would be increased many fold. You have a tremendous job to do to keep the home front safe. I know that you young gentlemen, as a result of what you have learned here at the National Police Academy, will leave Washington with renewed confidence in your ability to meet situations that will arise in the exercise of your duty as law-enforcement officers. I congratulate you on your graduation today, I assure you that the Navy appreciates the tremendous scope of the work you will be called upon to do, and I promise you that you will have our backing and our wholehearted cooperation in the discharge of your duties. Good luck to you one and all.

Address by J. Edgar Hoover at Graduation Exercises of F. B. I. National Police Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, at the graduation exercises for the twenty-fourth session of the F. B. I. National Police Academy, on April 15, 1944. The address is entitled "The Importance of Your Job."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE IMPORTANCE OF YOUR JOB

Members of the twenty-fourth session of the National Police Academy are returning home at a crucial time. You have completed 14 weeks of diligent and successful effort to prepare yourselves more fully for the task of efficient and impartial law enforcement.

It is well to be ready for the big job which lies ahead. The cunning minds of America's criminals are not idle. While you have learned new ways of fighting the age-old problem of crime, they have been devising their own methods of victimizing the public and escaping punishment. Some are fiendishly clever; many are embittered and treacherous.

Even as you have worked with us to enlarge the scope of your knowledge on law enforcement, there have been significant trends. For example, consider the large number of hijackings and related thefts which have occurred in recent months. In many cases coming to the attention of the F. B. I., small but well-organized gangs have been found responsible. Many of these are composed of persons with criminal records who have been the recipients of that too often misused instrument of leniency—parole. Unmolested and left to take what they like from business concerns and transportation companies, these groups of hoodlums would grow larger, richer, and more powerful. Soon, we would find ourselves caught in the tentacles of a gigantic octopus of gangsterism. Human life would become cheap; mobsters drunk with power would subject honest citizens to all kinds of indignities. And inevitably the political machinery of some of our cities and States would come under the corrupt domination of this criminal octopus.

Law enforcement stands between the public and this menace. Special agents of the F. B. I. and local officers all over the Nation are aware of this threatened upsurge of gangsterism, and good work has been done recently in bringing such persons to justice.

There is no doubt that the ghosts of the old gangs are stirring. By prompt, concerted action they can be forced to remain as mere unpleasant memories of an unhappy era.

The continued high rate of crime and definite threats such as that offered by gangs of bold and heartless hijackers make a bad enough situation. But add to that the present deplorable situation in regard to juvenile delinquency in the United States and it becomes shockingly evident that you truly are returning to your homes and jobs at a crucial time.

All thoughtful persons are much concerned over the steady increase in crime among our boys and girls. This is tragic, indeed, for every child is a potential good citizen. But when serious delinquency develops there is danger that the individual will become a liability instead of an asset to society.

Law enforcement must be constantly aware of this Nation-wide problem. In fact, law enforcement must assume leadership in this field lest it fall into the hands of foggy-minded theorists who would experiment with it at the cost of the well-being of our youth. Law enforcement must be ready to lend a hand to parents, the church, school, and the numerous worth-while organizations alarmed over this dangerous trend and trying to do something about it.

The law, to most youngsters, is personified by the officer on the beat, and if proper respect is to be developed and maintained for legal authority, it must be done through these men. A genuine interest in youngsters and a friendly effort to help them solve their problems are necessary. You, as key men in your organizations, can accomplish great good by promoting this kind of attitude. Our children should be made to feel that the officer of the law is their friend and protector, for that, in truth, is his role. By following such a policy, we shall be able to save an untold number of youngsters from becoming criminals of tomorrow and thus will reduce the tremendous toll of crime in America.

These are problems for strong men, but I am proud to say we have many of them left in law enforcement. We, too, have suffered from the loss of trained and invaluable men who have accepted higher-paying positions or have left for the armed services. But despite this handicap, we ask no allowances. We shall continue to stand shoulder to shoulder in protection of society against the evil forces of lawlessness and we shall not for a moment think of taking even one backward step.

There will be periods of discouragement. Situations are certain to arise which will leave you wondering if the results are worth the effort. But that is the time to work harder and to battle even more determinedly against the criminal foe.

Law enforcement, of course, cannot do the job alone. We must have the active support of the prosecuting authorities, the courts, the public, press, and radio. America must not lose sight of the fact that the goal of our law enforcement and judicial system is the protection of society. Laws and tribunals were designed to administer justice and not provide a maze of technicalities which would allow the guilty to escape punishment.

The great majority of citizens and most of the press and radio give their unstinting support to intelligent law enforcement. But there are a craven few who strive to tear down all respect for law and authority. You, as well as I, have been the recipients of the smear attacks of these distorters of truth.

Fortunately, we can rely on the decency and fairness of Americans to judge accurately between such charlatans and those who exercise their right and duty to criticize honestly and justly where they feel criticism is due.

Our work is made much harder by the maudlin sentimentality exhibited in some places by the promiscuous granting of pardons and paroles.

There are the perennial sob sisters of both sexes who would give every criminal another chance after another chance. We must guard against the influence of these misty-eyed theorists. When a vicious and depraved convict is turned loose and goes back to his old ways we should be certain that the true facts are called to the attention of the public.

This is no time for softness. Americans are dying every hour of the day so that the privileges of our democratic way of life can be preserved and passed along to our children and future generations. We must have the determination and the courage to carry through with our assignment, for we cannot lose the battle at home.

Law enforcement is justified in viewing with pride its wartime record. It has set an example in cooperation and unselfish work for the good of the Nation which is reflected in many ways. There has been no public hysteria, Axis espionage efforts have been kept under control and not one case of enemy-directed sabotage has occurred.

We shall continue to work together as comrades in arms. We shall protect the homes of America against the vicious few who have no regard for property, decency, or human life. And, if it be within our power, when our fighting men come home after the day of inevitable victory, they will find contentment, security, and peace with their loved ones.

Powers of the O. P. A. Threaten the Rights of Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio broadcast by Fulton Lewis, Jr., delivered on the evening of April 20, 1944, on the subject Powers of the O. P. A. Threaten the Rights of Americans.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By way of explanation as to why I have been here in this city of Wichita, Kans., last night and tonight, ladies and gentlemen, I arrived here yesterday morning in connection with a rather unusual story of good American citizens in the heart of real grassroots America who have found out certain practices of their Government in Washington of which they disapprove very emphatically and who, unlike most of us over the country, have decided, upon finding out, to do something about it. They are not politicians, they are not particularly Republicans or anti-New Dealers; they just are Americans who work for a living and who have built up highly respected names for themselves in this community of a quarter of a million people, and who are mad through and through because they have discovered what they believe to be a very un-American and extremely dangerous situation in Government, and in the good old American vernacular, they are raising the devil with everybody in sight and demanding that the situation be corrected, and immediately.

It is odd how the thing started. A local businessman here happened to wander into a hearing room of the O. P. A. Enforcement Division in the local city hall some weeks ago, and there he heard a hearing that was going on involving a local filling-station operator, gasoline filling-station operator, who was accused of violating some O. P. A. regulations, and the businessman was so outraged with what he saw that he began doing some investigating to find out what these hearings were all about, and the further he went the more surprised he became. He told some of his business friends about it and they were as surprised as he had been. The upshot was that they set up an organization and got as their attorney the former Governor of Kansas for two terms, Gov. Payne Ratner, who is one of the most able figures in the State of Kansas, and the fur has been flying ever since, as fur does fly when good red-blooded Americans get really mad and begin figuratively swinging their fists.

The facts and the merits of the particular case which was being heard on the occasion in question are not essential one way or the other. The filling-station operator, who has as fine a reputation for honesty as any citizen in this whole area, was charged by the O. P. A with selling gasoline without collecting ration coupons for it. The O. P. A. made no effort to present any witness to show specific cases. They merely based their case on the fact that the operator was short in his gasoline supply as compared with the tickets he should have.

He said that it was chiefly due to shrinkage and evaporation, but he did admit that in order to get from his home to the filling station and back home every day he had to use perhaps 50 gallons of his own gasoline while he was waiting for the O. P. A. to send him his own personal ration book, and that when the book arrived he only put about 25 gallons' worth of ration coupons in his till to cover the 50 gallons he had used. So technically he was guilty. He was found guilty at this hearing and his filling station, which happens to be his only means of livelihood and which he happens to have operated a great many years past, was closed down by the O. P. A. for 2 months.

This organization makes no defense of the filling station operator for his violation; it has no quarrel with the program of price ceilings or rationing or punishment of violations or efforts to stop black markets—don't make any mistake about that; they make it very clear. The point that outraged them and about which they are stirring up this terrific furor is that in the course of investigating the particular incident they found out what the O. P. A. procedure of enforcement is and they contend with blood in their eye that it not only is absolutely unconstitutional and totally immoral from the standpoint of good government, but from the standpoint of civil liberties and the rights of free people it is a duplication of the Gestapo in Nazi Germany.

The story is this, and frankly I didn't know all of its details myself until I had spent 2 days here investigating their claims and contentions and checking statements with local O. P. A. district officials and also checking with proper authorities in Washington. Perhaps you don't know all of it, either. You probably are aware, however, of the fact that the O. P. A. has set up within itself a sort of a court system in which it hears cases of alleged violations of O. P. A. regulations and decides whether the individual is guilty. If he is, this O. P. A. court pronounces a certain penalty. That's what was happening in this case when the businessman happened to walk into the local courtroom.

What you perhaps do not know, however, and I didn't know it, for one, is that those courts of the O. P. A. are not merely informal review courts designed to eliminate a lot of small cases where the individual is willing to accept the decision, thereby relieving a lot of unnecessary routine and pressure on the regular system of courts throughout the country. That is what the general public understanding was when these O. P. A. courts were set up some months ago, but that is not so. Instead, these O. P. A. courts are all-powerful and all-exclusive, entirely exclusive of the established courts of the land. For example, if you are accused of an O. P. A. violation you don't have any choice of coming to these O. P. A. courts, or, on the other hand, taking your case to the regular courts and getting a trial by jury, if you want it—not at all. You have to submit to the O. P. A. courts; you have to accept the verdict of the O. P. A. judge, and there is no appeal in the regular courts of the land from the decisions of that O. P. A. judge.

The local O. P. A. authorities have corroborated that fact to me today. It seems that there have been several test cases which have been taken as far as the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals and those courts have held that the O. P. A. is right, the individual has no right of appeal at law to challenge any of these O. P. A. court decisions.

Governor Ratner said today that that constitutes the most serious attack on the safety and rights of freemen since the day 700 years ago in England when the British barons forced on King John the Bill of Rights guaranteeing every man a trial by jury. He says the net effect of it is that political appointees of a political bureau in Washington, appointees who have never been subject to the approval of the people by Senate ratification or in any other way, merely appointed on the whim of a $7,500 a year officeholder in Washington, are given complete and total autocratic power over the lives and property of free private citizens. He said it means that these appointed political jobholders serve as complainant, witnesses for the prosecution, prosecuting attorney, judge, jury, all at the same time. They can and have closed down endless businesses of private citizens, and if they decide to do so, the private citizen has no appeal to the courts whatsoever. He said that in this case the sentence was only 60 days, to be sure; it might just as well have been 60 years, however. There is no measure or standard and if the power is there to close down a gasoline business for 60 days, the power is there to take all ration books away from a family for the food that the family has to have.

That is all I have been able positively to establish thus far, but that much is fact. From here on we will try to find out whether there have been any abuses of that power by the O. P. A. courts in any part of the country. If you know of any, I hope you will send them to me in Washington at WOL, because this seems to call for further investigation.

Domestic Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Domestic Lend-Lease," by Mr. F. V. Heinkel, president of the Missouri Farmers' Association, published in the Missouri Farmer for April 15, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOMESTIC LEND-LEASE

When this war is over the Federal Government will have on its hands a tremendous quantity of surplus war materials and equipment. Just how much of these materials there will be few of us can visualize, and just how they will ultimately be disposed of is of concern to every taxpayer.

We cannot visualize the enormity of this surplus material pile because few of us comprehend how very large our country is * * * we cannot grasp how great the Nation's power is to produce goods or to what extent we have been exercising this productive power since Pearl Harbor.

That the surplus will be enormous can be imagined when we consider that our military leaders have wisely prepared for the very worst, because they know that in war we must be ever ready for the unexpected, and they have ordered war materials accordingly.

We can imagine, too, that the surplus will be great in event the war ends suddenly, sooner than expected, which would mean that much of our war materials will not have been used up.

And what will these surplus materials consist of? Tractors, jeeps, bulldozers, rock crushers, cranes, rubber tires, wheels, lumber, concrete mixers, hospital and medical supplies, and a thousand and one other items.

While the war is by no means won, it is not too early for us to form opinions about how these surplus war materials shall be disposed of, and Senator BENNETT C. CLARK was farsighted when he introduced a bill (S. 1815) a few days ago to take care of the situation. The scandals which accompanied the disposition of surplus war materials following World War No. 1 should certainly be avoided.

What shall we do with these materials? Shall they be junked? Sold abroad for whatever they will bring? Sold back to the manufacturers so that they can reap an unjustifiable profit on them? Or, shall they be disposed of to the people who already have, or will in the future, pay for them through taxation? Do they not already belong to the people anyhow?

Senator CLARK's proposal would seem to dispose of the question in an equitable manner. His bill, if enacted into law, would provide for distribution of surplus war materials through domestic lend-lease to States and their political subdivisions and instrumentalities thereof.

A Surplus Property Administration would be established, to exist for a period of 2 years unless its life is later extended by Congress. The S. P. A. would receive all surplus war materials from all other Federal agencies, such as the Army and Navy. This agency would then first ascertain if any other governmental agency had need for any of the surplus materials, and if so, those agencies would have first call for them.

If not, the materials would be disposed of through domestic lend-lease by grant or loan to public agencies for: (a) Purposes of soil conservation or other form of land improvement; (b) for flood control; (c) construction, improvement, or maintenance of roads, highways, or streets; (d) public health, or other public purpose useful and beneficial to the people of the United States.

Senator CLARK's proposal is of vital concern to farmers because, if enacted into law, it would aid agriculture in soil conservation, flood control, rural road building and maintenance, and rural hospitalization, to mention a few possibilities.

When this war ends, we must somehow or other control the devastating floods which cost our Nation millions of dollars in money and an incalculable sum in human suffering each year. We must control soil erosion which is costing us, in the long run, four times as much as floods.

We must provide roads so that farmers can move their products to market any time those products are ready for market, and so that farm children won't have to wade mud on their way to school, and so farm families can go to church on Sunday. And we must provide more adequate rural hospitalization and make available medical services to people in agriculture, who are the backbone of our Nation.

All of these things, and more, could be made possible by an equitable distribution of the surplus war materials as contemplated in Senator CLARK'S bill, and the farmers of Missouri and every other State should fight for its passage.

The proposal is so splendid and fair that one would think it should have smooth sailing through Congress, and particularly so when it is remembered that the people are paying for these materials anyhow through taxation. But such will not be the case.

Selfish individuals and corporations will want to pick up these materials for a song, as was done in many instances following the last war, and either use or resell them for a long profit. Some manufacturers will demand that the materials be junked so that their use by the public will not satisfy a demand which they think might exist for their own newly manufactured products.

Other manufacturers will want the materials turned back to them so that they can resell them at a nice profit. Some sections of organized labor, though not all, may not want the surplus materials disposed of to the public for fear it will create unemployment since the factories will not be engaged in making new goods of these kinds. Other working people would welcome this equitable distribution of the materials, however, because men would be employed to use them.

Senator CLARK'S measure may not provide all the answers to the surplus-war-material problem, but it is definitely a move in the right direction, and it is to be hoped that every Missouri Congressman will give it his support in principle.

F. V. HEINKEL,
President, Missouri Farmers Association.

What's Right With America's War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, Hon. Charles M. Hay, general counsel for the War Manpower Commission, delivered a very interesting address in St. Louis last week. Under the permission granted me I include this address as part of my remarks. It follows:

A few years ago, while preparing an address for a college graduating class on What's Right With America, I went into Washington's largest bookstore in search of some material. When I asked the manager whether he had any book or magazine article on that subject, he smiled with mingled compassion and derision and said: "Oh, no. We have plenty of books on what's wrong with America but nothing on what's right."

But I persisted. I made the speech and was amply rewarded by the response of my hearers who seemed to welcome the title, whatever they may have thought of what I said. That was in 1940. We saw then the possibility of an atack upon our America, and it was good to contemplate what we had that was worth living and dying for. So it is now. It is good now to warm our hearts and fortify our spirits by the contemplation of the fact that we have here a civilization built upon the principle of the equal right of men to life and liberty and the right of the people to govern themselves.

Just as I thought in 1940 that it was good for us to think on the things that are right with our country, so now, as we enter the grimmest, bloodiest days of this terrible conflict, it is good for us to contemplate what's right with us in our war effort. We do not need and must not have overconfidence and deadening optimism; but we do need faith, trust and confidence in ourselves and in each other. We will need to draw closer to each other for mutual comfort and strengthening. We should know whether we are fighting a good fight and whether we are keeping the faith.

Let us see. Have we been and are we right in our war effort? What have we done up to now?

Let us look first at our military forces. When the Japs struck at Pearl Harbor, we were ill-prepared for war—even a war of defense. We had at that time in our military forces—Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard—2,100,000 men.

In December 1941 we had 2,500 naval vessels of all kinds. As for planes, General Arnold says: "December 7, 1941 (December 8, Hawaiian time), found the Army Air Forces equipped with plans but not with planes. When the Japanese struck our combat aircraft strength was little better than a corporal's guard of some 3,000 planes; of these, only 1,157 were actually suited to combat service; of this total, 526 were strategically located to meet possible attacks on the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands. Within a few hours that number was reduced to 176."

It is not too much to say that if the Japs had followed up their sneak but devastating attack at Pearl Harbor by taking over the Hawaiian Islands, we could not have made a successful defense against an invasion of our west coast.

It is also fair to say that if we had not had the foresight and wisdom to acquire air and naval bases in Iceland and at other outlying points in the Atlantic, and had permitted them to fall into enemy hands, we would have been helpless against air attacks along our east coast. The exchange of the 50 old destroyers for those bases was one of the best deals ever made in our history. With respect to many things, we were tragically blind through our isolationist trance following the last war, but not with respect to this transaction.

When the Japs struck at Pearl Harbor, our industries were geared primarily to the production of civilian or nonwar goods. Few of our industries had converted to war-goods production, and few Government plants had been constructed for that purpose. Our automobile factories, which have accomplished such miracles of war production since Pearl Harbor, produced 4,838,561 automobiles in 1941.

What have we done since in this war which we did not want but which, now that it is thrust upon us, we propose to fight to a victorious end?

First as to the military:

Our military forces have been built up from an estimated 2,100,000 in January 1942 to 10,500,000 in January 1944.

Our naval vessels have been built up from 2,500 in December 1941 to 23,700 by the end of January 1944. In the last quarter of 1941 we were producing ships at about 10,000 displacement tons per month. At present we are delivering them at the rate of about 208,000 tons per month.

Of our present air strength, General Arnold says (in his report of January 1944):

"We now have 15 air forces.

"Total military personnel in Army Air Forces, 1941, 101,227; 1943, 1,597,049.

"Military airplane production (total weight of air frames) 1941, 83,500,000 pounds; 1943, 667,000,000 pounds."

As of December 1941 we had 4,600,000 deadweight tons of merchant freighters; as of the end of 1943, 30,500,000. We were producing in the last quarter of 1941, 90,000 tons per month; at present at the rate of 1,700,000 tons per month.

Our total production of war goods grew from $1,400,000,000 in 1939 to $67,000,000,000 in 1943. Our minds can hardly encompass these figures. Words fail us when we try to describe the magnitude of our achievements. They have astounded us and confounded our enemies.

Great as are our accomplishments in the field of production, more amazing still are our transportation achievements.

We cannot overlook the fact that our boys are fighting a long, long way from home. The nearest battle front is at least 3,000 miles from our shores. Please God, may it never be closer than that. Some of them are approximately 10,000 miles from the nearest home port.

It has been our job not only to produce guns, ammunition, clothes, food, medicines, but to get them to our men over there, even in the remotest parts of the earth.

That job has been done and is being done today. To do it we had to lick the U-boat, and the U-boat has been licked. We had to have ships and yet more ships—and the ships we have, thousands of them. We had to develop an American "Kaiser" to do it. But we've developed him and others like him, with millions of faithful workers to help them.

Our goods have been produced and transported by land, sea, and air to the uttermost parts of the earth in such quantities that we have armed, clothed, fed, and medicated our men wherever they are in a manner and to an extent unequaled by any other nation. Our boys are the best-armed, best-clothed, best-fed, best-cared-for soldiers in the world. And they are the best soldiers in the world.

Not only have we amazed the world by our production of war goods, but we have at the same time maintained production of civilian or nonwar goods almost at the pre-war level. While building the production of war goods from a dollar value of $1,400,000,000 in 1939 to $67,000,000,000 in 1943, we reduced the production of nonwar goods only 8 percent—from $87,200,000,000 in 1939 to $79,900,000,000 in 1943.

While we had to cut down on a lot of things, mainly in the luxury or semiluxury class, we have maintained the production of the necessities, the articles that make for creature comfort, up to the pre-war level, and in many respects far beyond that level. For instance, while cutting out the production of pleasure automobiles, radios, and similar items, we have produced more food than ever before. As witness this—our food production in the boom year of 1929 was $9,969,000,000. In 1943 it was $16,959,000,000.

It is not too much to say that the American people—not in the military service—taken as a whole are living better today, eating more food, wearing better clothes, meeting their living expenses better, have more money in the bank, are enjoying more privileges, than ever before in our history.

The results—these right results have been accomplished in the right manner—by the voluntary, active cooperation of the people—of management, labor, and agriculture, and the people generally, and by the right kind of governmental action.

Let's look first at management. When the Japs struck at Pearl Harbor, the industries of the country were in the main geared to civilian and nonwar production. Few had converted to war production. Within 2 months practically every plant in America producing automobiles had ceased their peacetime production and were converted or in the process of conversion to war goods. Almost overnight thousands of men operating filling stations and other automobile services had closed their doors and were entering other activities. That is but illustrative of what occurred in numerous other fields. All these things were done without the compulsion of law and by the voluntary cooperation of these people with their Government.

The farmers of America, the most individualistic and independent of our people, have likewise cooperated with proverbial farmer grumbling and complaining, but with magnificent energy and devotion.

The farm-production figures speak the farmers' most eloquent encomium. Look at them:

The total cash income from farm marketings, exclusive of Government payments, was as follows:

1939	$7,851,953,000
1940	8,331,182,000
1941	11,185,430,000
1942	15,366,000,000
1943	19,009,000,000

Let's now take a look at labor.

This phenomenal production record is the story of the accomplishments of the Nation's manpower. This record—think of it—a total production of war and nonwar goods of $146,900,000,000 in the year 1943 could not have been made except by the labor of workers, with a larger per capita production than ever known before in our history.

The record is all the more amazing when we contemplate the fact that, while building our production to such heights, more than 10,500,000 men, the pick of our manpower, have been drawn into military service, most of them from the normal labor force. In January 1942 there were 56,300,000 workers in the Nation's total labor force, including armed forces; in January 1944 there were 62,000,000 in the Nation's total labor force, including armed forces, while the number in the military service had risen from 2,100,000 in January 1942 to 10,500,000 in January 1944. This represents a net increase of nearly 6,000,000 in the Nation's total labor force, including those who would have entered normally.

The total production, war and nonwar, rose from $93,900,000,000 in 1941 to $146,900,000,000 in 1943.

These figures, without more, set before us the magnitude of the country's manpower mobilization and utilization job.

But the job has been done; the miraculous production record has been made.

In building up the labor force the following worker groups have been added: 4,500,000 unemployed as of January 1942; about 3,000,000 more women than would normally be employed in peacetime; people who by peacetime standards are considered unemployable; and by the use of part-time workers, such as housewives, school children, and individuals doing war work over and above their normal job activities.

We have had far more to do than add to the aggregate labor force and replace workers drawn into the military. We have had to make shifts, adjustments, and readjustments to get the right man in the right place. The imperative demand has been for workers in activities essential to the war effort.

All this has required the transfer of workers from nonessential to essential activities; from less essential to more essential; from essential to critical; and from areas with surplus labor to areas of labor shortage.

It has also required the encouragement of men to stay on essential jobs; to discourage shopping from job to job; to reduce absenteeism and work stoppages.

It has involved also the encouragement of full utilization of manpower. This has required moving against the hoarding of labor on the part of employers; and the encouragement of training of workers into greater skill and usefulness.

Colossal as this job has been, the outstanding and overriding fact is that it has been done. I know that there has been and is a lot of talk about the manpower muddle, but the fact remains that we have muddled our way to the most stupendous production record in the history of this or any other country.

What is the explanation of it all?

How has the job been done?

That which has contributed above all else to these great achievements has been the willingness of the great mass of the American people voluntarily to get in the fight and render the greatest possible service. Oh, I know that there have ben slackers, loafers, self-seekers, racketeers and profiteers—a lot of people have been wrong; but the great overwhelming mass of them have been right—right all the time.

Some employers have hoarded labor; most of them have not. Some workers have loafed on the job; lost time through strikes—most of them have not. The cold figures show that of the total man-hours available for investment in war work less than one-tenth of 1 percent have been lost through strikes.

It would be monstrously unfair to the brave men who constitute our fighting forces to appraise their worth by the conduct of the handful who for one reason or another fall into error. It is equally unfair to the faithful, patriotic workers of the country to blacken them by the errors of a small minority.

The War Manpower Commission has been the Government agency primarily responsible for the mobilization, allocation and coordination of the Nation's manpower. It has had no power to command or to compel work of any kind. It has had only the power to plan, advise, educate, stimulate, and direct those who voluntarily come into the labor field.

It has sought to enlist the full, voluntary, cooperative forces of labor, agriculture, and management through the National Management-Labor Policy Committee and the regional and area management-labor manpower committees. It has sought to provide the maximum latitude for the local solution of manpower problems. These committees, approximately 325 of them, have been the focal points for community action. They have brought to the formulation and administration of plans to mobilize and stabilize labor, the best thinking of management, labor, and agriculture where agriculture is involved, in the labor areas of the country. They have exemplified the democratic process in a fine way.

No fair appraisal of the work done in mobilizing manpower can be made without taking into large account the work of the United States Employment Service. It is through this agency that Government has rendered indispensable service in recruiting, transferring, placing workers, and in helping stabilize employment. The 1,500 United States Employment Service offices spread throughout the country have placed an average of approximately 800,000 workers per month for the past several months. The faithful men and women in these offices, many of them grossly underpaid, deserve unstinted praise for the work they have done.

By what I have said I do not mean to claim that no mistakes have been made or that there has been no falling short in the performance of our duties.

Much less do I wish to imply that our task is finished. Far from it.

In many respects our manpower problem is going to be more acute and more difficult of solution than ever before. There are several factors which will contribute to the difficulty of our task in the months immediately ahead.

In the first place, military service will be taking the kinds of men for whom replacements are most difficult to find. What the Army and Navy need most is physical fitness. This is precisely what is needed in many jobs which are essential to the war-production program.

In addition, we must allow for future military demands. No one can predict with certainty what these demands will be. We know that further drains upon our civilian manpower will be necessary to provide replacements for our armed forces although the net strength of the Army is now reached.

We know also that we must be prepared to shift quickly from one line of production to another, expanding in one area while contracting in other areas.

In the second place, we will have to find replacements for industries which are unattractive to a worker and, therefore, hard to staff, at the same time as we are attempting to raise the employment level in these industries. As our labor reserves have dwindled, it has become increasingly difficult to find workers for the hot, heavy, and dirty jobs, for the low-wage jobs, and for the geographically isolated jobs. Lacking the power to assign labor directly to specific employment, we have naturally met our greatest difficulties in connection with these unattractive jobs. Our most pressing manpower shortages today are found in industries of this type.

Third, I should mention also that the civilian psychology is not going to make the manpower job any easier. Notwithstanding the certainty of grim and bitter days ahead on the military front, the notion that the war's end is just around the corner and that peace and the resumption of civilian production are soon to be here has greatly affected the attitude of many workers toward war jobs. Every production cut-back, certainly every prediction of a military leader that the war's end is only a few months ahead, every discussion of the resumption of civilian production moves many war workers to leave war jobs and seek a place in civilian production, and makes more difficult the task of recruiting workers from nonessential to essential activities.

Our task in the months ahead is clear. We must hold on to the needed workers in essential and vital industries; we must be able to shift workers as quickly as the production demands change; and we must recruit replacements for those who enter the armed forces or who for other reasons leave the labor market.

As our boys fight with greater fury, we shall have to work back home with greater intensity. The fact that this is a total war will sink down upon us with crushing force.

But we cannot fail; we shall not fail.

We are on the right course.

We are fighting a good fight.

We are keeping and shall keep the faith.

We shall finish the course in triumph.

We must come to the end of this war, whether it be soon or late, not only triumphant in arms; but triumphant in our faith in democracy.

We must face the future united in our resolve to perfect our democracy at home and in our determination to cooperate with other nations to set up an international order based on the principle of the equal right of men to life and liberty and empowered to protect all nations and peoples against the bloody scourge of war.

Russians Ask Less of Butter Spread

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM C. COLE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of April 18, 1944:

RUSSIANS ASK LESS OF BUTTER SPREAD—SOLDIER'S DISLIKE FOR IT BRINGS CHANGE IN AMOUNT ALLOCATED UNDER LEND-LEASE—HOLDINGS HERE REDUCED—BUTTER HOARD CUT 25,522,000 POUNDS IN MONTH, BUT IT IS STILL 82,038,000 POUNDS

(By Jefferson G. Bell)

While American plants continue to convert millions of pounds of last year's butter into so-called Carter spread and civilian consumption is held to a minimum primarily by the 16-point ration value, Russian fighting men balk at eating this butter spread, which comes to them under lend-lease.

That Russia had asked the United States for less Carter spread was disclosed by the War Food Administration yesterday when it clarified current trade reports indicating that the Russians had rejected a vast amount of Carter spread already shipped or earmarked for them.

In response to inquiries, the War Food Administration in Washington explained that its division of supplies had received a letter from Russia asking that a smaller percentage of Carter spread and a larger proportion of butter oil be shipped under the recent agreement covering 1944 lend-lease fats and oils.

After explaining that the Russians would accept both Carter spread and butter oil, a representative of W. F. A. disclosed that as a result of the Russian request approximately one-third of the original allocation of butter would go to Russia in the form of spread and two-thirds as butter oil.

HOW CARTER SPREAD IS MADE

Carter spread, W. F. A. representatives explained, is made by the addition of about 35 percent of vegetable matter such as cottonseed oil. W. F. A. attachés confirmed reports that spokesmen for the Army Quartermaster centers purchasing supplies had reported that butter spreads were not popular among American soldiers.

Originally, the War Food Administration planned to process for Russia 20,000,000 pounds of butter. This butter began going into storage last May. Butter of this age cannot safely be moved great distances in its original state except under the most ideal conditions of refrigeration.

The quantities of Carter spread and butter oil shipped to Russia from last year's hoard will be charged against Russia's 1944 allotments under lend-lease, it was explained by W. F. A. Plants producing spreads are in New York City, Jersey City, Philadelphia, and Chicago.

Meanwhile, the monthly dairy market report of the Office of Distribution of W. F. A., released here, disclosed that on April 1 the Government's Nation-wide holdings of butter totaled 82,038,000 pounds, as against 16,676,000 pounds on April 1, 1943, and a 5-year average through 1943 of 31,698,000 pounds.

On March 1, 1944, total holdings were 107,560,560 pounds, so that within a month the hoard has been reduced by 25,522,000 pounds. Last January leading trade members had forecast that the carry-over at the beginning of the spring milk flush period would be 82,000,000 pounds.

Of the 82,038,000 pounds on hand, W. F. A. reports that the Dairy Products Marketing Association, buying for the Government, holds 26,436,000 pounds compared with 52,572,000 pounds on March 1, while the War Food Administration holds 25,494,000, compared with 21,917,000 pounds on March 1.

MARKET CONDITIONS REVIEWED

W. F. A.'s weekly dairy market review, distributed over the week end, declared that "the butter markets at wholesale price levels were maintained in firm position," and added:

"But it was becoming increasingly easy to purchase at the higher prevailing jobbing mark-ups. Supplies continued to increase and at most of the major markets were in excess of the curtailed demands. Some butter now is being set aside for sale to the Army Quartermaster Corps, but the aggregate total so far is small. Most retail outlets are filled and many stores have canceled or reduced their orders for short periods.

"Consumer demand, restricted by lack of ration points, continued use of lower priced oleomargarine, and the habit of getting along with less formed during the period of acute shortage. Retail sales are generally reported as even to slightly above last year, when the 30 percent set-aside order cut sharply into consumer supplies, but are sharply below the relatively normal period of 1941–42. Reports vary widely as to the degree that sales are below 1941–42, but they are sufficiently down in some areas to be the basis of concern. At San Francisco retail outlets are definitely filled, with requirements sharply below prewar normal. Per capita consumption in California is reported at an all-time low."

Shortcomings of the Soldier Vote Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able and persuasive address, delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, dealing with the subject of the soldiers' vote. It will, I think, convince any fair-minded citizen that the so-called soldiers' vote law fails to provide adequate means to allow our service men and women to cast their ballots in the coming election.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

One week ago, over this network, Governor Dewey gave what he termed his second annual report on the administration of the State government. As that report was printed in The New York Times, it contained 50 paragraphs. I am going to pass over 47 of those paragraphs, the subject matter of which can await discussion at a later date. I do so because it is imperative that the people of this State be informed, before it is too late to act, that the so-called soldier vote law fails to provide adequate means to allow our service men and women to cast their ballots in the coming election.

Today, almost 20 percent of our voting population are serving in the armed forces. If you include those in the Merchant Marine, the Red Cross, the U. S. O., and other field services, at least one out of every five eligible voters is making a full time sacrifice that our Democracy may live.

All of these are prepared to risk their lives for our country. Many have already died in defense of our American way of life. Their comrades expect to vote this fall. Those who are in hospitals, recovering from wounds, will be bitter in their resentment, if deprived of their vote by unnecessary red tape. Those already on the firing lines will naturally be disappointed, if we at home put obstacles in the way of their making their choice of candidates in the coming election. The fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, wives and husbands of those in the services expect our public officials to protect to the fullest extent the voting privileges of those who, because of their absence, cannot make themselves heard.

Yet this most important of all questions is lightly passed over by Governor Dewey in three short paragraphs buried at almost the very end of his report. His brief reference to the soldier-vote law reflects either his lack of interest in the rights of the service personnel or his embarrassment over having signed a statute so utterly at variance with his own public statements on the subject.

I believe that the vast majority of the people of the State of New York want every man and woman in the armed forces to have full opportunity to cast his or her vote this coming fall in the easiest way possible.

There may be some who can see political advantage in making it difficult for the armed forces to vote. If this is so, those acting from such an unfair and un-American motive should be speedily repudiated. Partisan selfishness must not be permitted to create a road block against the will of those unselfishly giving their all for our safety.

The Constitution of the State of New York, adopted in 1938, in the light of experience gained in World War No. 1 and at the time when the clouds presaging World War No. 2 were gathering on the horizon, took cognizance of the rights of the service voters. In the very first paragraph of article 2, dealing with the qualification of voters, the State constitution carries this provision: "In time of war no elector in the actual military service of the State, or the United States, in the Army or Navy thereof, shall be deprived of his or her vote by reason of his or her absence from such election district."

In those unmistakable words the people of our Commonwealth have placed in our fundamental law a clear mandate to the Governor and legislature to make it as easy as possible for the defenders of liberty to exercise the most precious right of a free people.

Governor Dewey, on March 7 of this year, sent a message to the legislature, in which he said: "Our constitution declares unequivocably that every official, State or local, for which the citizen at home may vote will also be subject to the vote of the citizen in the armed forces.

"There is a perfectly simple solution to the problem. Every soldier can be provided with a ballot which will be valid under our Constitution."

In these three sentences from Governor Dewey's own message, rests the crux of the whole soldier-vote bill. Did Governor Dewey tip his hand when he said, "Every soldier can be provided with a ballot which will be valid under our Constitution"?

Why did he not say, "Every soldier will be provided with a ballot * * *"? The Governor has never before been so meticulously indefinite in the use of promissory verbiage. His sincerity, therefore, must be questioned so long as he persists in holding to his present precarious position.

Quick changes in the rules of the War Ballot Commission, made during the last few days, constitute admission on the part of the State administration that the law is faulty and unworkable. These changes likewise put in jeopardy the counting of any soldier ballots. The Dewey law expressly provided for the use of post-card applications prepared by the Federal or State commissions or a written or printed application. It further provides that such application must be subscribed by the soldier and that the application must state both his residence address and military address.

The so-called liberal interpretation announced by Chairman Simpson, of the War Ballot Commission, shows that the law is not clear in its meaning and leaves the way open for any person to protest the tallying of all soldier ballots. If there was no reason before for a session of the legislature to be convened to clarify and simplify the law, the liberal interpretation of the Commission certainly makes such a session imperative now in order to insure any of the service votes being counted at any time. If this is not cleared up, the result of the balloting on November 7 next can be thrown into litigation and a condition of chaos can result that will be destructive to war morale.

Governor Dewey has been quite free in his use of the word "chaos" in criticism of far less important Federal matters. He should certainly be equally as zealous in guarding against chaos in a State matter which possibly may be interwoven in the fabric of his own destiny.

But the Republican chairman of the war-ballot commission, even after his so-called liberal interpretation, blandly admits, according to the World-Telegram of April 19, that the service vote will be around 225,000. This naturally is an optimistic estimate by the man in the best position to know the facts. Its import is further proof that the present soldier vote law, even when liberalized, will not work. Surely Governor Dewey, in the face of that admission, that 3 out of 4 service voters will find it too difficult to exercise their right of franchise, cannot further persist in his refusal to call a special session of the legislature to rectify the mistakes that make this really the "soldier cannot vote law."

However, Chairman Simpson unwittingly confesses that his optimistic estimate is much too high by ordering only 200,000 post cards. Those cards have to make a round trip before a ballot can even be mailed to the service voter. Then the ballot has to make a round trip. The delays and losses in these 2 round trips will surely be so great that in the end it is doubtful, with the time limitations, if more than 1 out of 10 service votes ever reach the polls before November 3. Such an eventuality, to all intents, disfranchises 9 out of 10 of your sons and daughters.

Under the present Dewey law the service man or woman must first send in an application asking for an absentee war ballot. Who is to tell the serviceman that he must make such an application? It will certainly take time to get that word to him. It will take more time for his application to travel from far-away places before it reaches the State war-ballot commission. The war-ballot commission must then see to it that a ballot is sent to the applicant. That will take more time. Then, when the ballot reaches the man, he must fill it out, swear to it before an attesting officer and send it on its way back to the war-ballot commission.

Does all that time and red tape make it easier for the war voter to cast his or her vote? The answer became so obvious when the machinery was started that the so-called liberalizing interpretations, despite their questionable legality, were hastily devised in a desperate effort to oil the stalled procedure. These liberalizing interpretations would permit the sending of ballots to any member of the armed forces who, in a signed letter to a member of his or her family, expressed any intention of a desire to vote.

The Republican chairman of the war ballot commission is quoted as saying, "This is a more liberal interpretation of the law than heretofore, and will permit many more thousands of soldiers and sailors to vote than if required to go through the formalities of making a direct personal request." This change of heart was forced by a rising tide of public indignation, aroused by the refusal of Governor Dewey to call a special session of the legislature to make the law fair and workable.

What further interpretations may we now expect the State war ballot commission to make? How will we know from day to day what the war ballot commission may decide to be their interpretation of the law? Why should a law written after 2 years' experience be so imperfect as to need day-to-day interpretation?

When the bill was introduced in the closing days of the legislative session, the Democrats in the legislature offered 31 amendments to make the law simple and definite in its application and administration. But Governor Dewey refused to permit such bipartisan collaboration and insisted on his bill being adopted without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

The liberalizing interpretation that war ballots will be sent upon presentation of a letter addressed and signed by a member of the armed forces and received by a relative in which the writer expresses a desire to vote will beget further interpretations. The commission will be forced to rule on what constitutes a letter addressed and signed by a member of the armed forces. Suppose your boy sends you a letter signed, "Your loving son, Arthur," or "With love, Bill." Will that be interpreted as a complete signature? Will you have to present to the war ballot commission your loved one's entire letter? Any number of such questions will call for new rulings, new interpretations, new liberalizations, because the law is not simple, understandable, or workable.

Likewise the Commission must hand down interpretations as to what constitutes "intent of a desire to vote."

If a soldier asks, "How is the election going?" does that constitute a desire to vote?

If a marine expresses the hope that one or the other candidates will be elected, can that be interpreted as a desire to vote?

If a gob should, in his enthusiasm, say he would like to vote for his admiral for President, how will that be interpreted?

Or, mayhap, a WAC or WAVE may write that she would like to vote for someone who has not been nominated. Would that come under the so-called liberalizing interpretation?

But what can be done to simplify the procedure? The simple and constitutional way is to have the war ballot commission send a ballot to every war voter of the State whose name, home address, and military address is furnished to the commission by any relative of the war voter. That would comply with the intent of New York State's Constitution. That would eliminate the red tape and the unnecessary burden on the transport facilities of our country in time of war. That would guarantee the simplest and the easiest way of allowing service men and women to vote with the least difficulty.

Governor Dewey says that proposed methods, other than his, will make for fraud. That characterization cannot apply to my proposal. How can it be fraud to make it simpler for your boy to cast his vote? The only fraud that is discernible in the present situation will be perpetrated by depriving service men and women of their vote and that fraud is inherent in the cumbersome, red tape requirements of the Dewey law, which are subject to "interpretations" and therefore to possible manipulation.

There can be no fear of any service man or woman casting a fraudulent vote. I am sure that none of our service men or women needs defending on that score. Furthermore, the Dewey law takes ample precautions to make sure that every war ballot, before it is counted, is a valid ballot.

In case you have not read the entire law, let me say that it fills more than 12 pages of closely printed matter. Such items as the size and weight of the ballot and the envelopes to be used are minutely described and specified. The oath to which the war voter must subscribe in sending in his or her ballot is fully set forth and reads as follows:

"BALLOT FOR WAR VOTER, NOVEMBER 7, 1944

"OATH

"I do swear (or affirm) that on November 7, 1944, I will be 21 years old and immediately preceding said date will have been a citizen of the United States for 90 days, an inhabitant of the State of New York for 1 year, a resident of the county, city, or village in which I offer my vote for 4 months, and of the election district in which I offer my vote for 30 days; that I have not received or offered any compensation or reward for the giving or withholding of a vote at this election; that I have not made or become interested in any bet depending upon the result of this election; that I have not cast, mailed, or marked any other ballot for any candidate for any of the offices listed on the ballot enclosed herein; and that I have not been convicted of bribery or any infamous crime, or, if so convicted, that I have been pardoned or my right of suffrage restored.

"I reside at:

"Street or R. F. D. _____.

"City, village, or town _____.

"County _____."

The affidavit must be sworn to in the presence of a commissioned officer, sergeant, or petty officer.

Even under the Dewey law, as most recently interpreted, it is possible that more than one member of a family may receive a letter from a war voter in which the war voter expresses a desire to vote. If more than one such letter is presented to the War Ballot Commission, that will not mean that the service man or woman will attempt to vote more than once.

Lest anyone entertain the thought that a personally signed application must be made as a substitute for registration, let me point out that neither under the Constitution nor in the Dewey law itself does such an application serve any such purpose. This is clearly evident from the Dewey law, which provides as follows:

"The signing of the war voter's name to the oath as above provided shall constitute personal registration wherever such registration is required, and in case of a new voter conclusive proof of his literacy."

You can see, therefore, that the requirement in the Dewey law for any kind of a personal application is entirely unnecessary so far as registration is concerned. When the war voter signs the oath, which I have read to you, and which must accompany his war ballot, then the war voter is registered.

The Dewey law also prescribes in detail how war ballots are to be distributed and how they are to be handled when received back from the war voters; how the inspectors of election shall examine and check each ballot and the action to be taken if objections are raised to the casting of any such ballot.

No, there is no possibility of fraud. The only point that matters is will your loved one in the service receive a ballot in time for him or her to have the opportunity of taking part in this year's election. That is the test by which the Dewey law is unfair to the war voter.

The second and very important count on which the Dewey law is unfair to the war voter is that the war voter's ballot must be back in Albany by November 3, 4 days before election day. You can readily see that it will be necessary for most war voters to make their choice of candidates several weeks before election day in order that their ballots may reach Albany by November 3. That provision penalizes a service voter for fighting for his country.

Let me remind my listeners that under Republican war-ballot laws in force during the past 2 years, the service men and women overseas were permitted to fill out their ballots right up to election day and their ballots were valid and were counted, if they reached the War Ballot Commission by December 10.

Surely it is only right and proper for us at home to arrange it so that our boys on the fighting fronts may have full opportunity of learning all they can about the candidates and the issues before they mark their ballots, and that they be protected in their constitutional right of voting up to election day.

If it was all right for the law to let them vote up to election day last year and the year before, when a Governor and a Lieutenant Governor were being elected, why make them vote weeks ahead of election day this year? There is no need for such discrimination. The war voter's ballot should be voted and postmarked not later than election day and it should be counted if it is received within a reasonable time after election day.

I propose that such ballots be valid if received by December 1. That leaves plenty of time to certify the results of the election before the electoral college meets. You will note that in 1942, when war ballots were received up to December 10, the election of a Governor was at stake. A Governor takes office on the 1st day of January following the election. This year we vote for a President, and the President does not start his term of office until January 20. Surely we owe that much to the service men and women, who are fighting for us, that we give them reasonable time within which their ballots may be received and counted.

What do you think will be the effect upon the morale of our fighting men when they find that the New York State war voters' law is a gold-brick law? I ask every mother or father of a boy in the service to study carefully what I have said, and I am sure you will agree that what I have proposed in the way of changes to the present Dewey law will simplify the procedure and make it workable. I ask every wife or husband, sister or brother, of any of the men and women in the armed forces of our country to consider this situation seriously. If the election this year should ever be decided without the votes of our service men and women being recorded in substantial numbers, it will be a travesty. There is no partisan advantage in what I have proposed. God forbid that anyone in America will deliberately try to rig these laws so as to promote selfish ambitions or partisan political aims.

You and I remember the rightful resentment of the boys of the First World War who came back to find that the "noble experiment" of prohibition had been put over while they were busily occupied in defending our country against the forces of the enemy. Do not let us repeat that tragic mistake in any degree. No matter what the outcome of the election may be, no matter who is elected President or Senator or councilman, we must make sure that fighting America participates in the democratic processes they are defending.

Now, I well know that there will be a cry of "politics" from the opposition in order to offset the unanswerable charges I have made. Let me answer the opposition on that one before they make it. I have in my hand a letter dated April 19, just 2 days ago. It is signed by Kate E. Grant, secretary of the Election Commissioners' Association of the State of New York. It is addressed to all the boards of elections of New York State and it reads:

"DEAR COMMISSIONERS AND CLERKS: At the urgent request of the New York State war ballot commission, President Werger has arranged for a very important special meeting of representatives of all boards of elections of New York State.

"The war ballot commission has impelled this meeting in order that there may be a unified and correct interpretation of the new war ballot law, concerning which we are so uncertain.

"This meeting will be held in the chambers of the Albany County Board of Supervisors, Albany, N. Y., on Wednesday, April 26, 1944, at 10 o'clock.

"The attendance at this meeting is to be a county charge.

"Make your reservations immediately. The DeWitt Clinton Hotel has advised that the hotel will be able to accommodate all if reservations are made at once.

"You cannot afford to miss this meeting.

"Remember the date—April 26, 1944, Wednesday, 10 a. m., chambers of Albany County Board of Supervisors, Albany, N. Y."

Do you, the voters of New York State, need any further evidence than that letter to convince you that the present soldier-vote law is a monstrosity, a reservoir of ambiguities, and a perpetration of deception against your sons and daughters who, more than anyone else, deserve your protection of their fundamental rights, which they cannot guard because they are in distant lands protecting you from the holocaust of war?

Governor Dewey, on behalf of our hundreds of thousands of citizens in the armed forces, and confident that I am voicing the sentiments of their loved ones at home, I ask you to convene the legislature at the earliest possible date to amend the present so-called soldier-vote law, removing its obvious defects and making it so workable that we all—Democrats, Republicans, and Independents—can acclaim it as a real statute that will make it, to use your own words, "a perfectly simple solution to the problem."

H. R. 2082

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter I have just received from Mrs. Edith M. Irvine, which was accompanied by a petition containing 1,789 signatures petitioning Congress to enact H. R. 2082:

LIGA DE TEMPERANCIA DE PUERTO RICO,
SAN JUAN, P. R., March 31, 1944.

Hon. JOSEPH R. BRYSON,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BRYSON: The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Puerto Rico, consisting of 40 local unions, has been backing up your bill 2082 by prayer ever since it was presented. We have also collected 1,789 signatures to the petition to Congress in behalf of the bill. Some of our local presidents have written you personal letters thanking you for your good work and offering their undivided support of the movement.

As Puerto Rico has no Senator or Representatives, and only a Resident Commissioner, I am taking the liberty of sending these signatures to you and am hoping that some mention may be made of our efforts in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We are praying continually that this bill will be given due consideration and that God will touch the hearts of our lawmakers as to this serious problem.

Puerto Rico is overridden with drinking places. Our servicemen are given beer at such a low price on the posts that many of them seek stronger liquor when they are at liberty. It is pitiful to see our fine young men from the United States, many of whom come from Christian homes, losing their health and their self-respect through liquor.

We expect to send some more signatures and you may be sure that our W. C. T. U. members are backing you up by their prayers and cooperation, and are trusting that God will honor your efforts and convert this bill into a law before this legislative session is adjourned.

May God bless you abundantly and increase our faith as we go forward in His name.

Yours very sincerely,
EDITH M. IRVINE-RIVERA.

Secretaries Want Legal Status

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following article from the Ithaca (N. Y.) Journal of March 20, 1944:

SECRETARIES WANT LEGAL STATUS

(By Roland Alston)

WASHINGTON.—Congressional secretaries are laying plans to have themselves designated assistant Congressmen or given some other definite legal status so they can get better results in dealing with Government agencies.

Government departments and agencies usually give due courtesy and attention to any request made in person by a Senator or House Member, but secretaries often have to fight to get anything better than a brush-off.

This is particularly true of the secretaries' dealings with the 160 independent agencies and commissions set up mostly during the Roosevelt administration.

CLERKS HANDLE CALLS

Secretaries complain they can't even get a $6,000 or $7,000 a year division head on the telephone to give information on a Government directive or explain a complex departmental order. Minor clerks handle the secretaries' calls. Only secretaries of Members ranking high on the congressional appropriations committees can get top-flight men, secretaries say.

When President Roosevelt began his fight with Congress on the soldier vote, food subsidy, and tax issues, secretaries complained to their Members that New Deal department staffs seemed to be taking their cue from the President and using similar tone in relations with congressional offices.

Impersonating the Congressman over the telephone doesn't solve the problem. Many secretaries are women or girls. When men secretaries pose as Congressmen, too many fibs have to be told, complications develop, and the secretary usually gets nowhere in the end.

CORRESPONDENCE PILES UP

Result is that correspondence has been piling high on the desks in many Senators' and Representatives' offices, because only the Congressmen seem to be able to get satisfactory replies from the departments, and the lawmakers are busier than ever before, on the floor and in the committee.

Much of this correspondence comes from constituents needing to get straightened out on this or that directive, or wanting help in getting needed priorities for materials.

The secretaries contend the job of meeting all these requests, plus year-around attendance at congressional sessions, is to much for any one man and that need of an assistant Congressman is indicated plainly.

They won't insist upon having the title, but they'd like a precisely defined status in law which would permit them to represent the Members of Congress employing them in all matters except lawmaking.

If Congress would establish that status, Government departments would have to give them more attention and relations between Capitol Hill and downtown would improve, they contend.

CABLE ORIGINATOR

This idea originated with Wendell E. (Jack) Cable, career congressional secretary since 1919 who runs one of the busiest hill offices for Representative EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, Republican of Illinois. It's a lively topic among members of the secretaries club, which has more or less replaced the little congress of secretaries and other hill jobholders.

Those who have approached their bosses know it won't be easy to achieve their goal. Members of Congress are jealous of all their prerogatives, particularly older Members. Many would go along with the plan except for fear they might be charged with participating in a plot to gain additional patronage for themselves.

The secretaries are counting heavily upon sheer, continued overwork to wear their bosses down to willingness to accede.

A congressional secretary can get as high as $4,500 a year, but the appropriation bills for the legislative branch give lump sums for clerical hire with no specific reference to secretaries. Hence secretaries are now legally only clerks.

For a Peacetime Air Force of 50,000 Planes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Aviation News of April 17, 1944:

FOR A PEACETIME AIR FORCE OF 50,000 PLANES

The United States aircraft industry built 117 planes during September 1939, when the European war started. Total output that year was 2,400 planes, including scores of trainers. On December 7, 1941, we had 159 4-engine bombers. The Army Air Forces had 1,157 first-line combat planes, with only 526 of these strategically located to meet possible attacks on Hawaii and the Philippines. Within a few hours this number dropped to 176. The Japs' string of conquests continued with little resistance almost to Australia.

Today's production is 9,000 military planes every month, including possibly 1,500 heavy bombers. We have the world's greatest military and naval air force, by quantity and quality. Its peak is still unattained. Over half of the Army's total 1944 production represents aircraft and its equipment.

In the heat of battle, on the threshold of the mightiest invasion ever planned, it is time to start planning our insurance for the future. To assure ourselves that a phlegmatic peacetime let-down does not lay us open to another enemy—or "friend."

The United States must continue to maintain the world's greatest air force, whether it polices others or remains based on American territory. Its very existence will be a powerful deterrent to ill-judged action elsewhere.

Aviation News believes American public opinion will demand that we retain a bristling air force equaled or exceeded by none in the world, even by our present allies. This is believed to be the opinion of some of our highest officials. It is a prevailing belief of a group of the most responsible Members of Congress.

Such an air corps and our determination to keep our leadership, will be as powerful a force at the peace table as in the years ahead.

Therefore, the News believes that congressional plans should encompass the following minimum post-war air program:

1. A peacetime Army and Navy Air Force of at least 50,000 combat planes, plus necessary trainers and military transports.

2. Annual production and replacement of 25,000 of the most advanced combat aircraft.

3. Continuation of what already is the world's best equipped aircraft and equipment research plant, to be maintained by the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, plus A. A. F. and naval testing centers, and independent facilities for individual aircraft plants.

4. A continuing national aviation training program utilizing private schools, turning out necessary technicians and a minimum of 100,000 private pilots a year as a constant source of potential combat pilots of the required ages. This program would be independent of a nucleus training system continued by the services.

5. The world's largest and finest equipped commercial air line system with subsidies only on a few uneconomic but militarily and commercially important world routes. The air lines should retain some contract connections with the Army and Navy Transport Services for training and transportation.

6. A peacetime Army Air Transport Command and Naval Air Transport Service competing with no commercial air line, but serving as training and supply agencies.

The American people can find little legitimate complaint in the cost factor of an insurance policy with a premium which is hardly more than several of the current 2,000-plane raids over Berlin.

There are other post-war problems to be solved, of course. What about our post-war Army, surface Navy, peacetime conscription? The question of implementing the post-war air force must be solved. Will the air force be one of the co-equal arms of a single department of defense, for example?

It is now up to our congressional leaders, like Representative WOODRUM and his well-selected military planning committee, to gather the expert recommendations and testimony of our wartime leaders in the services and industry, and prepare a report on which the House can take swift action.

Let them recall these words from General Arnold's classic report to the Secretary of War early this year, listing the Army Air Forces crippling liabilities in the pre-war period:

"These were the lack of funds, the people's aversion to all forms of war which forced us into makeshift methods. The A. A. F. had to teach the Nation that large numbers of planes did not in themselves constitute airpower; we had to show the folly of the numbers racket. We designed different planes to do different jobs, and shouted from the hangar tops that no one superplane could do everything. * * * The people did not realize that the plane had broken down all boundaries of time and distance; that even our inland cities were within bombing range of the enemy."

We believe the people realize these things now and that they expect their Congress to start to work now to insure us against another war.

ROBERT H. WOOD.

O. P. A. Regulations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks a radio address by Hon. Chester Bowles, O. P. A. Administrator. The address follows:

There has been a good deal of talk about O. P. A. regulations. Some people say we have too many regulations. Others say they are too complicated.

Well, just how many O. P. A. regulations are there? And how do we at O. P. A. arrive at them? Do we just "dream them up" arbitrarily down here in Washington, or are they practical regulations that will work in fairness to you and to the men in the industries affected by them?

I think you are entitled to the answer to those questions. Because our O. P. A. regulations affect the lives and work of every American every day.

They affect you every time you buy a new suit or drive your car or go marketing for the family groceries. They affect your storekeepers and the men who manufacture the things you buy in your stores. They affect distributors and brokers and landlords and farmers—in fact, everyone who buys and everyone who sells.

In order to keep down your wartime cost of living, the O. P. A. has established rent control in many areas, and ceiling prices on more than several million items. These items range all the way from food to fuel, include just about everything you buy today.

In order to assure every American a fair share of essential wartime shortages, the O. P. A. administers 13 ration programs ranging all the way from sugar to shoes.

And in order to carry out this big wartime job, the O. P. A. has had to have rules and regulations which fall into two general groups—rationing, and the control of prices and rents.

Now, as you know, our O. P. A. power to ration comes from the President's Emergency War Powers Act, through delegation by W. P. B. What shall be rationed is decided by W. P. B. in consultation with the various Government supply agencies. And those supply agencies, such as the Petroleum Administration for War, the War Food Administration, and the Office of Defense Transportation, determine how much shall go for civilian use.

Once these agencies have determined what the civilian supply is for these commodities, our O. P. A. ration orders become pretty much a matter of arithmetic, based on how many need shoes or meat or gasoline or tires or whatever must be rationed—and how much there is to go around.

Our O. P. A. price regulations, on the other hand, are more complicated. A difference of only a few cents in the ceiling price of one product in one industry may affect the cost of many other products in other industries.

Price control, therefore, is a highly complicated program because of the relationship between the cost of production any place along the line and the final cost to you in your local store. And the purpose of price control is to defeat inflation by holding down your wartime cost of living and the cost of the war to your Government—which means you, the taxpayer.

Obviously, the O. P. A. has had to tread on new ground in doing this price control job. There were no precedents to guide us in the strange new restrictions which total war has forced on America.

Congress realized this when it passed the Emergency Price Control Act 2 years ago. And so it wrote into the act two provisions. One, that before issuing a price regulation, the O. P. A. must consult with a representative group from the industry as to the form of the regulation. And second, that after a price regulation was passed, the O. P. A., upon request of a substantial number of any industry affected, should form an advisory committee from that industry. Thus, from the beginning, all industries have had statutory protection against arbitrary price regulations, and have had the democratic prerogative of their day in court.

However, the initiative for appointing these advisory committees was left to the industries themselves. And as late as January 1943 representatives of only 16 industries had formally requested the appointment of advisory committees.

In June 1943 we in the O. P. A. decided not to wait for industry to ask for appointment of advisory committees. Instead we decided to take the initiative ourselves and form committees for virtually every industry under price control. Some months later we went further and directed that no new price regulations or major amendments should be issued without consultation with a representative advisory committee from the industry.

Today we have 435 industry advisory committees sitting in with us on all stages of price regulations.

Let me make one thing clear right now. These committees do not concern themselves with the level of prices or what should be brought under price control. That is a responsibility that remains ours at O. P. A. But the industry advisory committees are mightily concerned about the form and the structure of price control—and they know more about the details of their own business than anybody else. Who better can tailor a regulation to make it as simple and as practical as possible? Who better can help us to make price ceilings fit in with countless industry practices that have grown up through the years?

Now, who serves on these committees and how do they work? Let's take a specific committee and see. Let's take the committee on coated and combed fabrics—a technical phrase that covers such things as adhesive tape, window shade cloth, oil cloth, and the like.

Well, O. P. A.'s Maximum Price Regulation 478 puts ceilings on coated and combed fabrics. And so, when the regulation was in the first discussion stage, we appointed an advisory committee of 14 members from the industry to help us on the regulation. They come from Massachusetts and Ohio and Illinois and other places where these products are made.

First, this committee met with O. P. A. here in Washington and made suggestions and recommendations on the form of the regulation. Then, when the committee and O. P. A. had agreed on the simplest and most effective type of control, we held regional meetings in New York, Boston, and Cleveland. There, with the members of the committee present, we presented the regulation to larger informal groups of the coated and combed fabrics trade. Here again there was open discussion, out of which came even greater refinements until all the wrinkles which could possibly be foreseen were straightened out. And then the regulation was issued and put into effect.

All of our industry advisory committees elect their own chairman and conduct their our meetings.

Now, obviously, the better job we do writing a regulation to begin with, the less trouble there is later and the fewer meetings need to be called, which takes the time of busy men away from their important war work.

You know, it isn't easy for a businessman to work on these committees. Because the first thing we ask him to do is completely to reverse his normal thinking. A man has spent years in competitive business fighting for his particular firm. He has competed with all comers, and has brought his company out on top simply because he stayed in there and pitched for that company. Then he comes down to Washington to serve on an advisory committee with the O. P. A.

First we ask him to represent—not in terms of the company he's spent years fighting for—but the entire industry of which his company is only a part. That means he becomes a spokesman for his competitors and his own company without distinction. And then, when he's done that—we ask him to go even further, and fit that whole industry into the entire price control picture. It is a great tribute to American businessmen that they have been willing to do that kind of a job for the good of the war effort. And the men on our 435 industry advisory committees are coming through magnificently. I cannot praise too highly the fine help the members of our advisory committees have given us in making price control simple, effective, and as easy as possible to live with.

There are some stormy problems in many industries. We have some stormy committees, to be sure. And in some cases, the members came down here with their "dukes up" so to speak. They don't like regulations to begin with, any more than we at O. P. A. like them. And even through the businessmen are prepared to accept our regulations as a necessary wartime evil, they sometimes start out pretty aggressively determined to fight for their companies as they have been doing for years.

But then these men hear the O. P. A. side of the question. They see why some suggestion simply won't work because it doesn't fit into the big over-all price control program. And you'd be surprised how completely their thinking sometimes changes.

The longer the committee works with O. P. A., the smoother our relations become. Some of our most valuable committees today are the heavy industry committees which were the first appointed.

It would be impossible to frame any price rule which would be absolutely fair to every single individual or firm affected by it. And in many cases, inequities can't be foreseen. It just isn't humanly possible to write a perfect regulation the first time. In an undertaking as new and complicated as price control, you have to try a regulation on, see how it fits, perhaps see how it wears. And then when you find places where it doesn't fit, you make changes. Those things we are doing constantly, with the aid of our industry advisory committees. That's why we issue amendments.

There are only 502 O. P. A. price regulations. But there have been hundreds of unavoidable changes made by amendments to these regulations. And in every case where a major amendment is being considered, we also consult with our Industry Advisory committees.

Just to show you the wide scope covered by these committees, here's a list of the ones that met with us here in Washington last week. Committees on export, import, power laundries, paper products, automotive parts, soft drinks, sulfite paper, canned fruits and vegetables, coil and inner construction for furniture, canners, preserve manufacturers, fresh and frozen fish, iron and steel scrap, cane sugar refining, table and juice grapes, Maryland tobacco, frozen fruits and vegetables. And in addition, in working on one aspect of a flour regulation, we also held meetings last week with that industry in Omaha, Minneapolis, and Chicago.

That's a typical week's sample of how we at O. P. A. are getting the advice and help of every conceivable industry. And here's a sample of the cooperative attitude of these businessmen who are working with us. It's a letter from Walter S. Doxsey, of the American Steel Warehouse Co. Mr. Doxsey is chairman of our steel warehouse and jobbers advisory committee. Recently he wrote:

"May I take this opportunity to convey to you the gratification of our industry over the sincere and constructive cooperation of Mr. D. D. Kennedy and Mr. E. L. Wyman and their staff.

"To my mind, the development of zone-pricing schedules demonstrates most effectively the accomplishments that may be achieved with Government and industry working hand in hand."

I have tried to give you a picture of how we at O. P. A. work with these different industry advisory meetings.

You know, I've always felt that when this war is over and we look back on what O. P. A. did and how it was done, there will be two big stories which will give us all cause for pride.

First, of course, we'll be able to see just how well prices were controlled. We know part of that story now. We know that so far they have been pretty well controlled, and that for the last year the cost of living has been held stable. Some prices are up but others are down, so that on the average, prices are no higher today than they were a year ago now.

And I think we'll consider the second story, just as important as the first. That's the story of how this O. P. A. program to ration and control prices was very largely operated by volunteers.

Of course, you know we have a big building here in Washington filled with people working on O. P. A. problems. But relatively, it's a very small number by comparison with the number of volunteers, working for the same cause all over this country. Actually there are less than 4,000 people here in Washington against 106,000 people regularly working on local boards.

And, of course, very important in the volunteer phase of the program are the businessmen, who time and time again drop their own affairs, come to Washington, to sit and work out regulations which will control prices in their own industries. Generally, these men have very responsible positions in their companies. Still with all the problems of business operations these days, they are glad to interrupt their work to serve on O. P. A. price controls as volunteers. Right now there are 5,300 members of these committees—a good many more, you see, than there are O. P. A. employees here in Washington.

I think you'll agree that the story of O. P. A. is really a story of democracy in action.

Address by Lieutenant General Vandergrift at Graduation Exercises of F. B. I. National Police Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by Lt. Gen. Alexander A. Vandergrift, Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, at the graduation exercises of the twenty-fourth session of the F. B. I. National Police Academy, on April 15, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is indeed an honor to be here with you this morning and to have this opportunity of extending congratulations to the members of today's graduating class.

You are to be congratulated not only upon successfully completeing the academy course, but also upon your good fortune in having acquired this training from the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Certainly no law enforcement body in the world is better suited to provide advanced schooling in your highly specialized field.

The fact that you have availed yourself of this schooling and that you plan now to share your progress with your colleagues at home, is testimony of your right to leadership in this profession most vital to the welfare of our Nation.

True it is that we never grow too old, or too wise, to learn. I have heard of one local police officer who thought he had learned everything, and he looked with contempt upon further schooling. But at times he gave himself away. On one occasion it happened that a man who was wanted by the police had been photographed in six different positions and the pictures were circulated among local officers. A few days later, this particular officer wrote to headquarters saying: "I duly received the pictures of the six miscreants whose capture is desired. I have arrested five of them; the sixth is under observation and will be taken soon."

It is most natural that a soldiering man should possess marked admiration for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, for this Bureau has many standards of character and conduct which are likewise the ideals of the military service.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has shown constant courage, resourcefulness, loyalty, driving energy, and technical and scientific skill in fighting the enemies of American society within our own borders.

Those of us who devote ourselves to the fight against America's enemies beyond our shore lines look to those same qualities as guides pointing the way to the best performance of the duties with which we are charged.

All the battles of modern war are not fought at sea, in the air, or on well-defined battlefields between masses of opposing troops. Our problems doubtless would be simplified if they were. Other battles of espionage and counter-espionage, agitation and counter-agitation, propaganda and counter-propaganda, go on quietly and intensely under the surface, often in the most unusual and unexpected places.

Mr. Hoover and his staff were on the job protecting this country from insidious enemies without, as well as within, long before the outbreak of war. Their years of work, their background, in the field of counter-espionage came to be of exceptional value to military and naval intelligence when our forces moved out to meet the enemy overseas. That value continues now, and will continue, happily, until the day of final victory.

At the same time, law-enforcement processes throughout the country have met the challenges of these tense, nerve-searing times with a record of outstanding efficiency. You who have built that record have every right to be proud of it, for it is a tribute to your abilities and your progressive spirit.

In your field, as in mine, every man who would discharge his duty well must have that progressive spirit. He must keep pace with new developments, and make the most of his accumulated experience. To fail to do so in the world today is tantamount to failure.

It is not pleasant to conjure what our military plight might now be if we had failed to take advantage of all the material and mechanical improvements and inventions of even the past 2½ years since we embarked on this war.

Likewise our advances against enemy forces, in all theaters of combat, surely would be the less favorable today if our strategic concepts had remained exactly as they were 2½ years ago, unchanged by experience and the unfolding pattern of events.

A county grand jury once passed a series of resolutions which read:

"Resolved, That the present jail is insufficient, and that another ought to be built.

"Resolved, That the materials of the old jail be used in constructing the new one.

"Resolved, That the old jail shall not be taken down until the new one is finished."

It is a wise practice indeed to use old and time-tested materials in the basic construction of newer concepts, but we cannot make the right use of the materials as long as we hesitate to take them boldly from the setting in which we have customarily seen them and build them firmly, and imaginatively, into our improved plans.

When the Pacific timetable called for our landing operations in the Marshall Islands, we achieved almost complete tactical surprise over the enemy by disregarding his outer strong points, to sail in and launch a direct assault on the very heart of the island chain at Kwajalein. We were able to conceive, and prepare, that unexpected move because we were willing to build plans of unexpected audacity on the foundation of our 25 months of fighting experience and our fast-mounting concentration of physical power.

Your completion of the National Police Academy course marks a milestone—an obviously important milestone—in your career. But it is not an end in itself. This ceremony today is a transition—a return to your workaday week. There, the fund of experience you have gained in this class would seem to be best put to use if it serves, not simply as so many lessons to be remembered, but as a constant spur to your progress, and the further expansion of your study, in the law-enforcement field.

Your teaching of what you have learned here to others should likewise be more effective if you urge them to follow through in the same progressive spirit.

A law enforcement officer, to be a good officer, I believe, should have many qualities in common with the good soldiering man.

Some of these—courage, resourcefulness, loyalty, and the progressive spirit—I have already indicated. The law enforcement officer, like the soldier, needs abundant energy, and should as a matter of duty—to say nothing of personal comfort, maintain the best possible health.

Both men should have, and should cultivate, the ability to make the most of every opportunity for training. We cannot stress that point too much. There is a great deal of difference between merely going through the motions and actually drawing that knowledge and that skill from training which makes for greater proficiency in doing the job.

The basic element of Marine Corps training is emphasis on the individual. Whether a man is ultimately to be a rifleman or a fighter pilot, the traditional purpose is to develop his abilities as an individual fighting unit to the utmost.

The meteoric expansion of our ranks has put severe strains on our training facilities, but we have continued, and will continue, to give each man such processing as might indicate that the success of the entire Marine Corps depends upon his personal success—as indeed, in a sense, it does.

The law enforcement officer, like a good soldiering man, should derive from his training—and his common sense—an intuitive faculty which enables him to adjust quickly to any situation in which he finds himself, and when he is on his own, to make his own right decisions.

This faculty seems to be one of the greatest advantages the American fighting man holds over the average Japanese soldier facing him. I do not mean to imply, by any means, that the Japanese is a stupid fighter. But it has been shown that he is often unable to think clearly for himself when cut off from his immediate leadership. He is apt to become sorely confused as things go wrong.

On the other hand, we have had many incidents in every theater of combat in which American noncommissioned officers have carried on with confidence and grim efficiency to gain the objective after their senior officers have been wounded or killed.

Let us hasten to add that a well-trained soldier cannot expect to be utterly independent in performing his duty. He must know how to take orders, and give them. He must have full appreciation for teamwork and the necessity of cooperating closely with others in the achieving of a common goal. Law-enforcement officers, it would seem to me, can best cope with the complexities of modern criminal and espionage activity by exercising that same appreciation.

In battle, the best fighting men have some measure of vision. They look ahead to what they must do, and plan ahead to the end of getting it done. They know where they want to go, and how they intend to get there. To them, "The reward of one duty fulfilled is the power to fulfill another."

I should believe that practical vision is essential, too, for one charged with law enforcement and crime detection.

Sometimes, it must be admitted, a man's vision is not altogether definable. I recall seeing a questionnaire in which a young marine was asked what type of post-war position he would like to prepare himself for, and his answer was: "A defense job."

The Marine Corps is proud of the fact that a part of the training of Federal Bureau of Investigation personnel takes place on the marine base at Quantico, Va.

As you members of the academy know, the F. B. I. has excellent facilities at Quantico for training in pistol and rifle marksmanship, and in many phases of crime detection.

These facilities, since their construction, have been taxed to capacity, with classes in session, and the target ranges blazing, 7 days a week.

We consider it a privilege to have had the members of this class spend a portion of the training period at Quantico. I hope your stay was a pleasant, even if an arduous one.

The Marine Corps, of course, has not permitted the talents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to go unshared. Long before we entered the war, the hand-to-hand defensive and disarming tactics of the G-men were made available to our men. I can assure you those tactics have been put to good use.

Thus, we have the armed forces, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and local, county, and State law enforcement officers fighting together for victory—overseas and on the home front—and training side by side here for the achievement of that goal.

No one in this auditorium, or in any auditorium in this Nation, knows when the day of unconditional surrender by our enemies will come. But this we do know: Civil police, Federal Bureau of Investigation, legislator, Government worker, industrial worker, farmer, soldier, sailor, marine—every American—we have an equal share in the responsibility of gaining that day in the shortest time possible. We have the common individual duty, and honor, of fighting, every day, with the relentless courage that is ours by unbroken tradition.

I am sure that all here this morning join me, most sincerely, in wishing every member of the graduating class the very best of fortune and a hearty Godspeed.

Cooperative League Opposes McKellar Amendments to T. V. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad of the opportunity to be able to ask consent to include with my remarks herewith a letter received from Mr. John Carson, director of the Washington office of the Cooperative League of the United States, and reporting the action taken by the board of directors of the league expressing strong opposition to amendments generally known as the McKellar amendments to T. V. A. legislation.

In my judgment the action of the Cooperative League board in this matter is indicative of the broad concern which that board has for the general public welfare of the American people.

THE COOPERATIVE LEAGUE
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1944.

Hon. JERRY VOORHIS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: The board of directors of the Cooperative League of the United States of America in its recent meeting at Chicago went on record in opposition to the amendments to the appropriation act for the Tennessee Valley Authority, the amendments commonly known as the McKellar amendments. The board members discussed the importance of the work of T. V. A. not only with respect to the development of power but with respect to the development of fertilizer and with respect to the research done in other fields. The conclusion was that it would be disastrous to the T. V. A. program and to the public welfare if the operations of T. V. A. were hampered now by controls which would destroy the flexibility of the operating authorities in T. V. A.

I was directed by the board to communicate this decision to the Congress. Inasmuch as it is still doubtful whether the issue will be decided in conference committee or in the respective bodies, the House and the Senate, I am imposing upon you to ask if you would be kind enough to direct this information to whomsoever should receive it in order that it might be given proper consideration.

As you know, the Cooperative League of the United States of America is the educational arm of the cooperative movement in this country. The members of the league are great regional cooperative organizations with which some 10,000,000 of our citizens are affiliated.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN CARSON,
Director, Washington Office.

To What Extent Should O. P. A. Be Changed?—Debate on American Forum of the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from the debate conducted on the American Forum of the Air on March 21, 1944, on the subject To What Extent Should O. P. A. Be Changed?

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ALLEN J. ELLENDER

There should be no substantial changes, or may I say no changes whatever, in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, for the simple reason that during the past 11 months, to quote from Mr. Bowles, Administrator of O. P. A., "the cost of living, for the first time since it began to rise late in 1940, has been held to a net increase of exactly zero." In other words, almost a year of stabilization should prove that the act is sound and workable.

We have come a long way in stabilizing living expenses by virtue of the law as written, and any substantial changes will endanger our present effective policies. It goes without saying that almost all amendments offered will be submitted so as to readjust upward the price of this or that commodity, or remove from price control specific commodities. I believe in letting well enough alone, since our purpose has been reasonably accomplished, and with excellent prospect of continued success.

I have always shared the view that the original act, as amended, was sufficiently broad and amply flexible to stabilize our economy effectively, if properly administered. Few of us will deny that most of the criticism of O. P. A. can be placed on the doorstep of defective, faulty, and ill-advised administration. And yet, I doubt the propriety of blaming any particular individual or individuals for their mistakes, because stabilization by law was a new venture in the life of free America. Administrators lacked practical experience in this new field. They found themselves floundering on uncharted seas, and it was necessary for them to resort to the age-old method of the "trial and error system" to find their bearings.

On the other hand, this process entailed controls of over 8,000,000 prices with regulations reaching over 3,000,000 establishments. Food rationing requires contact with 30,000,000 housewives, who represent 132,000,000 persons. Gasoline and fuel-oil rationing requires direct contact with over 50,000,000 individuals, and in millions of cases their rationing must be adjusted to individual needs. I mention these figures to demonstrate the immensity of the undertaking, and by reason of the fact that it had to be put in motion almost overnight one should have expected that mistakes were inevitable, all of which caused harsh criticism.

Be that as it may, I am confident that Administrator Bowles is on the right track. He is doing a good job and I know that he profiting by the mistakes of his predecessors in office. He has gained much through experience, and it must be admitted that the American people are beginning to appreciate the importance of a stabilized economy.

Mr. Bowles has simplified many of the regulations and forms; as an example, financial reporting forms have been cut from 21 pages to 8.

Full consultation with industry has become the rule, and such a course is bound to engender better cooperation.

Increased responsibility has been given regional administrators and district directors, thereby decentralizing authority, which means the cutting out of much red tape.

The central authority in Washington has been reorganized with clear and simple lines of responsibility, which enables decisions to be made with a minimum of delay. It will be remembered that much criticism was caused by undue delays. There were too many cooks in the kitchen, so to speak, and much valuable time was spent in checking, rechecking, and then double checking.

These and many other administrative reforms have created a much better feeling for price control by millions of Americans. I know that much more will be accomplished in that direction by the application of practical, common horse sense in the administration of the law, all of which can be done as the law now stands. Before considering any amendments, Congress should give full weight to the views and advice of Mr. Bowles, who is on the ground and who knows best what is necessary to better accomplish the task before him.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you Senator ELLENDER. Next, Representative A. L. MILLER, Republican of Nebraska. Congressman MILLER.

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE A. L. MILLER

The long arm of the Government control and regulations today reaches from Washington into every home and every activity of our people. The one causing the most irritation has been the O. P. A. Therefore, it is timely to discuss on this forum the question, To What Extent Should O. P. A. Be Changed?

This Congress and the great majority of the American people are aware that price controls are vital parts of our wartime machinery in order to prevent inflation. I beg to make the following suggestions:

1. The laws governing the O. P. A. should be amended in such a manner as to retain and strengthen inflation controls and at the same time eliminate the abuses and injustices now apparent.

2. There should be a revision and simplification of the rules, regulations, and orders. There are too many illegal, absurd, useless, and conflicting regulations which create great confusion to the extent that the average citizen does not know how to comply with the law.

3. Take every method to insure the greatest possible production of food and other consumer goods. The only sure method of holding prices down is to increase the supply of the goods desired.

4. Amend the law to insure the right of appeal to the proper Federal court, with the power to review the evidence, for every person who has been found guilty of infractions of the law or regulations set up under authority of the act.

No Government agency should have complete domination by regulations over the free thinking and action of the American citizen.

5. O. P. A. should give more power to State and local directors to settle problems within their own State.

6. The scope and control of O. P. A. should be limited to the basic items affecting increased costs of living. It is folly to believe that any executive control can be exercised over the thousands of items which the ambitious program coming from Washington now seeks to include.

7. Announce that the policy of O. P. A. from now on is to put into effect only those orders which are necessary to bring about adequate price control. The functions of O. P. A. should be to control prices, not profits.

8. Put on a campaign to sell the people on the idea that O. P. A. is their agent and can hope to succeed only if it is supported by the determination of the people to refrain from practices that bring on inflation.

9. Subsides should be eliminated and prohibited. Congress has twice passed upon this subject with an overwhelming vote against subsidies.

10. The O. P. A. must rely on business groups to a greater extent, accepting their considered judgment and advice, for the businessman knows how untried regulations are likely to work. The Office has no right to change established business policies.

Theories and ideologies might be fine things in peacetime but what the O. P. A. has needed for some time is more good common horse sense. Men who know the problems of the merchant, the farmer, and the businessman. Then there will be less red tape and the O. P. A. will operate far more satisfactorily to the American people.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman MILLER. Now, Representative JAMES A. WRIGHT, Democrat, of Pennsylvania. Congressman WRIGHT.

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES A. WRIGHT

Being a typical American, impatient of governmental restraint upon the details of my everyday living, I can get as exasperated at O. P. A., with its multitude of regulations, as anyone. I join with most of America in looking forward to the day when O. P. A. controls can be lifted. Americans are a nation of individualists. It is the same individualism that makes them such excellent, quick-thinking soldiers; that also annoys them when they have to dole out ration points for their food, shoes, and gasoline.

But the most outstanding feature of O. P. A. is that it has worked; in spite of its unpopularity it has been spectacularly successful. It has held down the cost of the war, the cost of living, and has assured a fair division of scarce foods to the American people. Therefore, I want O. P. A. continued with no crippling amendments. Modern war, with its emphasis upon materials, causes an increase in the national income and a decrease in the amount of goods for civilian consumption. The answer is rapidly mounting prices, a decrease in real purchasing power, and inflation. Price control imposes a dam against this inflationary tide. Against this dam continually surge the pressure of high prices for scarce goods and of high wages for scarce labor. These forces must be withheld. You cannot yield here and there when the pressure becomes too great, otherwise you will soon find yourself with no control whatever.

The last war cost us $33,000,000,000, much of that unnecessary because of inflated prices. This war is costing us $95,000,000,000 per year. We estimate that price control has thus far saved us the staggering sum of $65,000,000,000. Living costs, of consuming interest to all householders, rose in price 64.6 percent in the last war—in this war only 25.9 percent. If we had started our price control in the beginning of the war we would probably have had only a 10-percent rise.

The main criticism against O. P. A. was in its bad public relations. Enforcement was efficient in most instances but unsympathetic. We have today an Administrator in the person of Mr. Bowles, who, with his lifelong experience in getting along with people as a businessman, is doing an excellent job in selling the O. P. A. to the American people. Much of the other criticisms of the O. P. A. arises from its hardship upon certain classes of businessmen. I will not argue that many businessmen have not been squeezed, some of them squeezed out of business. Some of these hardships were preventable and should be prevented in the future. Others are the inevitable result of a rigid war economy. It is not practical to have different prices for each of the millions of American businessmen. Any amendment designed to relieve a business group must pass two rigid tests if it is to be in the public interest. First, will it break down the general system of controls? The welfare of the many must be preferred to the welfare of the few. Second, can it be administered without hiring an additional army of enforcement officers? O. P. A. is limited in its personnel and the more individual treatment that is accorded, the more complexity and administrative detail are bound to result.

But the over-all picture is not gloomy. Rent control has been assailed as being too rigid and unjust to certain landlords. But the number of real estate foreclosures has sharply declined. Sales are active and the prices substantially above pre-war levels. The net income for apartment houses and private rental houses is higher than ever before. As to general business prosperity, corporation profits, even after heavy taxes, have increased since 1939 from four to eight and one-half billion, the highest ever reached by American business. Small business is doing better than ever before, profits are at record levels—business failures are at an all-time low and small concerns in the field of retailing are steadily improving their position as compared to the chain stores. Farm operators have increased their income 182 percent since 1939, or almost 90 percent since 1919, which was a peak year. The net savings of individuals in 1943 was about thirty-three and one-half billion, another all-time high. There has been a substantial increase in wages of workers, even when the rise in the cost of living has been discounted. Some workers in nonwar industries and many persons of fixed income appear to be the only sufferers in terms of their ability to meet their necessary living expenses.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman WRIGHT. And now, Representative ROBERT W. KEAN, Republican, of New Jersey. Congressman KEAN.

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE ROBERT W. KEAN

Price control is an essential part of our fight against inflation. It is no partisan matter. The O. P. A. should and will be continued but the act must be streamlined and strengthened in the light of our experience.

The President, in his message to Congress on January 11, emphasized the necessity for early reenactment of the law. In spite of repeated urgings ever since by Republican members of the House Banking and Currency Committee, our New Deal chairman has refused to set a date for its consideration. This attitude by the administration spokesman might lead to a suspicion that the President's request for speedy action may have been merely campaign oratory.

It is true that the chairman at long last introduced a bill, which he has so far pigeonholed, for continuation of price control, but in it he does not propose to change the crossing of a "t" nor the dotting of an "i." He would not alter, clarify, improve, or amend the present law, thus indicating his belief that it is perfect. The people of our country know better.

O. P. A. has used its powers to enforce regulations contrary to the intent of Congress. We set out to control prices—not to control all industry—not to change established business methods.

Ample time should be given for all who have constructive ideas to present suggestions for improvement in the present law. In general, details should await these hearings.

But, among other things, do we want the O. P. A. to continue to control profits? Is this not the job of taxation and renegotiation?

And surely there should be a board of review to whom those aggrieved by price ceilings might appeal, as was provided in the original bill passed by the House.

Then, too, we must strengthen that section of the law which forbids O. P. A. from compelling changes in recognized business practices.

And the definition of what is a strategic and critical material ought to be clarified.

Should we not also protect minorities by modifying the wording through which the O. P. A. has held that regulations, unfair to many, are in order just so long as they are generally fair and equitable?

Representatives of small business have often complained of squeezes between wholesalers and retailers as a result of price ceilings. We should study whether it is possible to prevent these through legislation.

It has been a grave disappointment to me that Mr. Bowles has not seen fit to volunteer suggestions in the light of his experience. Stubborn insistence that the law is perfect is not constructive, neither is blind criticism nor irresponsible attack on O. P. A. Improvements in the law should be obtained by cooperative effort. Only by all pulling together will we achieve that united support from the American people without which price control cannot be fully effective.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman KEAN. The American Forum of the Air continues with its round table discussion of "To What Extent Should O. P. A. Be Changed?" Senator ELLENDER, will you open the panel?

Senator ELLENDER. I should like to ask Congressman MILLER a question. He made 10 suggestions and I presume that he meant that they be dealt with by way of amendments. I am in agreement that in order to do away with subsidies it would be necessary to amend the law, but I am wondering if the Congressman will be good enough to tell us what special changes he would make in the act to retain and strengthen inflation controls as he has suggested.

Representative MILLER. I think the greatest thing to control inflation is production. If you have a large production of foods, for instance, or things that people want, that controls inflation. Many of the acts of the O. P. A. have been those of destroying production. Let's get down to your State. I believe you are interested in strawberries in your State. I notice in the last few days that you gentlemen have had several meetings with the O. P. A. relative to strawberries. The O. P. A. sets up some panels to sort of follow the advice of businessmen. May I ask if they followed your advice in the matter of strawberries when it came to putting price ceilings on them?

Senator ELLENDER. The question is not settled and I presume that O. P. A. will not follow our suggestions.

Representative MILLER. Well, that is what they are doing all along.

Senator ELLENDER. But my observation is that everybody is for price control provided the controls are imposed on the other fellow.

Representative MILLER. Do you think it is possible to control the price of such a perishable fruit as strawberries?

Senator ELLENDER. Yes; I think so. It would be difficult, but I think it could be done.

Representative MILLER. Your people don't think so down in your district.

Senator ELLENDER. The question, though, is would you suggest that the law be amended so as to exclude strawberries, because that is the question before us at the moment?

Representative MILLER. Yes; I think perishable fruits and vegetables cannot possibly be controlled by price ceilings. We did not have price ceilings a year ago; we had O. P. A. Strawberries have been on the market from Florida and Texas for quite some time and now they are proposing to put a ceiling on a perishable product. I notice your own colleague, Mr. MORRISON, and Mr. FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, recently attended a meeting of the O. P. A. They did not seem to be able to get anywhere with them. They did not follow their considered judgment and advice.

Senator ELLENDER. I can give you the—— Representative WRIGHT. May I interrupt? I do not wish to disturb anything you have to say, Senator, and possibly you are better able than I to answer that question, but I do know from the hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee that one of the worst spots that they had in food control was fresh fruits and vegetables. They did not have any ceiling on them at first. There was plenty of money to buy, the housewives could not buy rationed articles, the prices of other commodities were fixed, and the prices of fresh fruits and vegetables soared. It became necessary in order to reduce the cost of living, and it was reduced materially by attempting to squeeze down the prices of fresh fruits and vegetables.

I do not know its applicability to your strawberry situation, but I know generally that was so.

Representative MILLER. I think that is right, Congressman WRIGHT, but may I say this: that O. P. A. went out to encourage an increase in the price of cabbage. They issued a 2,500-word order within the last few months on cabbage seed, and last week down in Texas there were five and a half million heads of cabbage plowed under because of O. P. A. regulations, 25,000 acres of spring and winter vegetables plowed under. Do you think that helps inflation?

Senator ELLENDER. I thought you said a while ago that production would help to dispel inflation.

Representative MILLER. Correct, it does, but O. P. A. regulations prohibit them from getting onto the market.

Senator ELLENDER. How?

Representative MILLER. By the regulations, it is impossible for the men to make a profit. They issued a 2,500-word regulation on how to plant cabbages. They planted them; now they are being plowed under.

Senator ELLENDER. A ceiling was fixed on cabbage last year and the farmers made plenty of money. This year they planted much more than last with the result that the market became glutted.

Representative MILLER. Whose fault was that?

Senator ELLENDER. Certainly not O. P. A. According to the argument you made a while ago, if you permit unlimited production that will curb inflation. I would like you to answer why it is that your argument doesn't work in the case of cabbage.

Representative MILLER. They will have inflation if they don't put this cabbage on the market, I will say that to you, and if they don't put cabbage and carrots on. There were 15,000 acres of onions plowed under, and if you buy onions in Washington today you buy them on the black market at 15 to 30 cents a pound.

Senator ELLENDER. Congressman MILLER, the black market can be controlled if the people will help. O. P. A. has placed most vegetables of all kinds, and fresh fruit, under control for the reason that if we didn't have controls in fresh fruits and vegetables, and so forth, everybody would want to grow them, and you couldn't force farmers to grow, say, more wheat or more corn or more of this or that than which is essential to our economy and our war effort.

Representative WRIGHT. That comes right back to the point that you made, too, and I agree with the Senator completely on that. You were talking about limiting your controls to basic items. It has been a matter of experience that if you don't control all prices, your labor, production, and everything else tends to gravitate toward those uncontrolled articles and you don't have any control at all.

Representative KEAN. I wanted to change the subject away from farm goods. We have been talking about farm things all the time. I want to talk a little about businessmen. Businessmen tell me that when they seek conferences with the O. P. A. they meet a lot of capable and well-meaning men and the discussions seem to get somewhere, but then after the meetings close the O. P. A. makes decisions completely contrary to what has been discussed in the conference. Now, don't you think that the O. P. A. should give authority to the people who meet with the businessmen to make decisions then and there?

Senator ELLENDER. Of course, you have to have one head. If you were to give authority to these advisory boards to do the thinking and of making the final decisions, business would probably have its way.

Representative KEAN. You don't think that Mr. Bowles makes all these 8,000,000 decisions himself?

Senator ELLENDER. Why, of course not. He does it by and through the advice of people who are probably engaged in these businesses, and I am sure that he takes into consideration the past history of certain businesses before reaching a conclusion. I think that if you look over statistics, Congressman KEAN, you will find that business has fared very, very well under price control.

Representative KEAN. It has fared very well through a wartime economy.

Senator ELLENDER. Of course.

Representative KEAN. Of course.

Senator ELLENDER. And just stop and think. Prior to 1939 your corporate income, as I recall it, was about $4,000,000,000; now it is about eight and one-half billions. I grant you that that is due to the fact that they have had more business, but what has caused them to fare so well is that they had a stabilized economy whereby they could go ahead without fear of cut-throat competition and inflationary prices.

Representative WRIGHT. Another thing, too, Senator; obviously you can't fix one price without any relation at all to other prices. There is an integrated price structure. The decision must be made some place. I think that Chester Bowles has done as much as any man could do to try to bring cooperation with practical business people, and I admit that in the beginning of O. P. A. that wasn't always the case, and, as I said in my statement, I think that one of O. P. A.'s worst faults was public relations. I think that it was the fact that they didn't attempt to get the point of view of the people that they were dealing with and consequently O. P. A. was unpopular and now nobody will have a good name for it. If you will only realize what it has accomplished rather than its faults, I think we would be better off.

Representative MILLER. Representative WRIGHT, do you think that the O. P. A. is now cooperating with businessmen in things that concern their business?

Representative WRIGHT. Much better than they have. I don't say that it is perfect. It is difficult to get every businessman.

Representative MILLER. I think that is true. I want to refer to one thing, for instance, that affects my country out there. Last winter we had a black market in meat and we are going to have a shortage of meat again. This is true in spite of the fact that we have on the ranges of America today about 84,000,000 head of cattle, or will have in 1944. That is about 12,000,000 more than the 10-year average, and yet those cattle are out upon the range and our stockyards, our feeders, have 20 percent less in the feed yards where they actually put the meat upon the animals. The stockmen, the feeders, the cattlemen and all of them came to O. P. A. and said, "We don't want any roll-back on cattle; we don't want any slaughter allocations. We want to go ahead and feed." They didn't let them do it.

Representative WRIGHT. Was that prime quality?

Representative MILLER. Prime quality, beef of any kind. Now they are proposing to put a 30-percent additional subsidy on them so they can get the cattle off the range. Those cattle don't have any meat on them; they are not fit to butcher, yet that is a thing that O. P. A. has done and it is actually causing a shortage of meat. In other words, we are living in a country where there is cattle, cattle everywhere, and not a bite to eat.

Representative WRIGHT. If there are cattle, eventually they will get to the consumer.

Representative MILLER. No, not unless they let the feeders feed them. They put a price ceiling upon the cattle but not upon the feed, the hay, the labor, the salt, and everything that goes into the production of beef. They changed the rules too many times in the middle of the feed yard and the cattlemen are just not feeding cattle.

Senator ELLENDER. Congressman, we discussed that question on this forum some time ago and, as I recall, the increase in cattle production was over 25 percent, in hog production over 50 percent, chicken production was something like 50 percent, and an increase in many other animals that consume feed. Won't you agree that one of the main reasons today why so many cattle are not being fed as in the past is because of a lack of feed?

Representative MILLER. Oh, part of it is lack of feed.

Senator ELLENDER. Won't you say that the major trouble arises from a lack of feed?

Representative MILLER. No; I would not. These people can get feed out there but they can't make any profit on feeding the cattle. They claim it is costing them about 20 cents a pound now to put a pound of beef on these cattle and they just can't afford to do it.

Senator ELLENDER. I would like to ask either Congressman KEAN or Congressman MILLER to answer this question. They have made many suggestions for amendments and, as I indicated a while ago, from the amendments suggested I believe that there is only one that Congressman MILLER has made that would require legislation, that is in respect to subsidies. Now, I would like for either of them to answer what is there under the act as now written that couldn't be done that has been suggested by these 9 or 10 amendments that you have proposed?

Representative KEAN. Senator, I gather from your attitude that you would dispense with Congress entirely. You believe in Congress by directive, by some great power, the President.

Senator ELLENDER. No, sir; no, sir; I don't. The law provides that the purpose of it is to stabilize our economy and, as I indicated in my opening remarks, for the past 11 or 12 months we have had a stabilized economy and that has been done under the law as written, and the question that I am asking you is, Of all the suggestions that you have made, except that pertaining to subsidies, could they not be done under the law as now written?

Representative KEAN. No, Senator; they could not be.

Senator ELLENDER. Well, point them out to me, if you can.

Representative KEAN. Well, the first one that I mentioned was the question of the Board of Review. Then I want to strengthen——

Senator ELLENDER (interposing). Well, what about the Board of Review?

Representative KEAN. The Board of Review? Today it is impossible for any aggrieved party to get any change in price ceilings at all. The only question of review is whether they are according to law or arbitrary or capricious, all of which means the same thing.

Representative WRIGHT. Mr. KEAN, you can't expect Congress to fix the price ceilings. Congress can't administer O. P. A. It isn't equipped to do it, or staffed; it doesn't have the time.

Representative KEAN. There is no intention to have Congress do it. The board of review as it was in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives, in the original act—I don't believe you were here at the time.

Representative WRIGHT. I think that I was. I think it was just shortly after I came.

Representative KEAN. We passed the bill and it provided that, with the advice and consent of the Senate, there be a board of review of five men, that when the Price Administrator set a price ceiling, that ceiling would remain in existence but that aggrieved parties would have the right to appeal to this board of review and that this board of review could set aside these price ceilings—not retroactively—but as of the date when they made their decision.

Representative WRIGHT. Well, it is a question of what party you want to trust with responsibility. Now, my idea is to get a good administrator in there; don't divide the authority, and I will tell you what I would like to do, though; I would like to see with O. P. A. what has been done with several of the committees of the House and several of the agencies, I would like to see them report to Congress and have an informal session where the complaints can be ironed out, explained, criticized, and you have a more effective cooperation of the Congress with their own agency, which is O. P. A.

Representative KEAN. That is what I proposed in a speech that I made a year ago January. I believe you heard it.

Representative WRIGHT. I agree with you thoroughly.

Representative KEAN. But every committee should take the responsibility for every new piece of legislation that is introduced and passed and from time to time review the work and consider in a friendly atmosphere if it couldn't improve its own child, the law.

Representative WRIGHT. Yes, it is Congress's fault as much as it is the O. P. A.

Senator ELLENDER. Congressman KEAN, there is no doubt in my mind that if you gave this Board of Review the power to change any of these price regulations it would probably upset the applecart. It was pointed out by Congressman WRIGHT a while ago that by placing price controls on one commodity it will affect the price of other commodities and therefore that is one of the main reasons for centralizing the authority, and that is why I believe that the Congress has refused in the past to permit this Board of Review that you have suggested to function as you are now proposing.

Representative MILLER. Don't you think, Senator ELLENDER, that there has been too much in the past of the so-called kangaroo court procedures out in the country? They are still doing it out in my State, where they pull some poor fellow in for violation of the O. P. A. regulations and the O. P. A. inspector is the police and the court and the judge and the executor of the sentence. The man who is convicted or aggrieved has no way to appeal at all to the ordinary constituted courts. Don't you think that he ought to have a right to appeal to the courts in an orderly manner, in an American manner?

Senator ELLENDER. You mean on price fixing?

Representative MILLER. Price fixing or rationing or anything.

Senator ELLENDER. That is the suggestion made by Congressman KEAN a while ago and that, to my way of thinking, would result in a kind of divided authority and the Administrator wouldn't know where he was going.

Representative MILLER. I think that is being done. You think you would have to give more authority to the local boards and the State boards?

Senator ELLENDER. Now, you talk about these kangaroo court procedures; I have heard about them, but——

Representative MILLER (interposing). Oh, they have them out in my State; they are common.

Senator ELLENDER. I will tell you what you ought to have in your State, though; a lot of court enforcement to prevent your black market.

Representative MILLER. We don't have so much black market there; you have the black market in the East.

Senator ELLENDER. You said a while ago that the black market was prevalent in your State.

Representative MILLER. You have the black market here in Washington, in Mr. WRIGHT'S district.

Representative WRIGHT. Not where I come from; we are law-abiding people.

Representative MILLER. When they want something to eat they are not going to be able to get it.

Senator ELLENDER. It strikes me that having had O. P. A. for the past 2 years the people are beginning to find out what price controls and ratings mean to our economy. As I suggested from this very platform some time ago, my hope is that the people of this Nation would consider themselves as sentinels to see that the law is enforced.

Representative MILLER. I agree with you; that is fine; it ought to be done.

Senator ELLENDER. All of that can be done under the law without amendment. I have been trying to get out of either your or Congressman KEAN any suggestions as to why the law should be amended in order to carry out the proposals that you made in your opening remarks.

Representative MILLER. I can tell you why, because in the past they have issued over 3,300 directives, they fill 20 fat volumes, the directives and amendments thereto.

Senator ELLENDER. That has been changed by amended regulations.

Representative MILLER. Has it been changed? They are still issuing the orders; they are going to issue one on your strawberries in the next few days that you won't like, but it is coming.

Senator ELLENDER. Your idea would be to exclude strawberries, to exclude cabbage and every other vegetable?

Representative MILLER. I think we ought to take the advice and counsel of men like yourself and your strawberry growers who know something about the business.

Senator ELLENDER. And maybe you would want to do away with the ceiling price on live cattle.

Representative MILLER. They don't have a ceiling price on live cattle. They pay a subsidy to the packer which amounts to a ceiling, but it is not a ceiling. The price on cattle was rolled back $1.50 a hundred as soon as they paid the subsidy to the packers. The grower didn't get the subsidy.

Senator ELLENDER. I think you are mistaken when you say there is no ceiling on live cattle. There is one from $8 to $16 a hundred, as I recall.

Representative MILLER. You are only penalized if you don't stay within that.

Senator ELLENDER. It amounts to a ceiling.

Representative KEAN. Do you approve of the proposition of controlling profits like Mr. Vinson's regulation of November 16, in which he said that certain people would be allowed to make 2 percent and other producers would be allowed to make nothing if they were making good profits? That is certainly contrary to the law.

Senator ELLENDER. I don't know. You have got to go into the profit side before you are able to get price control; you agree to that statement, I am certain.

Representative WRIGHT. You don't want to fix a price to keep a man from getting a profit; I mean you have to take into consideration a profit when you fix the price of an industry. I don't say that the primary purpose of O. P. A. should be to fix profits, and I don't think, although there may have been a couple of fellows working over there at one time who might have thought so, that it is the philosophy of O. P. A. today. I think the philosophy of O. P. A. today is price control.

Representative KEAN. Mr. Vinson's directive to Mr. Bowles was in case a producer who is currently realizing excessively high profits the producer's total unit cost for the individual unit item affected is all he could get.

Senator ELLENDER. Why isn't that sound in price control? Why should you permit a man to make nothing?

Representative KEAN. He wasn't telling him to make nothing.

Representative MILLER. Don't you think it is production and not price control that will take care of inflation? It is production, after all, and not price control.

Senator ELLENDER. My dear sir, under the methods put into effect in the last 2 years I think we have made a marvelous advancement in production.

Representative WRIGHT. Better than we have ever had before.

Representative MILLER. Then it is necessary to ration the articles when you get a large production, or would you rather plow them under like you do the cabbages and carrots down in the valley?

Senator ELLENDER. You mention your cabbage story; that is, of course, in a few instances.

Representative MILLER. Oh, I had some plowed under.

Senator ELLENDER. I understand that. That is because you had a few greedy farmers who made a pile of money the year before in cabbages and they thought they would plant more cabbage this year and make another big scoop.

Representative KEAN. The answer really is production. If you have sufficient production we won't need rationing, we won't need price control, we won't need anything; but you can't get it today. Of course, you have to have price control.

Senator ELLENDER. But in a balanced production program you should produce so much wheat, so much corn, so much of this and so much of that so as to have a sufficiency of all essentials. In order to accomplish such a goal I contend that you should by all means have price control over all commodities. You can readily see that as to those commodities that are not under price control, as Congressman Wright stated a while ago, you will have the farmers planting peas, strawberries, and cabbage or whatever is not under control, and it would have a tendency of not getting the desired amount of labor to produce those crops that are really necessary. In other words farmers growing crops not under control may obtain more money and could afford to pay better wages.

Representative MILLER. I think that is right, Senator.

Mr. Granik, you know I am interested in how far this thing has stayed above politics here. It has been so interesting—two men on either side of the table. Mr. Bowles is a good Republican; he is doing a good job. One thing I would like to say is this: If I had to make a decision between abolishing O. P. A. or the Republican National Committee, I would abolish the Republican National Committee, because I think the O. P. A. has made a lot of Republicans in this country. Every election shows that, and I think it is going to have more effect as we go on from time to time.

Senator ELLENDER. Don't you crow too early. November is coming and I heard the same boasts in 1940.

Representative MILLER. You are down in Louisiana.

The Christian Movement Toward World Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND E. WILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Christian Movement Toward World Order," delivered by Dr. O. Frederick Nolde before the Lutheran Laymen's Fellowship, of Washington, and the Lutheran Church of the Reformation, Washington, D. C. Dr. Nolde is professor at the Lutheran Theological Seminary in Philadelphia. He is also a member of the Commission on a Just and Durable Peace of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, of which John Foster Dulles is chairman. Dr. Nolde speaks with the authority of the Commission.

Mr. President, I have submitted the text of the address to the Public Printer and find that the cost of printing it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will amount to $156.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Events of considerable significance are happening throughout the Christian world. They are taking place with such rapidity and with such apparent interrelationship, that many people think a movement is emerging and taking shape. This series of developments is frequently referred to as the Christian movement toward world order. My purpose is to set forth a characterization of it. Any effort to organize a definition of something while it is still in process of formation is attended by obvious dangers. Nevertheless, we must, from time to time, pause and appraise current happenings. Obviously, certain modifications will have to be introduced into the characterization as developments move along.

Before attempting to mark out the predominant aspects of this movement, it seems wise to offset a few misconceptions which are popularly entertained.

1. This movement is not traditional pacifism. The choice does not rest between war and peace. That represents an oversimplification of the issue. The real choice rests between a world of international anarchy and disorder, where maladjustments are allowed to come into being and to develop until a bursting point is reached and, on the other hand, a world of international order, where mechanisms or institutions are in operation to deal with present evils, to prevent the occurrence of future evils, and to allow for creative growth within nations and among nations. Pacifists and nonpacifists are participating. The latter far outnumber the former. The two groups find a meeting point when they focus attention upon what is to be accomplished at the conclusion of the war.

2. This movement is not unpatriotic. People are conscious of the dangers and the hardships to which their friends and relatives are exposed on far-flung battlefronts. Inevitably, they feel somewhat ill at ease when, in the comparative comfort of home surroundings, they deliberate upon peace settlements and world order. Nevertheless, it seems imperative that men and women should thus assign themselves to what may be thought of as a long-range objective. In fact, such activity may represent a type of higher patriotism. Not only church leaders, but governmental officials have concurred in this point of view. Many statements have been set forth by them to encourage people in all walks of life to interest themselves and to become active in the type of world that ought to emerge from this present catastrophe. An illustration of these opinions may be found in a statement made by Secretary of State Cordell Hull in a radio address on July 23, 1942. "Without impediment to the fullest prosecution of the war—indeed, for its most effective prosecution—the United Nations should, from time to time, as they did in adopting the Atlantic Charter, formulate and proclaim their common views regarding fundamental policies which will chart for mankind a wise course based on enduring spiritual values. In support of such policies, an informed public opinion must be developed. This is a task of intensive study, hard thinking, broad vision, and leadership—not for governments alone, but especially for parents, and teachers, and clergymen, and all those within each nation who provide spiritual, moral, and intellectual guidance. Never did so great and so compelling a duty in this respect devolve upon those who are in positions of responsibility, public and private." The attitude here represented has been consistently maintained by leaders in government.

3. This movement is not un-Christian. There are some who have feared that the church is entering the political and economic arenas in unwarranted fashion. This is not the case. It remains the primary task of the Christian church to bring men into right relations with God through repentance and faith in Christ, and to bring them into right relations with their fellow men. In this movement the Christian church is addressing pertinent Christian truths to an area of life which has to do with relations among organized segments of society, the nations and peoples of the world. Fundamentally, it is making a testimony concerning the relevance of Christian teaching to the needs of modern society. Specifically, it is doing two things: (a) it is offering to governmental leaders the benefit of Christian insights and judgments in the area in which governmental leaders must operate; (b) it is seeking to strengthen and to enlighten the consciences of Christians so that they, as citizens, may play a responsible part in the world society of which they are members.

This movement is not traditional pacifism; it is not unpatriotic; it is not un-Christian. What, then, is it? I shall set forth and illustrate the following five characteristics. Perforce, my illustrations of the first will be somewhat more extensive.

I. The Christian Movement Toward World Order views war as a symptom or manifestation of an international disease and seeks to bring permanent Christian truths to bear upon the root causes or tension points from which international maladjustments or wars inevitably emerge.

II. It is transcending the lines of separation fixed by traditional faiths, and, in areas of common agreement, is enlisiting the cooperation of good will everywhere.

III. It is cultivating an international Christian approach to an international problem.

IV. It is proceeding with an attack from the top down; that is, it is attempting to establish and to maintain effective contacts with governmental leaders.

V. It is proceeding with an attack from the bottom up; that is, it is seeking to enlighten and to strengthen the consciences of Christians in all walks of life, so that they will assume a responsible part as Christian citizens.

I. The Christian Movement Toward World Order views war as a symptom or manifestation of an international disease, and seeks to bring permanent Christian truths to bear upon the root causes or tension points from which international maladjustments or wars inevitably emerge.

When a physician is confronted by a patient, he is not content with any superficial treatment of a symptom. He wants to discover the causes from which the symptom has developed. Only when he has identified them and provided some counteraction for them, does he rest content. Similarly, in this movement, Christian leaders are not merely rebelling against the phenomenon of war. They recognize that war is a symptom of an international disease, and that at its root lies a host of causes from which the external maladjustments surely derive. Documents, prepared by Christian commissions in different countries, have been attempting to relate Christian teachings to the tension points in international life. A brief summary of findings is here presented. There is no pretense to inclusiveness. The material is intended merely to illustrate this first mark of the Christian Movement Toward World Order.

1. Violation of moral law. A cause for difficulty among the peoples of the world attaches to the manner in which contracting nations regard treaties and treaty provisions. Treaties are made and maintained by moral compulsion or by the power politics which operate on the basis of military or economic force. Moral law may be violated in one or more of three ways: (1) by refusal to become party to a treaty that is just and fair, and to the best interests of all concerned; (2) by breaking the provisions of a treaty solely on the grounds of self-interest or self-gain; (3) by denying the right to change the provisions of a treaty when the provisions were originally at fault or when changed circumstances make modifications imperative. Too frequently, only the second of these has been considered a violation of moral law. In reality, the first or the third may be the true cause for breaking a treaty and promoting an act of aggression.

Christianity believes that moral law, no less than physical law, undergirds our world. It contends that the moral order, which is fundamental and eternal, is relevant to the corporate life of men in nations and in society as well as to the life of individuals. The sickness and suffering which affect our present society are symptoms and proof of an indifference to and a direct violation of the moral law. Guilt of this indifference or violation becomes a relative matter, and no nation upon earth is completely free from a measure of responsibility. Christianity therefore proclaims that moral law must become controlling not only in the lives of men as individuals, but also in their corporate life as nations.

2. Inadequacy of International Government. We are, at the present moment, victims of an unbalanced growth. Politically, we are still creatures of nationalism. No new form of government, transcending national lines and designed inclusively to meet world needs has appeared since the rise of national consciousness and the development of national states. Meanwhile, in many areas of our life, we have become international. Tremendous improvements in communication and transportation have knit the peoples of the world closely together in social and economic intercourse. The problems which inevitably arise from these contacts on a world scale find no corresponding directive or control in political structure.

Christian leaders, and to a lesser extent, Christian people in all walks of life, have come to recognize more and more over the last decade a characteristic which inhered in Christianity from its very inception. Christianity or the Christian church is not a national phenomenon. In the truest sense, there is no Christian church of the United States, or of England, or of Germany. Christianity is ecumenical; it represents a universal or catholic mind. The Christian church is coextensive with the inhabited world. As a result from this growing realization, Christian leaders in increasing numbers have taken the position that national states cannot represent the final word in government. Without contending for the abrogation of national sovereignties and without becoming proponents of any particular scheme of world government, they have have nevertheless expressed the conviction that some kind of organic relation among the peoples of the world harmonizes with the ecumenical conception of Christianity, and makes possible the fullest expression of that conception.

3. Economic maladjustments. The primacy of economic issues as a cause for disturbance among nations needs no demonstration. The more obvious problems of tariffs and currencies run out into endless lines of agriculture, manufacture, commerce, transportation, and ultimately touch the life, not only of every nation, but also of every last individual within each nation. In spite of the recognized international repercussions from many of the economic enactments by separate nations, no adequate steps towards international control over economic relationships has been effected. In the realm of economic activity, each nation goes its independent way with the result that the seeds of international controversy are continuously sown.

Christianity is concerned with the effects of economic dispositions upon people and Christianity is concerned that the people who make the economic dispositions shall do so with a regard for the rights and privileges of others. It recognizes that economic injustices work hardship on people as individuals and have an adverse effect upon Christian fellowship. Christian leaders are becoming more determined in their stand that the government of economic relations must be such as to provide opportunity for all men in all countries of the world to meet their basic economic need. In the definition of basic economic need, two criteria operate: (1) the rights and well-being of the individual; (2) the rights and well-being of society or of individuals comprising the social group. The major problem seems to rest in the effort to keep the operation of these two criteria in proper balance; that it, in the effort to establish conditions under which the individual may rightfully seek his own welfare, and at the same time, not interfere with but actually contribute to the welfare of others. Toward this end, Christian standards must direct the requirements to be met by individuals, by industry, by the national state, and by any world organization.

4. Race antagonisms and discriminations. The difficulties arising in this connection may fall within the confines of a single nation. For example, the people of the United States must recognize more intelligently the problems and responsibilities occasioned for them by the large Negro population in this country. Too frequently efforts to ameliorate the situation have been animated by sentimentality or by the desire for political support. The problem remains and dare not be ignored. The difficulties attached to minorities and race relations also take on an international complexion. They become manifest in dealing with national minorities within any country, in establishing national borders, in immigration and emigration restrictions, in the determination of economic and cultural opportunities, and in many other perplexing situations. Persecutions and discriminations frequently result.

Christianity believes in the brotherhood of man under the Fatherhood of God. The message of the Christian Gospel relates to all men, regardless of race or color. While it recognizes predominant racial differences among the varied nations and peoples of the earth, the Christian Church does not support a fancied, intrinsic superiority of any one race. Christian leaders therefore believe that it is within their province to contend that the rights and liberties of racial and religious minorities in all lands should be recognized and safeguarded. Freedom of religious worship, of speech, of assembly, of the press, and of scientific inquiry and teaching are fundamental to human development and in keeping with the moral law. The advancement of one group beyond another brings with it no special privilege, only added responsibility.

5. Colonial possessions. A variety of conditions fertile to world disorder exists wherever a somewhat powerful nation regards a territory and its inhabitants as personal property. A colonial people may rebel against some form of exploitation, or they may merely reach a point where group or racial pride leads to a declaration of independence. Granted a sufficient measure of physical and material strength, they will resort to war. Or, a powerful nation near a colony which is held by a distant nation may feel that its operations are restricted and thus find an excuse for precipitating warlike acts. Even in times of peace, when friendly relations are maintained, colonial possessions are a disturbing factor because of the everlasting threat of war. A colony may be entirely harmless to a nearby nation in normal times and yet become a thorn in its side in the event that war should be declared with the holding country.

Christian leaders are saying that no nation is inherently superior to another and that the people governed should have a voice in their government. Obviously, the resources of a people ought to be exploited neither by a national state nor by corporations whose activities are permitted or endorsed by a national state. The view that colonies should be made independent as rapidly as possible is gaining ground. It is further claimed that, as long as some outside control is needed in any colonial possession, there should be international supervision to promote reasonable progress toward autonomy.

6. Armaments. The right of separate nations to develop military machines without restriction leads to a mad race, the end of which no man can conceive. Disarmament treaties have fallen short of their purposes in that they were not sufficiently inclusive and contracting nations too frequently were reluctant to meet their obligations. The growth of armaments contributes to the sway of power politics, and nations with sufficient force at their disposal can, by threat of reprisals, gain almost any desired end.

A Christian view argues strongly for a constructive outlet to human energies and resources. If there is no control imposed upon development of national military machines, the human race will have no means available for the loftier pursuits of life. The least to be sought—and exigencies of international relations may argue for it—is an international control of certain forms of military equipment and the maintenance of some kind of an international police force.

7. Attitudes toward defeated powers. In anticipation of victory by the United Nations, it becomes highly significant to determine the attitude with which peace treaty making shall be approached. There is some truth in the view that it is not wars but peace treaties that make enemies and sow the seeds for future wars. The tremendous severity of the present conflict and the pressures which it has exerted have tended to awaken hatreds and the desire for revenge on the part of many people.

Should the principle of retaliation become determining in the treaty structure, Christian idealism and the best interests of humanity will be ignored. The conditions under which the war may end are obviously uncertain. Nevertheless, Christian leaders have felt called upon to indicate their concern by the formulation of guiding principles. Three of these are most clearly set forth in the British document, The Christian Church and World Order. (1) We repudiate any attempt to solve this problem in the spirit of revenge. (2) We repudiate a vague sentimentalism which ignores past crimes and future dangers. (3) No solution can be regarded as satisfactory which does not on the one hand provide adequate safeguards to all peoples against military and economic aggression by others, and on the other, provide full opportunities to all, victors and vanquished alike, to develop their own national and cultural life within the framework of world order.

8. Relief and rehabilitation. The devastation wrought by total war makes the task of relief and rehabilitation immediate and almost overpowering. Word has come from continental Europe that unless physical help is forthcoming at an early time, all plans for post-war reconstruction will be worthless. Men must first live. Only thereafter can they face the task of ordering their relationships.

So extensive will the need for assistance be that no single agency can be expected to assume full responsibility. Governments have already established commissions to plan and administer relief. The churches have set up world organizations with branches in different countries in order that no time may be lost. Christianity provides a dynamic to work through whatever agency may afford an effective opportunity. Of peculiar importance are the spirit in which this work is done and the purposes it seeks to achieve. By a demonstration of service to all who are in need—victor and vanquished—Christians can further their contribution to heal the wounds of war and to bind the world together in a just and durable peace.

9. The movement is transcending the lines of separation fixed by traditional faiths and in areas of common agreement is enlisting the cooperation of men of good will everywhere.

Obviously many people who are not affiliated with the Christian church, will be involved in the settlements to be made for international order. Christian leaders have been seeking to frame those principles which, while in harmony with Christian teachings, will also win acceptance from men of good will who are not in the Christian fellowship.

The 10 peace points were originally accepted by Roman Catholics and Protestants in England. Subsequently, those portions of them which were not distinctly Christian were endorsed by Jewish leaders.

In December 1942 the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America approved the Statement of Guiding Principles which its Commission on a Just and Durable Peace had prepared. The preamble first makes a definite Christian affirmation: "We believe that the eternal God revealed in Christ is the ruler of men and of nations and that His purpose in history will be realized. For us He is the source of moral law and the power to make it effective." It then proceeds to state: "From this faith Christians derive the ethical principles upon which world order must be based. These principles, however, seem to us to be among those which men of good will everywhere may be expected to recognize as part of the moral law. In this we rejoice. For peace will require the cooperation of men of all nations, races, and creeds. We have therefore first set out (points 1 to 9) those guiding principles which, it seems to us, Christians and non-Christians alike can accept."

In October 1943 the Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant Declaration on World Peace was released over the signatures of 144 religious leaders in the United States. Each group set forth its own preamble to express its distinctive emphasis. There followed seven statements of agreement under the following headings:

1. The moral law must govern the world order.
2. The rights of the individual must be assured.
3. The rights of oppressed, weak or colonial peoples must be protected.
4. The rights of minorities must be secured.
5. International institutions to maintain peace with justice must be organized.
6. International economic cooperation must be developed.
7. A just social order within each state must be achieved.

In thus identifying agreements with other groups, Christians are not denying or ignoring teachings which are distinctly Christian. Rather, they are enlisting cooperation to the extent that there is a common objective and to the extent that there are commonly accepted procedures. They must continue to emphasize and to proclaim the essential truths of Christianity.

III. The movement is cultivating an international Christian approach to an international problem.

During the early stages of the war Christian activity in behalf of world order moved most intensively within separate nations. National church bodies instituted commissions, convened study conferences, issued statements of Christian principles, contributed to the enlightenment of public opinion, and established contacts with governmental officials. As the churches throughout the world thus assigned themselves to this international task, it seemed imperative that more definite international consultation—ultimately collaboration—be effected.

Progress in this direction can be seen in the following:

1. The continued activity of world church organizations involving separate denominations.
2. The continued activity of the World Council of Churches, now in the process of formation.
3. Informal personal contacts among Christian leaders of different countries.
4. The exchange of documents on post-war settlements which have been prepared within separate countries (United Nations and Axis Powers).
5. International conferences, such as the international round table of Christian leaders at Princeton in July of this year where representatives from 12 countries were in attendance.
6. The effort to arrive at a formulation which may be commonly endorsed by Christians of all countries. The statement of political propositions (6 pillars of peace) was formulated by the Commission on a Just and Durable Peace. It was accepted by the Princeton round table as indicative of what people in all countries should study, understand, and personally accept and seek to have accepted by their governments. Further, it was given substantial endorsement by 14 Christian leaders in England, including the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, and the Moderator of the Church of Scotland. It has found its way into many different lands. For example, it is currently being used for study purposes in China, Australia, and New Zealand.

IV. The movement is proceeding with an attack from the top down; that is, it is attempting to establish and to maintain effective contacts with governmental leaders.

In a measure, this attack from the top down represents an immediate or short-range procedure. It is highly important that governments should formulate a post-war policy which will permit the right kind of a start. Christian leaders recognize that governmental officials will determine the provisions of a peace treaty and the political and economic structures by which the nations of the world will be related to each other. Consequently, they are seeking to establish effective contacts with governmental representatives. In fashioning their procedures, especially in this country, they are preserving inviolate the principle of the separation of church and state. Fundamentally, they are making their testimony to a group of individuals in whose hands rests the power to order life among the nations of the world. In making this testimony, they are seeking to give to governmental leaders the benefit of Christian insights and judgments. The procedure here followed involves:

1. Submission to the government of ethical principles and of the political propositions derived therefrom.
2. Personal relations between Christian leaders and governmental officials, established through informal contacts and through the activity of permanent collaborators from the churches with the State Department.

V. The movement is proceeding with an attack from the bottom up; that is, it is seeking to enlighten and to strengthen the consciences of Christians in all walks of life, so that they will assume a responsible part as Christian citizens.

This approach involves education of the masses of people. It has both short range and long range implications. Public opinion is immediately needed as an impetus to the right decisions which governments must now make. As public opinion is developed in this and other countries, through a far-reaching and somewhat correlated program of education, it will continuingly serve as a means of support upon which a developing world order can count.

Thousands of parishes and communities in this country have been organizing themselves for study and action. * * * Be it noted that, in these procedures, church leaders are taking the initiative to enlighten and to strengthen the consciences of individuals so that Christians may fulfill their function as citizens—citizens of our own land, but ultimately citizens of the world.

Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 24, 1944

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Chicago Daily Times entitled "The People Approve Lend-Lease":

THE PEOPLE APPROVE LEND-LEASE

The people of this country overwhelmingly approve the lend-lease program. This is the meaning of the vote of the House for extending the life of lend-lease another year, as requested by the administration. Despite all the loud and constant criticism directed at lend-lease from the beginning, only 21 Members of the House voted against the program. The votes to continue totaled 334. Although all the dissenting 21 are Republicans, the vote to continue was really a nonpartisan expression of approval. And that, in our opinion, is in accord with the sentiment of the country from the outset of the program. On issues like this, our Congressmen usually know the people's attitude.

Lend-lease was a big factor in keeping England from going down when it looked as if that calamity might follow the fall of France, Lend-Lease has shipped needed materials to China, to be used against the Japs. Tremendous quantities of tanks, planes, ammunition, and food have reached Russia through lend-lease. The Russians have acknowledged the great debt they owe to lend-lease in their successes over the German invaders. Those successes are lend-lease victories to a big extent.

History will record that lend-lease was a big factor in upsetting Hitler's idea that he could polish off Russia without being afraid that England or the United States could get into shape to do what we are doing to him now. The people understand this, and Congress has reflected that understanding, the howling of the irreconcilables notwithstanding.

Letter From Minister of Switzerland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, on March 3 I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD three articles from the New York Post dealing with the Bank of International Settlements and other related questions. I am in receipt of a letter from the Honorable Charles Bruggmann, the Minister of Switzerland, in which he corrects certain statements made in one of those articles. I am, of course, very glad to insert the Minister's letter into the RECORD in accordance with his request.

LEGATION OF SWITZERLAND,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1944.

The Honorable JERRY VOORHIS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VOORHIS: I refer to our recent conversation when I had the pleasure of drawing your attention to different incorrect statements made by Tabitha Petran about Swiss banking concerns in her article in the New York Post, published on February 4 under the caption "Schacht Is Nazis' Dove of Peace." Among other articles, this one was included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1944, on page A1068.

Above all, I wanted to inform you that the Swiss Banker Rudolf Ernst, Jr., entered the United States in March 1940 and left this country again in December 1941. He came here as a representative of the Union Bank of Switzerland and has not returned to this country. Neither he nor his father has any connections with the Swiss Bank Corporation (not banking corporation), the two banks being competitors.

I should appreciate the courtesy if you would insert also this letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Sincerely yours,

C. BRUGGMANN,
Minister of Switzerland.

Leadership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on leadership delivered by Col. William H. Neblett, A. C., to officers of the Quartermaster School at Camp Lee, Va., on April 11, 1944. I have obtained from the Government Printing Office an estimate which indicates that the cost of printing the address will be $114.40.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Leadership has been and will continue to be a subject of much discussion during your entire military service. Because leadership when it occurs in an officer, is the most priceless possession of our Army, all of us strive continually to improve our qualities as leaders. My purpose is to bring to each officer here something that may help attain the common objective we seek—perfection in the exercise of the powers of command.

You are still with us so you probably have mastered satisfactorily all technical and tactical training the Army dispenses at its schools and training centers; but that is not enough to make you leaders. You must know how to lead units in battle. When I say units, I include all organizations from company to Army, for the higher commands are open to you in proportion to your demonstrated capacity for combat leadership.

I knew personally most of the officers of the high command in the First World War and I am acquainted with many of them in this one. The conclusions I draw are from observation of them as leaders and from my own personal experience in both world wars.

LEADERSHIP DEFINED

Although many definitions of a leader have been given, they are for the most part vague and uncertain, usually leaving an audience in complete confusion as to what the speaker intended to convey—a confusion no greater than the uncertainty of the speaker as to what the subject comprises. One reason for that state of mind common to both speaker and audience is that he and each of his listeners have their own ideal of what a leader should be; another reason is the tendency of the speaker to build his definition on jargon gleaned from garrison routine and peacetime directives not applicable to war. I believe that the ideal leader in war is the man who gains and holds the confidence of his subordinates and keeps the faith with his superiors.

If I should give you nothing more than a general definition of leadership, then my talk would not be worth while. Victory is our objective in this war, so I shall try to show you that we shall gain victory when we, as leaders dealing with our subordinates and carrying out the orders of our superiors, apply to the task of attaining the objective ordinary, everyday, common-sense business principles tempered with those mutual courtesies and sympathetic considerations we extend to each other in our homes and in our daily work.

A DEMOCRATIC CITIZENS' ARMY

A recent War Department pamphlet declares in effect that we are a democratic Army. That conclusion is probably based on the well-known fact that over 97 percent of our Army—officers and men—have come from civil life. They have been told from infancy that war is a sorry business to be avoided at all costs, and that war is not to be engaged in by our democratic Government unless the provocation requires the defense of our country against an aggressor who, like Japan, forced war upon us by its foul and deceitful attacks on Pearl Harbor and the Philippines. The War Department has wisely established services for the purpose of bringing to this overwhelming group in our Army indoctrination in the ways of a soldier and in the process to show him the reasons for which we fight and the objectives sought in victory.

WHY WE FIGHT

I believe that most of you will go along with me in feeling that all of the purposes for which we are fighting this war and the objectives to be gained, when we have won it, have been summed up by our Commander in Chief in his war-progress report to Congress of September 17, 1943, in which he said: "But there is one thing I want to make perfectly clear: When Hitler and the Nazis go out, the Prussian military clique must go with them. The war-breeding gangs of militarists must be routed out of Germany—and out of Japan—if we are to have a real assurance of future peace."

That is an easily understandable and definite policy for which we fight this war. It is acceptable to the 97 percent citizen component of the Army who feel that they are in the war for the purpose of bringing it to an early conclusion so that they may return to their homes and civilian pursuits.

Most of us have no ambition whatever for a career as a professional soldier. A speedy victory and an early return home are the uppermost thoughts in the minds of us all. We have little present interest in plans for after-war effort, or in the kind of military establishment we will then maintain. We are willing to leave those things to our Government, in which we will have our share when the war is over.

If, after hearing that declaration of policy by the President, there are still some of us who are unconvinced of the intention and purpose of our military leaders, now and hereafter, in gaining the objectives to be secured by victory, then those of us who are still in doubt should remember that the President's statement of principles for which we are fighting the war is in accord with our long-cherished theory of democratic government which we, the people, will be likely to continue to practice.

LEADERSHIP AND DISCIPLINE SYNONYMOUS

That great group of civilians in our army realizes that the hard circumstances of battle require certain disciplinary measures between men and officers, reflected in military courtesies and respect they tender each other. Discipline of your subordinates will be easy and the distinctions between higher and lower ranks will be accepted with enthusiasm, if all of us will remember to apply it in accord with an order of Gen. George Washington issued in July 1776 and a speech made 103 years later by Maj. Gen. John M. Schofield, then superintendent of the Military Academy, to the cadets of that school. They established a principle long adhered to in the Army that discipline is to be administered without strong language or harsh action.

GENERAL ORDER ISSUED BY GEN. GEORGE WASHINGTON IN NEW YORK, JULY 1776

"The general is sorry to be informed that the foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing, a vice heretofore little known in an American Army, is growing into fashion. He hopes the officers will, by example as well as influence, endeavor to check it, and that both they and the men will reflect, that we can have little hope of the blessing of Heaven on our arms, if we insult it by our impiety and folly. Added to this, it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense and character detests and despises it.

G. WASHINGTON."

AN ADDRESS TO WEST POINT CADETS ON AUGUST 11, 1879, BY MAJ. GEN. JOHN M. SCHOFIELD, SUPERINTENDENT OF CADETS

"The discipline which makes the soldiers of a free country reliable in battle is not to be gained by harsh or tyrannical treatment.

"On the contrary, such treatment is far more likely to destroy than to make an army. It is possible to impart instruction and give commands in such manner and in such tone of voice as to inspire in the soldier no feeling of resentment but an intense desire to obey, while the opposite manner and tone of voice cannot fail to excite strong resentment and a desire to disobey.

"The one mode or the other of dealing with subordinates springs from a corresponding feeling in the breast of the commander.

"He who feels the respect which is due to others cannot fail to inspire in them regard for himself, while he who feels, and hence manifests, disrespect toward others, especially his inferiors, cannot fail to inspire hatred against himself."

FAVORITISM OUTMODED

When we exercise the powers and privileges given us as officers in this democratic army of ours, we must remember that our subordinates have come to us schooled in the system applied in civil life of choosing our own leaders. In the Army, they are chosen for us through a system over which we have no control. Our subordinates are bound to feel that many mistakes have been made in officers assigned to command them, probably more even than they would have made, if they had chosen them. If officers without the qualities of leadership happen to be assigned to a unit which you command, a true index of your character as a leader will be evidenced by your ruthless relief of them. In fairness to your subordinates, you must apply that ruthlessness in the relief of officers who do not exhibit the qualities of leadership, no matter what their scholastic attainments are, or political, military, or business ancestry may be. This means that all inefficients among us, from the lowest to the highest, must be eliminated. There must be neither group nor individual favoritism.

An officer should deal with his subordinates as individuals. Elimination accomplished by regulation or directive based upon arbitrarily selected facts applicable to some members of a given group will shake the confidence of remaining members of that group. No American officer can be made to believe that, because he is a member of a group with a different military background from another group, he deteriorates more rapidly than those of the other group. He does see that such action is wholly inconsistent with declared War Department policy, which proposes to condition the thinking of our soldiers to realize that our democratic Army is fighting the war to defend our institutions against the encroachments of other incompatible forms of government.

BELIEF IN SECURITY OF OUR INSTITUTIONS

An American soldier believes that he is secure in the rights and privileges given him by the Constitution and the laws of our country. He has been taught from childhood that he can rely upon their protection as long as he conforms to the established order. That view has not been changed by bringing him into the Army. Any attempt to upset that view by regulation or directive weakens his confidence in his leaders and makes him question whether or not he and his fellows will ever regain the rights they relinquished in transition from civilian to soldier.

THE IDEAL OFFICER—A BATTLE SOLDIER

These considerations apply to all grades of the Army from top to bottom. They are easily applied to most men of good character and reasonable intelligence who have become technically perfect in their arm. Such men will make good battle leaders. No other leadership is of value in war. The finest instructor, the most entertaining speaker may be the poorest battle leader. In this regard we have probably overdone the schools at the expense of field training or actual assignment to combat zones.

There has been too much repetition of courses which tend only to a general education. It is gratifying to read that Maj. Gen. James A. Ulio, The Adjutant General, in an article published in the American magazine of April 1944, says, "Too much theoretical education may rob a man of his qualities of leadership."

LEADERSHIP AFFIRMATIVE—NOT NEGATIVE

Your men will not judge you after you reach the battle line by what you have said or even done in peacetime routine. They will peg you by what you do in combat. Negative effort is worthless. Every act must be affirmative.

There are a few "don'ts" that may be necessary during the training period as a part of garrison routine, but none of them will be used by the successful battle leader.

I shall divide leadership into two parts—the training and battle stages. In the training period the only negative plan I offer you is, "Don't use the accepted 'don'ts.'" I have already said that there are no "don'ts" usable in battle. You cannot, by application to the citizen soldier of the usual standards of peacetime garrison routine, convince him of your ability to lead him in battle.

FEARS OVERCOME

Our Commander in Chief has said that "We have nothing to fear but fear." If that be true, as we all know it is, then it is evident that in battle the fighting qualities of your men will be raised in proportion to the fears you have removed from them during training. Technical and tactical employment in training is simple. The real fighting spirit of your unit will be dependent upon your example in battle. You will have under you, as we have already said, soldiers who are made up almost entirely from civilians. It is they that you must understand, if you would succeed. The group is sensitive; it realizes its importance; it must be made happy in its work by continual encouragement to acquire a combat excellence superior to that of the enemy.

Education in the duties of a combat soldier is the best way to train a fighter. Guardhouse discipline so often resorted to should never be used for mischievous or minor infractions of duty. There are some incorrigibles, of course, but they will be so rare in the unit of a competent commander that their number will be insignificant. The use of guardhouse discipline engenders fear of punishment in the hearts of your men incompatible with the fighting spirit upon which victory depends.

UNIT COMBAT TRAINING

The best way to exercise leadership in the training period is found in unit combat training—unit exercises of the sort that keep every officer and man under you busy doing something which he knows will help bring the end of the war nearer. Good morale is an incident to such employment of your officers and men. The judgment of your troops will be good. No amount of exhortation, provision for their comfort and entertainment, or garrison routine made attractive will, in my belief, be accepted by your soldiers as a substitute for unit combat training upon weapons superior to those of the enemy.

Your subordinates will correctly analyze the relative importance to war effort of what you give them to do in training. You can, however, innocently make it possible for the morale of your subordinates to become high for form and showmanship of everyday garrison life, but so poor for battle that they may resent their relief from camp homes and their assignment to combat duties for which the garrison training you have given them may not have fully prepared them. There are now existing circumstances under which our soldiers may adapt themselves to easy garrison life. If they are held in garrisons too long they may become so fond of camp life that they could lose their desire for battle. Easy living, where the main duties are form and showmanship, is incompatible with the fighting spirit. The prime thought of a battle leader is ever to toughen his men for combat.

KNOW YOUR MEN

Unit training is stressed because one of the most distracting of all fears in the heart of a soldier is that of reorganization on a transfer that takes him out of his unit and separates him from the friends he has made. No man will fight well at the side of a stranger. There is no sentiment so strong in battle as mutual support of a friend and confidence in the help of a buddy by your side. If this is true among the men themselves, how much more important it is for the officers to know the men in their commands. Quoting again from General Ulio's article, "An officer cannot be a stranger to his men."

In an organization commanded by me at the battlefront or being staged to go there, any company officer would be instantly relieved, if there was one man in his unit whom he did not know personally by name. An American soldier will not follow a company officer in battle who knows so little about him that he hasn't taken the trouble to learn his name and can only give him commands by calling him "you" or "soldier."

FIGHTERS WIN BATTLES

The Army has come to the correct conclusion that wars are won by fighting. The high command is rapidly taking out of posts, camps, and stations all officers and men who have been for some time engaged there in training efforts devoted largely to the softening process of garrison routine. It is felt that the move will reach the desired end when pursued far enough to make every man a combat soldier and when all of the personnel of the Army have been trained and incorporated into self-reliant, self-contained units, able to perform their missions without help from other forces. In battle there is no reason to expect help from other units. They will have their battle problems too. The long-sought-after secret of the brilliant Russian successes against the so-called "invincible" Germany Army is found in unit combat training for battle effort, where every man, no matter what his duties, is first a fighter.

YOUR RESPONSIBILITY

We, as leaders of the Army, should know what weapons are required to make it possible for us to accomplish our missions. We should insist that we get them. It is better to be relieved for insistence on armament that will protect your men than to be forever disgraced in your own mind for having lost your unit because of the lack of proper protection that would have been gained from training and arming your men with effective weapons. You are advised to insist upon such armament and training, because if you do you are likely to get what you need. Those who do so insist are the leaders who, as commanders of victorious units, will bring the war to a successful conclusion.

You are advised to be always on the alert for new weapons and diligent in the search for ways of improving your battle tactics and technique. They are undergoing rapid and continuous changes. The principal weapons of today will probably be obsolete within a year. Superior ability to destroy the enemy's armies will hasten victory. Your contributions to better and quicker methods of the destruction of the enemy will bring the end of the war nearer. You are assured that the higher command will give effect to your suggestions when good and will even consider your criticisms when constructive.

The campaign in Italy seems to prove that reliance on the conventional weapons of today may result in the stalemate of tomorrow. Victory will be an incident to superiority of weapons and their improved tactical use. If you have an idea that you believe will improve the fighting qualities of your men, but fail to present it because of fear of unfavorable reactions upon you or your Army career, then you have put personal ambitions before duty and you lack the basic qualifications of a leader. Sacrifice of everything personal to the cause as reflected in your acts for the good of your subordinates is the true index of a battle leader.

FEAR OF REVERSES DISPELLED

There have been reverses in this war and there probably will be many more and some disasters before victory is won; but if you have a true conception of your duties as a leader and your men have confidence in you, such things will have no effect upon the fighting qualities of your subordinates. If they believe that you know what you are doing, are certain that their weapons are superior or equal to those of the enemy, yours will be the unit which will succeed when it faces the enemy.

WEAKNESSES REMOVED

Lieutenant General Somervell says in his latest report to the Secretary of War that information from the various battle fronts indicated: "A major weakness of supply troops was their defense against low-flying aircraft." You who are commanders of supply troops will have to correct that weakness in your units or they will be destroyed. There is no such thing as success in battle of a unit so long as it has a major weakness.

STRONG LEADERS

No officer, from the highest to the lowest, can balance the equation of leadership unless he fits the definition of a leader, which means the man out in front—a person to follow. He cannot succeed as a dispatcher. The right and power to lead comes from within the soul of an officer. If an officer feels that he is too old or that he is incapacitated physically or nervously for the position at the head of his troops, then he should be taken at his own estimate of himself, no matter what his rank, and retired from participation both in training and in battle.

Confessed weaknesses in a commander are both contagious and infectious. If a unit becomes contaminated with the influence of a weak leader, its battle efficiency is gone. Confidence of the men in the physical strength and mental willingness of their commanders to go along with them in battle is the foundation upon which a fighting army is built. That confidence will go to the officer who is out in front where his troops can see him. The example in battle set by a commander is the test of his ability to lead.

AMBITIONS SACRIFICED TO THE CAUSE

There is one "don't" that I wish to emphasize. It is not for application to your subordinates, but for you alone, and it must come from the heart of every leader, if he would hold the confidence of his men and the respect of his superiors. Never allow your hope of personal safety or your ambition for advancement to influence any act of yours, even though you are able to conceal such base sentiment from your subordinates. Once you contract "promotion itch" and become T/O conscious, you have already put personal advancement ahead of duty to your men upon whom you could call to make the supreme sacrifice that you might realize your ambitions. Your men must know that you will be the first to assume the risks you order them to take. The sacrifices you must make in battle cannot be gaged by those of another leader, in a corresponding command on a mission similar to your own, is willing to accept. Carry with you in battle the words of General Lee: "In war there can be no equality of sacrifice."

The Office of Price Administration Cooperating With Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting herewith the text of the radio talk by Mr. Chester Bowles, O. P. A. Administrator, and Mr. Howard H. Williamson, O. P. A. farm adviser, which was delivered recently:

Hello, everybody; for some time I've been anxious to talk to you about the relationship between our farmers and O. P. A. price controls. Right now's a good time to do it, because Howard Williamson, our O. P. A. farm adviser, is just back from a trip all across the country talking to farmers about their problems.

Howard is here on the program with me right now and in a few minutes I will ask him some questions.

But first of all I'd like to remind all of you that the problems which our farmers have faced in the past belong to all of us. The economic distress which so many of our farmers faced after the last war simply must not be repeated. Our country can never be wholly prosperous and economically secure after the war unless all of us are secure—our farmers as well as our businessmen and city workers.

Our farmers have always worked hard to provide us with our food. They deserve a good price for their efforts—not only now under war conditions, but permanently—as an essential part of our peacetime economy.

Today, under our O. P. A. price controls, our American farmers are breaking all records for food production. And today, under O. P. A. price controls, the Department of Agriculture tells me that the average farm income, after all expenses, is also at an all-time high—about 282 percent over the 1935–39 average. Remember, please, I didn't say all farmers. I said the average farmer, lumping together our hog growers, cattle raisers, poultry growers, corn, wheat, cotton, and vegetable farmers. Some farmers are, of course, doing less well than the average.

Our farmers have a very definite stake in effective price control as a protection of the balance between what they get for their crops and what they have to pay out.

They have an equally great stake in O. P. A. price controls as a protection against the same cruel collapse of their farm prices which followed the last war. For the dangers of deflation after the war are just as great as the dangers of inflation during the war.

The collapse in prices after World War No. 1 hit our American farmers harder than any other group. The depression, which for the rest of us, lasted 2 or 3 years, lasted 20 long years for our farmers. It is our job in the O. P. A. to help prevent any repetition of that after this war. And we at O. P. A. sincerely view our present price controls—and our subsidies—as the surest possible safeguard against such a post-war farm collapse.

Now, some farmers have been critical of O. P. A. Some of this criticism has been our own fault.

For some time we have been working closely with every kind of business through over 300 industry advisory committees. But when I came to the O. P. A. in Washington last summer, we had no such give-and-take relationship with farmers on price regulations affecting them.

To correct this—to develop a closer understanding between the O. P. A. and all kinds of farmers in all parts of the country—I called in Howard H. Williamson, from Texas, last November, and appointed him as my farm adviser. Howard had been director of extension services for the Texas A. and M. College. He had done this extension work ever since he was graduated from there 32 years ago—in addition to running his own farm.

We had many long talks together, and Howard agreed with me that something should be done to bring the farmers and the O P. A. closer together. His idea was to bring this about through farm advisory committees working closely with our various O. P. A. district offices. I agreed, and for the past several weeks Howard has been on a trip through the country helping to get these committees organized and our plan under way. He got back to Washington only 2 days ago.

He's here with me now to give a report on how the plan is working out and what the farmers think of it.

First, Howard, I think it's important that people know you're a real farmer and not just somebody with a lot of theories about farming in general. Tell us about that farm of yours down in Texas.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, if farming makes a farmer, I am one. I started out rather young, traveling south down cotton rows with my hands wrapped around the north end of a hoe handle. At present, I operate on a few hundred acres on Bedias Creek in Grimes County, Tex.—principally livestock farming and some feed growing. My little bunch of livestock consists of whiteface cattle, Angora goats, sheep, and this past year, some hogs. In the past I have engaged in cotton growing and have had some little experience in poultry and dairy business. I am what would be classed in my section as a small farmer but you don't have to be a very big farmer to know what farm problems are, especially during the war period when there are shortages of farm labor, farm machinery, and an abundance of regulations which, of course, can't be avoided in times like the present.

Mr. BOWLES. Tell me, how did you get along with your farm operations last year?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Pretty well, with the exception of my venture into the hog business. That was my 1943 mistake. I got caught like hundreds of others—more hogs than feed. My feed gave out and my acorns washed away. I am now trying to get my hogs finished with high-priced grain so as to get the floor price. I am not sure I will make it, but I will confess it was my own idea in the first place. I understand Judge Marvin Jones, Food Administrator, is recommending some reduction in the 1944 pig crop. I think, for one, I will give him my full cooperation unless I can produce more feed than I did last year.

Mr. BOWLES. You have just made a trip through the country, talking to farmers and farm leaders first-hand. What territory did you cover, Howard?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I attended a State-wide meeting of farmers in Rhode Island and conferences in the Southwest, Middle West, and the Pacific coast. At Dallas, I attended a six-State conference of leading farmers, representatives of farm organizations, and others interested in agriculture. This conference was called and conducted under the leadership of Mr. Maxwell McCullough, regional administrator, region V. It was a very fine conference.

Mr. BOWLES. What are some of the things you found farmers and farm leaders thinking about?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, as you know, Mr. Bowles, farmers never hesitate to give expression to their thinking. They are courteous but frank. I did not keep a pencilled memorandum of comments, but I can give you a general interpretation of some of their thinking as I understood them. First of all, they want price stabilization and rationing to succeed and they want to help all they can. They don't like regulations any better than anyone else, neither do they like war and the many other things we have to do in war periods. Their attitude in general is that we have a tough war to win and it is going to take sacrifice and hard fighting. They want to get on with the job and do what is necessary but not wear themselves down doing unnecessary things.

Mr. BOWLES. What about suggestions? Do they have any for O. P. A.?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes; the group of farmers and farm leaders from the six States that met in Dallas recommended to the 13 district O. P. A. directors that they arrange for a conference of farmers and farm leaders in their respective districts and give consideration to the creation of a district agricultural advisory committee. This committee would work with the district O. P. A. director on general farm problems affected by O. P. A. Such committees have already been created in several of the O. P. A. districts in various other sections of the country.

Mr. BOWLES. Did they have any suggestions for immediate consideration?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Not in a formal way, but they certainly hinted at several. One was that we should do everything possible to eliminate unnecessary delays in getting out rules and regulations and that they be well in advance of the season's needs. Of course, they understand it takes some time to go through with procedures in getting rules and regulations prepared and released but they want us to make it as speedy as possible. Another thing about which they were very polite was in the suggestion that, in the preparation of regulations, etc., they be put in such language or at least explained in a way that people other than lawyers can understand them. They appreciate the fact that rules and regulations must stand up from a legal point of view but it helps when the laymen can understand them and their application. They are also interested in knowing to what extent producers participate in conferences, when considerations are given to price ceilings, and regulations dealing with raw or processed farm products.

Mr. BOWLES. They are absolutely correct on all counts. You know—and we want farm people to know—that we are striving to do everything possible to prevent delays and keep programs and regulations simplified. Also, it is O. P. A.'s policy to have producer representatives on all industry councils in which farm products are involved. But now—how do the farmers feel about price control, Howard?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, I think the experience of one farmer out West pretty well answers that question, Mr. Bowles. He has about 2,000 steers, which means he uses several hundred bushels of corn a day to feed them.

A while back the rumor got started that the ceiling on corn was going up 10 cents—so right away the flow of corn stopped right in its tracks in the hope of the higher price for it. And meantime, this fellow's steers went into a tailspin. That was only a rumor, mind you, so you can imagine what would happen if there was an official report that price ceilings would go off everything tomorrow. As that Missouri farmer put it to me the other day, "We farmers not only want prices fixed; we want prices to stay fixed so we can know where we stand."

That seems to be the general attitude of the farmers I have been talking with on this trip. They want price control and they want to help all they can to keep it.

Mr. BOWLES. Our farm problem as we look ahead is to hold good prices for farmers after the war. And to insure that we mustn't let our price levels go any higher now or we'll get in trouble later. Unless we hold the general level of prices where they are we'll have to face another farm depression.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Most people who were in the farming game 25 years ago remember the seriousness of that post-war depression. And today farmers well understand that in general agriculture is in a relatively better position than it has been in the past century and they are, of course, interested in its staying that way.

Mr. BOWLES. Keeping it that way is one important objective of the price stabilization program today. That is why we at O. P. A. are anxious to work as closely as possible with farmers.

How many farm committees have you got organized so far?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am not planning to personally organize any. Washington is too far from farm people. However, I am suggesting, with a little urge to it, that the eight regional O. P. A. administrators promote through their district O. P. A. administrative set-up, district conferences as recommended by the farmers' group in Dallas, with the view of creating, where needed, a district advisory committee. The farmers and farm leaders and the district O. P. A. director in each district know the best approach and means of working together. To keep our O. P. A. programs geared to the problems of the farm, there must be good understanding on our part of the wartime problems farmers are encountering. And at the same time, farmers need to know some of the problems that you, Mr. Bowles, and your O. P. A. associates encounter in administering such a gigantic program of price stabilization and rationing for 130,000,000 people.

Mr. BOWLES. Well, as I told you last fall, Howard, we want and need the benefit of the thinking and counsel of farm people on those phases of our O. P. A. program that relate to farming. It is extremely important that we exchange suggestions and counsel in a well-thought-out and organized manner. And I believe your plan for local farm advisory committees throughout the country is the answer. In that way, the O. P. A. and the farmers can work together closely and constantly as a team.

The job of controlling prices is a big one. As I have said before, it cannot be done wholly for any group by us at O. P. A. in Washington. It must be done by all groups in all communities. Only through understanding and cooperation can we succeed in our vital fight against skyrocketing prices now—and the deflation which would inevitably follow after the war.

Thank you, Howard, for your comments and observations. And I would like to take this means of congratulating the many millions of farm men and women and the farm youth of America on the great food-production job you are doing. You have, and are now doing, a big and important war job with many handicaps. O. P. A. wants to be as helpful as possible.

And now, good-bye to you all until next week.

Necessity for National War Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a column by Walter Lippmann published in this morning's Washington Post relating to the necessity for a national war service act.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

A MILITARY NECESSITY

As for guessing when the invasion will start and when the war will end, we had better ask ourselves whether we are sitting in the grandstands laying our bets and waiting for the whistle to blow. General Eisenhower and his staff will decide when to invade. But the American civilian population have a very big part to play in deciding when the war will end.

In its fundamentals the question is whether Congress and the people take the view that Eisenhower's men must win, lose, or draw with the forces they now have. Undoubtedly they are great forces. But if they are a fixed quantity, then the enemy has everything to gain by taking every risk, fighting to the death at every pill box and every street corner from the coast of Europe to Berlin. For if he knows that Eisenhower's force is just so big and no bigger, and that there is not much else behind it, the enemy has every reason to fight on and to make us pay with the blood of our men for every foot of the soil of Europe.

The Germans are encircled and are cornered, but they still have hope. A fixed force, however formidable, is worth resisting on the great chance that if some part of the plan goes wrong we shall lack the final punch to deliver the knock-out blow. Many a man has gotten out of a hopeless fight by just managing to hang on and not to get knocked out because the other fellow did not have that last punch.

This is the tremendous danger which the invasion forces face: That they will come ashore, that they will move in, as in Italy, and then lack the reserves to push through to victory. If that happens this summer, we might well face a bloody stalemate, and the need to try it all over again next season, and with every plan we have made in Europe and in the Pacific thrown off schedule.

It is imperative, therefore, that once the invasion is launched it should have behind it such reserves that the longer the enemy resists the greater will be the forces that come piling up against him. That will break him. He may withstand the first blow. But if the second is harder, not softer than the first, and the third harder than the second, he will have nothing left to fight for. The fury of the attack must mount, and when it is indisputable to the German Army, who will know all the essential facts, that the attacks are on an ascending scale of violence and power, they will know that resistance is mere suicide. Whole armies and nations do not commit suicide.

This is the reason why our responsible military leaders are asking the American civilian population to back them up with a national war service act. There is no other way to tell our troops and to make it clear to the enemy that when the invasion begins it can never be stopped. We are simply not doing our duty if we leave matters where they now are, saying to our men and to our enemy that we shall fight it out with limited forces.

It is as clear as daylight that the way to shorten the war decisively and conclusively is to mobilize the civilian population, men and women, so that there can be no question in anyone's mind that the attack has behind it waves upon waves of men and equipment. We are a people more used to business than to war. An example from business will illustrate the point: There is a run on a bank, the depositors are drawing down the reserves. How do you stop the run? By feeding into the bank a new hundred dollars for every hundred dollars the depositors draw out? Not at all. You put all the resources of all the banks behind the threatened bank. The moment that is done the depositors quit drawing on the reserves, the run stops, the panic is over. The fact that the reserves are unlimited means that they do not have to be drawn upon.

With the tremendous operations that are now preparing in Europe and also in the Pacific, no American civilian has the right to say to our military leader that he can have the IV–F's but that is all. The civilians who say that—be they officials of the Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, or of the Congress of the United States—are, in a matter of life and death for hundreds of thousands of Americans, in a matter of supreme importance to the Nation, putting their personal views ahead of the judgment of the commanders who must conduct the battles. Suppose these civilians who know little of war, are wrong. Just think what we shall carry with us upon our consciences for the rest of our lives if, when we were called upon to support the armies, we refused.

No man will ever regret that in this fateful hour he did too much. He will never be forgiven if he does not do enough.

The President is returning soon. His duty is manifest. He is committed to a National War Service Act. The fact is, however, that he has not fulfilled his commitment. In his message of last January he pledged it with reservations and qualifications which convinced Congress that he was not serious about it. His inaction and silence have confirmed that conviction. Yet he is President and he is Commander in Chief, and if the armed forces need the backing of this act, they need it regardless of the tax bill or any of his other qualifications. We can muddle through on the home front if we win the war decisively and promptly. If we do not win the war, the problem of the home front will be insoluble anyway.

The President cannot wait any longer to take this matter in hand, and to bring it before Congress and the country, not as his personal view, but as a demand, backed by the evidence and convictions of our military leaders. If our people really see that this act is a military necessity, they will not fail.

The act should be placed on the statute books at once to put an end to the shame that only men who are caught in the draft have an obligation to serve. Who said that only young men, and not young women, only men of a certain kind and not all men and women, may be called upon when the Nation needs them?

Why, for example, should a IV-F, or a discharged soldier who may be physically far less fit than a healthy woman without family cares, or a middle-aged man who can do a day's work, be singled out and told he has a special obligation to his country?

More is needed from the President than a resolute and explicit call for enactment of this law. Congress and the country would take a quite different view of the matter if the President acted to convince them that he meant to have the law seriously and competently administered. For they are sick at heart over the manpower muddle.

The fact is that there is no public confidence in those who ought to administer this law. It is a task for the Director of Manpower and the Secretary of Labor. There is not sufficient confidence in Mr. McNutt's lucidity of mind or in his political courage. As for the Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins holds the office, but for handling the essential problems of labor in wartime, she is—and the President knows this well because his actions prove it—unemployable.

He must find someone else to administer this act. When he does he will be well on his way to getting the act.

Facts About the Author of Under Cover

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Uncovering Under Cover: The Real Facts About the Smear Book's Odd Author" written by John T. Flynn and published in the Washington Times-Herald of April 23, 1944. As everyone knows, John T. Flynn is one of the outstanding publicists of this country.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNCOVERING UNDER COVER—THE REAL FACTS ABOUT THE SMEAR BOOK'S ODD AUTHOR—RIGHT NAME AND FACE ARE EXPOSED

(By John T. Flynn)

Who is the author of that now well-known smear book, Under Cover?

And, having been told on the fly-leaf that it is John Roy Carlson, the next question is—who is John Roy Carlson?

Who is he and where did the smear bund sponsors of this book dig him up?

Well, of course, his name is not John Roy Carlson. That is just a pen name, he explains.

After all, Samuel Clemens had a pen name, he tells us—Mark Twain.

But this chap has had several pen names. He has written in one magazine as Thomas L. Decker, in another as George Paige, in another as John Roy Carlson. Why all the mystery?

Then besides that he has operated as a $25-a-week informer for the Government and as a $40-a-week agent for the smear bund under the name of Pagnanelli. But what is his real name? And who is he?

Why is he the way he is? Someone asked him in a Detroit lecture if his real name was John Roy Carlson. He flared up. "For the love of Pete," he cried out in a burst of impatient candor, "ask something constructive. Of course, my name is not Carlson. My real name is Arthur A. Derounian."

BUT THAT'S NOT HIS REAL NAME EITHER

But that is not his real name either. So what is it? And why does he hide it?

Well, here is his real name: Avedis Boghos Derounian.

He is an Armenian immigrant and, up to the time he got a job as a stool pigeon and informer for the smear bund, he spent most of his time and earned his living working for a small Armenian weekly and taking a very active part in the local quarrels and feuds of the Armenian people.

Now he has blossomed into a flaming American patriot, branding various native Americans of untarnished reputations, loyalty, and eminence as agents of Adolf Hitler.

Mr. Derounian, alias Carlson, alias Paige, alias Decker, alias Pagnanelli, etc., remains, however, a hired hand of the smear bund, a colleague in mud of Walter Winchell.

But though Winchell is his spiritual kinsman, he is not nearly so important in the smear bund's sinister affairs.

Winchell is just their Charlie McCarthy.

This oriental sitting on the other knee is far too significant to be laughed off as Charlie's goofy pal, Mortimer Snerd.

There is no room here to tell all about this queer social and political duck, but at least one episode in his career will help to explain him, as we find him among his own people playing the same role he now plays in the American market. For he is an Armenian, born at Alexandropolis, in Greece. He came to this country in 1921, and his beginnings as a smear artist were among his own people.

BISHOP IS MURDERED ON CHRISTMAS EVE

On Christmas Eve, 1933, Archbishop Tourian, primate of the Armenian Catholic Church in America, was assassinated in his cathedral in New York City. The deed enlivened the first pages of the American newspapers but it shook to its foundations the Armenian colony in America.

Nine men were indicted for the deed, prosecuted by Thomas Dewey, and convicted. Two of them were sentenced to the electric chair. But at the last minute Gov. Herbert Lehman, then Governor of New York, commuted their sentences to life imprisonment because "of unusual circumstances."

What were the unusual circumstances? Perhaps the following facts will clear this up.

Armenia is a small country in southeast Europe that once belonged to the old Turkish Empire but was swallowed during the First World War by Russia.

It is today run by the Communist government under the rule of the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Of course, the Bolsheviks proceeded to destroy religion. They seized churches, unfrocked the priests, drove out many bishops and priests. They jailed others. But as time wore on they changed their tactics.

They saw that it is impossible to kill religion in the hearts of the people by persecuting them. In 1929 Gabrillian, the Armenian commissar, said:

"We are enemies of the church and religion in the cities and towns. We must take measures, but not of force or violence, to emancipate the workers from the influence of the church and religion."

Then he explained that the too-zealous Bolshevik partisans must not seize any more churches. The way to do the job is to go to work on the people directly and kill religion in their minds by propaganda, by keeping religious instruction from the young, by indoctrinating them with atheism, by preventing the ordination of young priests until the church finally comes into the hands of only a handful of old, enfeebled, and easily managed ancients.

The big problem for the commissars, however, was the faithful Armenians outside Russia—in Syria, Constantinople, Greece, France, America. They continued to be devoted to their freedom and religion.

An Armenian patriotic society, the Dashnag (dashnag simply means federation), was kept intact and now, in America at least, includes youth and women's auxiliaries, doing charitable and social work among the Armenians.

To break down opposition to the Soviet abroad the Ogpu—the dreaded secret police of the Bolshevist government—was put to work. Wherever there was a large colony of Armenians, there the secret agents and spies of the Ogpu swarmed. But the Dashnags keep up their fight for an independent Armenian republic.

How the Communists dealt with this problem came to light in a sensational manner in 1931. All this seems a long way from Avedis Boghos Derounian, alias Arthur A. Derounian, alias John Roy Carlson, alias George Paige, alias Thomas L. Decker, alias Pagnanelli, etc. But we will get around to him.

HOW RUSSIA'S OGPU BRIBED ARMENIAN PRIESTS

In 1931 George Agabekov, head of the Russian secret police—the Ogpu—in southeast Europe, including Armenia, broke with Stalin and fled to France. There he wrote a book and told how he had managed things for the Bolshevists.

He told how he had bribed Armenian bishops outside Armenia to act as secret agents for the Ogpu. He gave their names—bishops in Greece, Constantinople, Syria, and other places. This, as we may imagine, produced a sensation among Armenians everywhere. It seemed as if the bottom had dropped out of their church.

They did not know which bishop to trust, which prelate, standing on the altar, was also a secret agent of their great enemy, the Ogpu.

Not long after this a prelate named Bishop Leon Tourian was sent to America as the primate on this continent of the Armenian church. When he came Armenians were suspicious of him.

He had been the Armenian bishop in Manchester, England. While there he was a monthly contributor to an Armenian magazine called Massis, which was a stout defender of Soviet rule in Armenia. That added to the suspicion.

Moreover, they remembered how Agabekov had corrupted their bishops.

A prelate had to get permission from the commissars before they would let him in or out of Armenia and always the Ogpu would contact him and attempt to do business with him.

Often, if the priest was sufficiently ambitious to be a bishop, he would agree to go on the Soviet pay roll as a secret agent of the Ogpu as the price of being a bishop.

All these things produced in the minds of many Armenians a feeling of doubt and suspicion.

Then one day the Armenians were holding a great fair at the Chicago exposition in 1933.

Tourian went as the ranking churchman in America. When he arrived he refused to enter the grounds unless the old flag of Armenia was lowered. That signed his death warrant.

On Christmas Eve, 1933, a few months later, as he was moving up the aisle of his cathedral in New York to celebrate mass, surrounded by acolytes, censer bearers, cross bearers and priests, and a bodyguard, nine men stepped quietly out into the aisle from the adjoining pews and swiftly surrounded him, while one plunged a great knife into his body before the congregation realized what was going on.

This tragic deed produced a violent convulsion in the Armenian colony here. The men who did the deed were members of the Dashnag organization, as were most anti-Communist Armenians.

So the Soviet agents here saw in this incident an excellent opportunity to go to work on the old Dashnag patriots—their bitter enemies—and liquidate them in public opinion.

A wave of denunciation was leveled against the Dashnag organization. They were pictured as the "bloody Dashnags." The impression was created that they were a kind of Armenian edition of the Mafia. It was an attack similar in character and intensity to the smear attack now being carried on by the American smear bund against those who refuse to follow the foreign policy of the administration.

DEROUNIAN TAKES UP HIS FIRST SMEAR JOB

Many Armenians became intimidated lest they be branded as criminals. And who should turn out to be the most industrious and persistent instrument of this campaign of abuse against the anti-Communist Armenians? Who but our young hero of Under Cover, Avedis Boghos Derounian, alias Arthur A. Derounian, alias Carlson, alias Paige, alias Decker, alias Pagnanelli, etc.?

He first shows up publicly—making his debut as a smearer—at the trial of the assassins of Bishop Tourian. He was there as the reporter of an obscure Armenian weekly newspaper, the Armenian Spectator.

Another Armenian newspaper, reporting the trial, described how at one point Derounian became so obstreperous during the cross-examination of witnesses that Judge Corrigan halted the trial and summoned him to his desk for reprimand.

The next year Derounian became the editor of the little paper, the Spectator. There he engaged in a continuous course of extolling the great work of the Bolshevists in the subjugation and rule of his fatherland.

Toward the end of 1935 the Spectator, while he was managing editor, sponsored a delegation of 16 Armenians to Moscow and Armenia to celebrate the conquest of Armenia by the Bolshevists.

CHEERS THE SOVIET CONTROL OF ARMENIA

This delegation was headed by the editor of the paper whom Derounian succeeded in office.

And on the fifteenth anniversary of the taking of Armenia by the Soviet, the delegation arrived in Moscow and was received with great eclat by the peoples' commissars. On this day Derounian's leading editorial was a paean of joy over the Red absorption of Armenia.

And in that applause of his country's swallowing by the Russians, we see a complete picture of the cultural and political and national leanings of this young oriental scribbler.

Of course, I do not know whether he is a Communist.

But what would you think of a Pole who would say that the day the Red armies of Russia flowed over the barriers of his fatherland and destroyed its liberty was a glorious day?

What of a Finn who would make a profession of abusing and berating Finns who objected to Communist conquest of Finland, and who would speak of the day the Red armies take Finland as the most glorious in her history?

NEXT HE WRITES FOR PRORED MAGAZINE

In November 1936 this young Armenian, Derounian, alias Carlson, alias Decker, alias Paige, alias Pagnanelli, turns up again in the magazine Soviet Russia Today, with his name signed to an article giving a glowing description of the wonderful progress of Armenia and the happy lot of the Armenians under the Bolshevists.

The piece is well written, which creates the suspicion that he did not write it.

Moreover, it is an eyewitness description of Soviet Armenia he could not write unless he had visited there.

Did he? If not, why is his name on the article? Who, in this Communist magazine, had authority to sign his name?

This is the young man who is the reputed author of the book Under Cover, which, under the most amazing plugging ever known, has sold over 800,000 copies.

This book uses precisely the same technique that this odd oriental used on his own countrymen—smearing all who do not agree with his employers.

The book pretends to expose a number of subversive groups. But they are all so-called Nazi and Fascist agents. Nowhere does the author ever get around to exposing any Communist groups. Instead, always the beneficiaries of his attacks are pro-Communist groups, as in the case of his campaign against his brother Armenians.

Actually this strange young man presents himself in a sort of double life. He signs himself John Roy Carlson, but admits to his publishers that his name is Arthur A. Derounian, under which name he carries on a campaign of vilification against Americans to the loud hurrahs of the Communist Daily Worker and New Masses.

Then under the name of Avedis Boghos Derounian—a name he was still using only a few months ago—he carries on a similar campaign against Armenians to the delight of the same sheets.

He had worked at his Armenian trade until sometime in 1938. Then he was hired by the Anti-Defamation League as an informer and later by the Friends of Democracy, as they call themselves, in the same noble role. They paid him $40 a week.

As such he went around, dressed like a comic stage Italian, visting people suspected of Fascist or anti-Semitic sympathies, encouraging them to make slurring remarks against the Jews, and then reporting the remarks to his employers as samples of anti-Semitism.

He issued an anti-Semitic sheet of his own composition containing some of the vilest attacks on the Jews I have ever seen to fire people already touched with anti-Semitism with further provocative needling, and then he charged those people with anti-Semitism.

However, his purpose was not so much to expose the thirty or forty authentic anti-Semitic and pro-Fascist groups he names and describes in the book—because practically all of these has been endlessly exposed in other books, in magazines and newspaper articles, by the Dies committee and by the Department of Justice.

The object of the book is to name all these miserable and squalid guilty wretches already convicted or located and then twine their names and guilt in an odious smear around the names of a number of Senators and Representatives and other well-known American citizens who do not follow the Communist line or who do not swallow the global nonsense of the present administration.

THE PEOPLE BACK OF DEROUNIAN TODAY

He was hired, I say, by the "Friends of Democracy" (as they call themselves), which is operated by Rex Stout, a former editor of the New Masses and by Leon M. Birkhead, an ex-preacher from Kansas City. They paid him $40 a week as an informer and guided his footsteps.

Rex Stout boasts that he was in touch constantly with Derounian while he was doing this job and Derounian says Stout was the godfather of the book. Birkhead has said that he was in touch with Derounian practically every day that he was working up his smears.

The book must be taken as the joint product of these three worthies—Stout, Birkhead, and Derounian, alias this and that.

Derounian probably wrote the book himself, since it is an amazingly trashy piece of writing. Stout and Birkhead really know how to write.

Konrad Bercovici, gypsy novelist, had a hand in it. His role was to rewrite it and put it into living English, though it is difficult to believe he actually did so. However, he has a share in the royalties on it. How much these royalties are we can guess—perhaps $300,000.

But, alas, they are probably pretty well tied up by libel suits, of which many have been instituted by outraged victims of the wholesale smear.

So this is Mr. Carlson, author of Under Cover—Avedis Boghos Derounian, alias Arthur A. Derounian, alias John Roy Carlson, alias Thomas L. Paige, alias George Decker, alias Pagnanelli, etc. And of whom more will be heard.

His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, for 84 years, William Cardinal O'Connell, archbishop of Boston and dean of the American Catholic hierarchy, lived a good and full life. Today he lies in state, clad in his full robes of office, in Holy Cross Cathedral. He will be buried on Friday morning, after a Pontifical Mass of Requiem, to be celebrated by the Apostolic Delegate, Most Rev. Amleto Giovanni Cicognani.

Between now and Friday, many thousands of his neighbors and friends will pass through Holy Cross Cathedral to look their last upon the beloved old cardinal. He was a man who not only saw history being made, but who himself helped to make it. He was a militant churchman, unafraid to attack those who offended his strict principles; equally unafraid of the criticism which outspoken honesty always invokes.

Cardinal O'Connell was born among the poor, himself the eleventh child of poor parents, in the mill town of Lowell, Mass. This early contact with poverty—for a New England mill town eighty-odd years ago was a sorry place indeed for the workers—gave the sensitive boy a great compassion for those who struggle under social discrimination; it also gave him a burning determination to better the lot of his unfortunate fellowmen.

This determination drove him onward until, for these past many years, the cardinal has been a powerful force in his locality, and, indeed, throughout America, for the rights of man and the dignity of humanity. His interest in mankind was all-absorbing and universal; he could denounce a rabble rouser and rise to the defense of a non-Catholic minority group with the same vigor which he so stirringly employed to the glory of his church and his God.

There have been many great cardinals in this country: Gibbons, Hayes, and Mundelein, to mention only three. Today only one, Dennis Cardinal Dougherty of Philadelphia, remains in his country. The Pope, it is reported, will make no new appointments to the College of Cardinals until the war is over. The responsibility which lies ahead for the men who will become members of the College of Cardinals in the future is a great one indeed. It is not easy to follow in the footsteps of a man and a churchman of the stature of Cardinal O'Connell. He was statesman and patriot as well as prelate; he possessed not only the courage of his convictions, but, what is rarer still, the courage of his impulses.

When I first heard of the passing of Cardinal O'Connell, a poem came to my mind, and I would like to share a few lines from it with you. It was Francis Thompson's To the Dead Cardinal of Westminster, a tribute to the great Cardinal Manning, who was once kind to the poet:

> I saw thee only once,
> Although thy gentle tones > said soft:
> "Come hither oft."

This was what Cardinal O'Connell said to all who were weary and heavily laden, and many came, and found strength and comfort and courage and peace.

Yesterday on the floor of this House many Members paid tribute to His Eminence, and today the newspapers published the following beautiful messages from our own President Roosevelt, President Quezon, on behalf of the Filipino people, and His Holiness Pope Pius XII:

Following is the text of President Roosevelt's message:

"I am deeply sorrowful to hear of the passing of the venerable figure of Cardinal O'Connell, prelate and prince of the church. With rare gifts of leadership, he served his day and generation with fidelity, steadfastness, and true apostolic zeal. May I, through you, offer to his flock which has lost its shepherd this assurance of my heartfelt sympathy."

MESSAGE FROM QUEZON

President Quezon said: "On behalf of the Filipino people and in my own, may I express, through you to the people of Boston, my sincerest sympathy in the death of His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell. In him the church has lost one of her most illustrious cardinals and New England her beloved father and leader. May our Lord grant him the eternal reward he so richly deserves."

CONDOLENCES OF THE POPE

WASHINGTON, April 24.—Pope Pius XII today sent his condolences on the death of Cardinal O'Connell. A cable received at the apostolic delegation here from Luigi Cardinal Maclione, papal secretary of state, said:

"His Holiness has learned with deepest sorrow of the death of His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell, whose outstanding qualities were ever highly esteemed. He requests me to convey his assurance of prayerful remembrance for the deceased, and also profound sympathy to the bereaved Archdiocese of Boston in the loss of its beloved pastor, imparting to Bishop Cushing, clergy, and faithful the paternal apostolic blessing. The expression of my personal, heartfelt regrets are added to those of His Holiness."

It is difficult to find words adequately to express the sorrow that is in my heart at the passing of this noble person. It was my privilege to have known him since my childhood, and during the years I have always regarded him as a most lovable character and a citizen extraordinary who brought but honored glory to his church and to his city.

It was Dr. Samuel Johnson who said that if one stopped under a doorway with Edmund Burke to escape a shower he would be impressed with the certainty that he had met a kindly man. That was equally true of Cardinal O'Connell. His vigorous and penetrating mind, always at work, gained for him an immense extent and variety of knowledge. He had the learning of a philosopher, and to that learning he added the manners of a gentleman.

Cardinal O'Connell was gifted and blessed above most men of his day and generation, but above all in that simple, childlike faith which was fostered at the knee of his mother, and which survived and grew with all the triumphs of his great career, and carried him onward into the next world with the fervor of a martyr and the certainty of one who knows.

May the Lord deal with him as one who has gained the palm and may his place in the world beyond the grave be even higher and more glorious than that which he won for himself among men.

Political Activities of the C. I. O.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have before me two very brief articles which I wish to make a matter of record in the Appendix of the RECORD. The first is an article entitled "Hillman Rallies Midwest's C. I. O." appearing in the magazine PM, the companion of the Communist Daily Worker of New York, of September 20, 1943. The second is an Associated Press dispatch from Chicago entitled "C. I. O. Actionists Seek Isolationists' Defeat," dated January 24, 1944.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From PM of September 20, 1943]

HILLMAN RALLIES MIDWEST'S C. I. O.

MINNEAPOLIS, September 20.—Several hundred C. I. O. delegates from five Midwest States met here yesterday with Sidney Hillman, head of the national C. I. O. Committee for Political Action, to map a fight against Congressmen who have voted for antilabor legislation.

The delegates came from Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Iowa, and Nebraska, sometimes regarded as the heart of the isolationist belt. Under Hillman's guidance, they took preliminary steps in organizing a regional political action committee which will have headquarters in Minneapolis.

This move follows recent action by the Minnesota C. I. O. looking toward establishment of a State C. I. O. newspaper by next January.

"The present Congress cannot be entrusted with making the peace," Hillman charged.

Representatives of the C. I. O., A. F. of L., and the railroad brotherhoods and Democratic and Farmer-Labor Parties gave a demonstration of political unity at a banquet that followed. Hillman revealed the political action committee plans to work with the Nonpartisan League in North Dakota, home of isolationist Senator GERALD P. NYE, who is up for reelection next year. Senator WILLIAM LANGER, North Dakota, has been asked to be identified with the league.

C. I. O. ACTIONISTS SEEK ISOLATIONISTS' DEFEAT

(By the Associated Press)

CHICAGO, January 24, 1944.—Chairman Sidney Hillman said today the Political Action Committee of the Congress of Industrial Organizations would work to defeat congressional isolationists and to bring out a record vote in the November elections.

Speaking to newsmen at a press conference before a conference with 14 regional directors of the committee from all parts of the Nation, Mr. Hillman said:

"We hope to do our part to retire after-Pearl Harbor isolationists in Congress so that the country will have representatives who represent the will of the people."

Evaluating the Cotton Crop

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very excellent editorial entitled "Evaluating the Cotton Crop," from the State, South Carolina's progressive newspaper, in the issue of April 21.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVALUATING THE COTTON CROP

In evaluating the cotton crop in our national economy the byproducts have not usually carried their due weight.

And specially in this time of war the byproducts of cotton often loom even larger than the lint itself.

Lint cotton is one of the very few things that this war did not catch us short in, thanks to intelligent perseverance against the boll weevil and the other ills that have beset cotton, and even war's great demands are being fully met, and adequate reserves of lint exist.

But cotton is more than a fiber crop—far more.

In 1942 this State's average yield per acre of lint was 294 pounds. Measured against urgent, immediate national need, this lint was rather insignificant when compared with the 89.5 pounds of oil for human consumption that this average acre of cotton produced. That was worth as much to the human race as the lard from three good hogs.

The 252.5 pounds of invaluable high-protein feed in the form of cottonseed meal that came from the average acre of cotton was worth more in producing meat for the human race at this critical hour than a third of that area would have averaged in producing corn, and the cotton also gave, as another byproduct, 125 pounds of hulls for feed or industrial use.

And that is not all. It goes right down there to where the guns of war are booming with 51 pounds of linters for making high explosives.

So there we have it. Against the excellent average yield of 294 pounds of lint cotton per acre in this State in 1942, that same average acre gave 518 pounds of other vital materials that were made from its 546 pounds of seed.

What a crop old King Cotton is! At first only a fiber. But now it is fiber, food, feed, and explosive—a four-way war crop! Where is its equal?

And to get State figures for 1942 we find the following staggering totals came from the 311,000 tons of seed out of that 699,000-bale crop: 51,004 tons of oil; 143,837 tons of meal; 71,219 tons of hulls; 116,936 bales of linters (500 pounds gross each).

Cotton—truly a kingly crop!

S. 1311

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, at the request of Mr. Henry Matt, a member of the Flathead Tribal Council, I am inserting in the RECORD, under unanimous consent, his written objections to S. 1311:

SENATE BILL NO. 1311

OBJECTIONS TO BILL

A proper consideration of Senate bill 1311, introduced May 24, 1943, to remove restrictions on Indian property now held in trust by the United States, and for other purposes, depends on the knowledge of certain basic facts, which should be known and considered.

In 1855 the United States and the Flathead Indians entered into a treaty, which was to last "as long as the sun would shine or water would flow." This treaty recognized the independent national status of the Flathead Indians as a nation. A treaty is a solemn promise between nations that cannot be changed or altered by Congress or law of either nation. It can only be broken or altered by the consent of both. The United States has forgotten this basis of a treaty.

In 1872 a second treaty was put out by the United States changing the first treaty. This treaty seems to have been unsigned by the Indian representative. The purpose of the second treaty, on the part of the United States, was to get back promises of rights and lands and property guaranteed in the original treaty. And the United States by laws and orders has been constantly taking back the promises made in 1855.

The first promise broken was when Chief Arlee was told to move, in 1874. Then Chief Moise was given his order to move in 1881. Chief Charlo received his order to move in 1889. And the tribal members are still receiving orders to curtail their land and privileges.

In 1908, Congressman Dixon, without authority found in any of the treaties with the Flathead, introduced and had passed a bill opening the Flathead Reservation to the white people, which gave the choice of Indian tribal lands to the whites and for which the Indian received nothing. The lands to be retained and held by the Indian were to be in fee and not subject to the white man's tax. This bill goes so far as even to take away the treaty right of tax-free land and will subject the lands of the tribes to taxation.

Another basic fact is, taxation of land is merely another name for rental. If the bill asked the Indians to turn over their land to the Government and the Government would then rent it back to them the thievery in the bill would be apparent. Instead the bill says you can keep your land but you must pay the State a tax for keeping it, and for this great favor we grant you we add another that you will be exempt from taxation for a period of 10 years up to an assessed valuation of $1,000. When one rents land and the tenant does not pay the rent he can be removed from possession. When the State taxes land and the tax or rental is not paid the State takes the land.

The $1,000 exemption would only apply to the extent of $1,000 so if an Indian had a house of $3,000 value it would be taxed to the extra $2,000 and if not paid two-thirds of the house would be sold by the county. This is a clever way to take from the Indian what little has been left to him. The bill is supposed to apply only to the land left in trust, but the next bill would probably tax all Indian lands, trust or no trust. The offer of $1,000 tax exemption is only a bait on the hook, so the Indian—poor fish—will swallow it. The end of the first sentence sounds fine and noble: "The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to forthwith execute and issue such certificates, patents, deeds, or other instruments as may be necessary to vest in said Indian allottees or their heirs, or heirs of heirs of said Indian allottees, unrestricted title in fee to such lands or inherited interests therein." (See Cato Sells, Commissioner, letter of April 17, 1917.)

When this title is vested, taxes begin and the Indian would soon loose his land. Much of this would be, vested land has little value, but it would carry the county tax, which would soon take the land.

The part of the bill authorizing the payment of all Indian moneys held in trust, is to be commended, but if to get this trust money which belongs to the Indian he must first put his property on the tax rolls, the price he pays for his own moneys is too high.

If the author of this bill wants the Indians to get the trust money out of Government control, why not give it to the Indians, without any strings? This trust money which belongs to the Indian tribe is being used often for other purposes than to help the Indians and since the Government has started to first take this money in trust, many an Indian who was entitled to it, died without its benefit.

Another feature that is bad in the bill, is the putting of the Indian property under the State laws and State control. The Indian has paid too dearly for his control by the National Government without adding the burden of the State government, which would be more than he could carry.

The offer of tax exemption on $1,000 assessment for 10 years sounds like giving something to the Indian for nothing. The tax is determined in State assessment, by a portion only of the value exempt, so the Indian would be freed from about $5 a year tax for 10 years or a grant of $50 in tax rebates, after which he is subject to tax sale and forfeiture of his land if he cannot pay up.

The allowance in the aggregate, considering the number of Indians over the half-blood, would be very small in total and a disgraceful finish to the prior treatment of the Flathead Tribe.

The reservation was opened with the promise it would benefit the Indian. The white man came and took up much of the land in what is now Lake County. This county has assessed values of $15,000,000, which is owned by the whites. For this the Indians received little or nothing. The land taken up by the whites in Sanders County shows a value by assessment of some $6,000,000, and the assessment to whites of land in Missoula County taken from the Indians, after the treaty, would be double the value of the counties of Lake and Sanders. This promise of benefit to the Indians, when the reservation was illegally opened, has given the white man title to some $30,000,000 of assessed values which the Indians were told would help them.

From being a prosperous nation, before the opening of their reservation, they have become a poor nation.

Another serious objection to the bill, in its concern to the Flathead Tribe, is that the framer of the bill did not even ask the Flatheads if they wanted the bill and if they were favorable to it. This thing is being put over without their consent.

The Government has planned to take away the Indian customs and language and now what little is left of the property covered by treaty.

The plight of the Indian is getting to be on a par with the buffalo. The buffalo are put on a reservation with a fence around it, but are assured of social security, enough to eat, and freedom from fear of molestation. The Indian has been put on a reservation with mountains around it, and ever since the original treaty the mountains are being moved closer, until with the last effort, by passing the bill suggested, he will not even have a reservation. The United States Government is making a greater effort to keep the buffalo from extermination than is being made for the Indian.

After the opening of the reservation the Government took some $4,000,000 of Indian tribal money and expended it on ditches and water canals, and turned them over to the white settler.

The United States in 1855 made a treaty with the Flathead Tribe and the tribe expected that the treaty would be kept. History has shown a path of wrecked Indian hopes and broken white promises.

The United States is now offering freedom from want and fear to all the nations of the earth, and the Indian has more of want and more of fear for his own security than ever.

The bill purports to tell the Indian he is able to stand on his own feet, if he accepts the provisions of the bill, but the Government says he is not competent to handle his own money by keeping it from him.

The bill is objectionable, and has many repulsive features, among them:

1. If this bill becomes a law, then the Indian is forever denied the right to make demands on the Government for further redress of wrongs.'

2. It will make eventually all the land of individual Indian and tribal lands subject to State control and State taxation, which means gradual confiscation.

3. The time limit for the exemption of $5 per year in taxation on $1,000 of assessed homestead of 10 years, is only long enough to make the Indian 10 years older and then lose his land after that, if he cannot pay the State tax.

4. Amounts in excess of $300 must go through the State courts and subject to State laws, which means that the State will create a commission at the expense of the Indian and his tribe to carry out this feature of the bill and entails large and useless expense which, of course, will come out of the Indian money.

5. On principle the Indian should not accept such a bill, as it is forced on them without their consent, and even the obtaining of their consent is done under misrepresentation as to the good to be derived from it.

6. The bill abrogates, without the tribal consent, the treaty of 1855 which is binding in honor on the United States Government, to keep inviolate and preserve the property and rights of the Indian as long as "the sun shines and waters flow." The white man has already stopped the flow of much of the Indian water and would stop the sun from shining.

7. The Honorable Senator MOORE and other sponsors of this bill should realize and acknowledge that it is partly the fault of men like themselves that the Indian is still the same as he has always been in his relations with the Government. All the responsibility cannot be laid at the door of the Indian bureaus.

HENRY MATT,
Flathead Indian.

Employment of Disabled Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much said about the employment of disabled veterans, so many attempts have been made to show that they would not be able to carry on work as employees in various enterprises, that I have deemed it advisable to insert in the RECORD a statement compiled by Mr. Harold W. Breining, of the Veterans' Administration, covering the subject of the employment of the handicapped.

Undoubtedly in the old days, before the development of electricity and invention of those electrical appliances that go to lighten the burden of human labor, it would have been more difficult for wounded or disabled veterans to carry on in the average industry.

But under conditions as they exist today, I submit there is no reason on earth why practically every industry in America should not give preference to disabled veterans when it comes to employment.

The following statement by Mr. Breining is sufficient proof that vast numbers of these wounded and otherwise disabled men will be competent to resume their positions, or to take positions in those other activities for which they are fitted.

The matter referred to follows:

APRIL 15, 1944.

ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR, THE ADMINISTRATOR, EMPLOYMENT OF THE DISABLED:

In your recent conference with Mr. Ray Murphy of the Association of Casualty and Surety Executives you indicated that you expected in the near future to hold a conference of all concerned organizations relative to the employment of the disabled. I am submitting the information stated below in the belief that you might wish to have such data in condensed form:

"One recent survey made in a large manufacturing plant studied 685 handicapped employees in comparison with the same number of normal individuals. The records indicate:

"Seven and nine-tenths percent more normal workers resigned than handicapped workers.

"Seven percent more absences among normal workers.

"Five and six-tenths percent fewer accidents among the handicapped workers.

"Seven and four-tenths percent more discharges for cause among normal workers.

"Four and six-tenths percent increased earnings for the handicapped as compared with 4 percent for the normal workers." (Letter April 3, 1944, American Mutual Alliance.)

"Caterpillar has approximately 800 handicapped persons in gainful and most useful work. This number is remarkable when one considers that this company builds heavy machinery, calling for heavy and light machine work, similar types of assembling, and gray iron and aluminum foundry work. Those called handicapped by Caterpillar are only those with major defects—loss of one or both extremities; marked deformities, congenital or otherwise; loss of one or both eyes; loss of hearing or speech; and those recovered from tuberculosis, heart disease, etc.

"Yes; the program works in the hardest, most callous test tube of them all—actual experience. The vast majority of these people have a production, safety, and absentee record far above normal. They are paid at the same rate as normal individuals, are shown no special favors, and are in no way considered as accepting charity. They will be given the same consideration as any other employee in being retained on the job in the days following the war.

"The best answer to 'Will It Work?' is from the lips of 'Caterpillar' supervision reflecting positive company policy: 'Give us as many of this type of workman as you can get.'" (Pamphlet, the Caterpillar Tractor Co.)

Such statistics as appear to be available seem to substantiate the belief that physically handicapped persons generally prove to be sound investments when placed in suitable jobs. One study states:

"1. They are virtually draft-proof.

"2. They are often better for particular jobs than a normal person, e. g., workers deaf or hard of hearing are ideal for work requiring concentration in noisy surroundings.

"3. They don't shop around for better jobs. This reduces turn-over and makes for the better morale of a contented work force.

"4. They take better care of their work and pay more attention to it, thus increasing productivity.

"5. They are more appreciative of their opportunities, and hence more loyal.

"6. They are likely to have fewer accidents because they are accustomed to acting more cautiously. The statistical evidence available confirms this belief. Western Electric studied 685 handicapped workers in a 2-year period, finding that 23.5 percent of them were injured at work, as contrasted to 39.1 percent of the control group of nonhandicapped persons. The Pennsylvania State Bureau of Rehabilitation analyzed extensive automobile accident data and found that .6 percent of 29,000 physically handicapped auto drivers were involved in accidents against 4.5 percent of 2,000,000 drivers of normal physical fitness.

"7. Their attendance is as good as that of normal persons." (Letter January 17, 1944, Association of Casualty and Surety Executives.)

"Of the 97 employers who reported on absenteeism—53 found it to be less for the handicapped; 39 found it to be the same in both groups; only 5 found it to be higher among the handicapped.

"Of the 76 employers who reported on labor turn-over—63 found the turn-over rate to be lower among the handicapped; 12 found it to be the same in both groups; only 1 found it to be higher among the handicapped.

"Of the 87 employers who reported on accident rate—49 found it to be lower among the handicapped; 36 found it to be the same in both groups; only 2 found it to be higher among the handicapped.

"Of the 105 employers who reported on productivity—25 found output to be higher among the handicapped; 69 found it to be the same in both groups; only 11 found it to be lower among the handicapped." (Pamphlet study made by the Federal Security Agency.)

HAROLD W. BREINING.

Tables Showing the Treasury Department Estimates of the Number of Civilian Income Recipients Incurring (a) Regular Net Income Tax and (b) Victory Tax, Under the Revenue Act of 1943, at Levels of Income Estimated for the Calendar Year 1944, Distributed by Net Income Classes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD H. McLEAN
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tables:

Estimated number of civilian income recipients incurring regular net income tax under the Revenue Act of 1943, at levels of income estimated for the calendar year 1944

Net income class (dollars in thousands)	Number		Percentage distribution
	Simple	Cumulative from highest level	Simple	Cumulative from highest level
0–1	6,081,039	40,726,293	14.932	100.000
1–2	17,507,407	34,645,254	42.988	85.068
2–3	9,707,701	17,137,847	23.836	42.080
3–4	3,660,012	7,430,146	8.987	18.244
4–5	2,025,618	3,770,134	4.974	9.257
5–10	1,169,452	1,744,516	2.872	4.283
10–25	446,475	575,064	1.096	1.411
25–50	90,987	128,589	.223	.315
50–100	27,257	37,602	.067	.092

Estimated number of civilian income recipients incurring regular net income tax under the Revenue Act of 1943, at levels of income estimated for the calendar year 1944—Continued

Net income class (dollars in thousands)	Number		Percentage distribution
	Simple	Cumulative from highest level	Simple	Cumulative from highest level
100–250	8,701	10,345	0.021	0.025
250–500	1,215	1,644	.003	.004
500–1,000	350	429	.001	.001
1,000 and over	79	79	(1)	(1)
Total	40,726,293		100.000

[1] Less than 0.0005 percent.

Treasury Department, Division of Research and Statistics, Mar. 3, 1944.

Estimated number of civilian income recipients incurring Victory tax under the Revenue Act of 1943 at levels of income estimated for the calendar year 1944

Net income class (dollars in thousands)	Number		Percentage distribution
	Simple	Cumulative from highest level	Simple	Cumulative from highest level
0–1	9,725,918	50,886,630	19.113	100.000
1–2	22,813,107	41,160,712	44.831	80.887
2–3	10,907,204	18,347,605	21.434	36.056
3–4	3,670,267	7,440,401	7.213	14.622
4–5	2,025,618	3,770,134	3.981	7.409
5–10	1,169,452	1,744,516	2.298	3.428
10–25	446,475	575,064	0.877	1.130
25–50	90,987	128,589	0.179	0.253
50–100	27,257	37,602	0.054	0.074
100–250	8,701	10,345	0.017	0.020
250–500	1,215	1,644	0.002	0.003
500–1,000	350	429	0.001	0.001
1,000 and over	79	79	(1)	(1)
Total	50,886,630		100.000

[1] Less than 0.0005 percent.

Treasury Department, Division of Research and Statistics, Mar. 3, 1944.

Eulogy to His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include the following excellent eulogy on the passing of that beloved leader of the Holy Roman Catholic Church, His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell, archbishop of Boston, who was called to his Maker on Saturday, April 22, 1944, which appeared in the edition of the Lawrence Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass.:

GREAT LEADER DIES

His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell, archibishop of Boston, has passed on to his Maker, his earthly task complete.

The passing of the dean of the Catholic Hierarchy in America, despite his advanced age and the knowledge that his illness had been regarded as critical for several days, came as a great shock not only to the people of his own archdiocese, and of the Nation, but also to friends and admirers the world over.

His death marks the exit of a great and outstanding leader at a time when the world can ill afford to lose personages of the brilliance of Cardinal O'Connell. His influence for good spread near and far and his utterances upon matters of world import will be missed. They were always based upon sound reasoning, broad vision, deep study, and with consideration of the welfare of all peoples. His advice and counsel on matters pertaining to local, national, and world affairs were sought as well as his exceptional opinions and utterances upon matters of religion, culture, science, and humanitarianism.

Leaders in all callings, of all races and creeds, hastened to express their regrets and tributes upon learning of the death of Cardinal O'Connell. Messages have been pouring in from all parts of the world. It is generally recognized that one of great vision, unusual broadness, extreme tolerance, of deep understanding, of charity unsung, and of influence among people throughout the Christian world, has passed on from this earth to take his place in heaven.

Cardinal O'Connell, largely because of his tolerance and understanding, commanded the respect of people. His 60 years in the priesthood of God have been fruitful years and productive ones. He never deviated from his standards of righteousness, decency and propriety. His views on many matters relating to certain trends of modern civilization could always be depended upon as fearless, frank, and based upon the tenets of religion. From a boyhood in the home of his parents, humble mill workers in Lowell, he traversed the paths of life and religion to one of the highest honors his church could grant. The archdiocese over which he presided for so many years and so faithfully and well is sorrowing today over the great loss. Cardinal O'Connell's body, garbed in the full ceremonial robes of his high office, will lie in state from today until Friday in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross at Boston. During that time many thousands will pass his bier and pray for his eternal rest.

There are many monuments and memorials to the great churchman all over the great archdiocese. Churches, schools, colleges, institutions devoted to the advancement of the arts and sciences, abodes for the stricken and unfortunate may be counted in the hundreds.

Cardinal O'Connell's fourscore and more of years of life were well spent. His contributions to his God, his church, his country, and to civilization are beyond estimation. Seeing the results of his constancy to the rules of righteousness and decency gave him much satisfaction during his lifetime, but his real reward will come in heaven.

China: A Key to Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I am inserting in the RECORD a copy of a broadcast I made over the N. B. C. on Friday, April 21, 1944:

My fellow Americans, this is my third radio talk with you concerning the Far East. My purpose in discussing this field is to keep you informed about what is happening there and to emphasize the importance of that area in this global war.

You are all aware of our successes in the Pacific over the past year and we are justly proud of MacArthur, Halsey, Nimitz, Chennault, and Stilwell and the boys who fight under their commands. But their job has been a long and hard one and the end is, as yet, nowhere in sight. We cannot afford to believe those who say that Japan will be defeated before Germany, because there is absolutely no basis for that statement. Neither should we be complacent about our successes or about the size of our Navy or the fact that we are building 12 warships every day—Sundays included.

While we are scraping the bottom of our manpower barrel to garrison over 50 fronts scattered all over the world, the Japanese have almost 2,000,000 men who have not been called to the colors because they are not needed.

In estimating our enemies we must use common sense and look at them as they really are. Our best military minds recognize the Jap as a first-class fighting man. Yes, he's short in stature, his clothes are ill-fitting, and he's not much on the parade ground. But, in the field he is tough, fanatical, and has a do-or-die spirit. His equipment is good and he can subsist on far less than our boys. His industrial capacity is far better than we give him credit for even if, in quality and quantity, he lags behind. These people, who are supposed to be only imitators, are today building single-seater fighter planes that fly in excess of 350 miles an hour, that have a higher maneuverability than ours, and a rate of climb that compares well with our planes.

Since Pearl Harbor, Japan has become the richest nation in the world and has every natural resource needed to carry on the war. She can, if given time, become perhaps the most powerful military nation the world has ever seen. Japan has no qualms about using the 400,000,000 people it has conquered as a huge pool of subject labor. She is mobilized for a long war, her people eat one-third of what they used to, and every energy is directed toward the killing of Allied soldiers. Japan has made full use of the limited initial resources of a weak nation and has fought a careful and orthodox war with two exceptions—Midway and the fleet action at Guadalcanal. The Japanese intend to make us pay heavily for every success we achieve and their defense, as at Tarawa, New Guinea, and elsewhere, shows careful planning.

In fighting Japan we must keep open the longest supply line in history. To illustrate: it takes 44 ships, 3,200 crewmen, and 165,000 barrels of oil to move 100,000 tons of supplies to Australia each month. To move that amount by air would require over 10,000 planes, approximately 120,000 crewmen, and close to 10,000,000 barrels of gasoline. And these supplies would be enough for an Army to wage a minor engagement only. It is even more difficult to transport supplies to our great Asiatic ally, China. China, with its almost half a billion people born to the oldest culture in the world, struggling, fighting, and dying to preserve her nationhood, has been in this war for almost 7 years. Her material conditions have changed for the worse, her richest industrial areas have been lost, widespread inflation has set in, her troops are still inadequately armed, but today she is as confident of final victory as ever.

China will be the main front in the Pacific war. Even if the Japanese Navy is meeting its match, this cannot yet be said of the enemy Army, entrenched in a vast land domain from Manchuria to Burma. Recently two top American commanders have emphasized in specific terms the nature of the task that lies ahead on the continent of Asia. On February 8, Admiral Chester W. Nimitz told newspapermen: "My objective is to get ground and air forces into China as soon as possible. I don't believe Japan can be defeated from the sea alone." To this he added the unequivocal declaration: "I believe Japan can be defeated only from bases in China."

Five days later, Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell declared that Admiral Nimitz's naval drive across the Pacific to the China coast "must be supported heavily by an aggressive Allied land and air offensive projected from the interior." Asserting that "vital China-based air operations cannot wait for a penetration of the blockade by land or sea," he stated that facilities are being prepared inside China to service "the largest and newest cargo carriers available."

All sea and overland routes to China—with one exception—are cut off. The one exception is the northwest caravan route from Sinkiang Province into China proper. At the present time negotiations are being carried on between China and Russia concerning the transportation of supplies from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics via this route but no agreement has, as yet, been reached.

The only route now is an aerial one over the "hump" of the Himalayas, and there the Army Air Transport Command and the China National Aviation Corporation are doing a remarkably efficient job. When China first proposed this route to our authorities she was told that the mountains were impassable, the Indian monsoons impenetrable, and when skies were clear Japanese interception would become fatal. All these factors have been overcome and today more material is being flown into China than ever went in over the Burma Road.

Every item of equipment necessary for the maintenance and operation of Chennault's air force in China must be flown in from the outside. This is the fundamental fact of our strategy in China. Transport planes flying the round trip between Assam and Kunming can deliver 4 tons of 100-octane gas, but to do so they must themselves use 3½ tons of the precious commodity.

It is no secret that many planes flying over the "hump" have been lost without trace. In the last 8 months of 1942—when transportation over the Himalayas began—more than a fourth of the planes used were wrecked, shot down, or destroyed. Today the flights go forward on schedule, and until such time as we can either capture a seaport on the China coast or we conquer Burma to permit opening another overland route to China, this route is of the greatest importance and to date is all we have.

We can control the air completely, we can sweep the seas clean, but even then we will be a long way from winning our war in the Pacific. This war will be decided by the bayonet and the rifle, and that means the infantryman will carry the burden. That is where China comes in, because she has the manpower and the will to use it. China's Army has been trained well in the use of small arms—the rifle and the machine gun. She has the experience and the strategic location. This war may end not with the conquest of Japan's Pacific holdings or even with the defeat and conquest of Japan itself. It may very likely end in Manchuria, where this war started in 1931, and it is there that mammoth land armies may well decide this barbaric struggle.

For this reason—and it is not so far fetched as some may think—China must be given every possible assistance and soon. While we have not given her all the supplies she needs, we have been making superhuman efforts and the results are only now beginning to tell. In the last 8 months of 1942 we sent in over the "hump" 5,500 tons of material by air and in 1943 we raised that to 63,000 tons of which 13,300 tons were flown in the month of December alone. This shows remarkable progress and some day when the history of the air ferry from India to China is known, this country will realize that there are no greater heroes in this war than the boys who fly the big transports over the Himalayas. The result now is only a trickle but when the Ledo Road is completed and the Burma Road reopened it will swell and when we conquer our first seaport on the China coast it will become a torrent.

Before this happens the Chinese and Americans will have to continue to fight and fly shoulder to shoulder. The Chinese do not wish to make the war in Asia an American burden but would rather that America give them the tools so that they could do the job.

To implement transportation into China, there is being undertaken at present the building of the Ledo Road from Assam in India through northern Burma toward the Chinese frontier. About 150 miles have already been built and, if we can capture Myitkina, a Japanese-held railroad terminus in northern Burma before the monsoon rains begin in May, the road should be completed by next fall or winter and another highway into China made a reality. Then, in conjunction with the "hump" we should be able to send in material enough to start to drive the Japs out of China.

Gen. Joe Stilwell deserves all the credit in the world for his foresight in building the Ledo Road. The American-Chinese forces are working together and doing a great job. The finishing touches will come when the strength-starved China theater gets the ships, planes, and men to make it possible. Before this can be accomplished the Japanese invasion of India—and it is a serious threat—must be thrown back. If Auchinleck and Mountbatten do not stop the Japanese, the supply routes for the Ledo Road will be cut and all our transport and ground operations in Assam and north Burma will be dangerously menaced.

The Cairo Declaration was one of the first indications that this country and England at last realized the full import of the situation in the Far East. Unlike the Tehran Conference, which was mostly, if not entirely, occupied with European problems, the Cairo Declaration stated that Japan must surrender unconditionally. Furthermore, it stated that Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores shall be restored to China. These statements or promises mean much to China and the Far East, but they do not settle all the questions concerning territory which she considers—and rightly so—hers. No mention is made of the return of Hong Kong and Kowloon by England, of Macao by Portugal, of Kwangchow-wan by France, or of Outer Mongolia and Tannu Tuva by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. These are Chinese territories and should be returned to China at the earliest possible moment. We are not fighting this war to bring about the return of the status quo ante in the Far East. To do so would only mean another war in the future. China is not fighting for territorial aggrandizement, but she is determined to reacquire the lands which have been taken away from her by force.

The Cairo Declaration was significant not so much for what it said but for what it left unsaid. It touched on Japanese imperialism; it said nothing of the occidental type.

Most people in this country think that after Germany's fall Japan's punishment will logically and inevitably follow. That assumption is correct, but it is not shared by the military clique which rules Japan even though we have sunk over 500 ships of her merchant fleet through the work of our submarines; even though we produce over 9,000 planes a month to her 1,000; even though our tank and ship production is greater than hers; and even though we exercise complete control of the mid, southwest, and north Pacific sea and sky lanes.

Japan believes that in a few years she can correct her present evident weaknesses if she is not seriously harassed by us. And she is certainly not being seriously hurt, except on the outer fringe of her empire, at the moment. The Japs think that we will become weary of a war that does not directly affect our shores and that our people will eventually insist upon a compromise peace leaving Japan with the greater part of her present gains. This would well suit Tojo because it would allow Japan to consolidate her gains and exploit them to the limit at which time she would resume her advance toward world mastery.

How long can Japan hold out? The Japs think forever. They are wrong. Too many Americans think for only a few months or a year at the most. They are wrong, too. No one can answer the question, but everyone can be assured that it will require every ounce of our energy and ability to do the job, and that applies to the man on the farm, the worker in the factory the legislators in Washington, and the boys at the front. The Japanese say we will not make any sacrifices and they emphasize our softness. They look upon us as weaklings, they play up our disunity, and they question our fighting spirit. They think all these elements will give them time to obtain complete control of all their conquests. They have made no provision for failure, and they feel the American people will give in when the going gets really tough. Will we? The answer is no, because we likewise have made no provision for failure.

Are We Going To Keep Our Promise to C. A. A.-W. T. S. Men?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, during the past several weeks I have had many inquiries from my people of Louisiana as well as from citizens of other States relative to the manner in which a particular group of men has been handled since their recent activation from enlisted reserve status within the armed forces of the United States. Many of you, ladies and gentlemen, are acquainted with the name of this group by now. They have had little publicity, however, throughout the course of their work and study for the last year and a half, and remain quite unknown to the public generally—especially by comparison with other groups engaged in similar war work. The group of which I am speaking is composed of the C. A. A.-W. T. S. pilots, now privates in the walking army, to speak of the majority.

These men volunteered their services without pay in response to a much-publicized campaign conducted by the C. A. A. during the summer and fall of 1942. At that time they were told that a great need existed for pilots for various flying activities. They were assured that they would be useful pilots within a period of 8 to 10 months, and that the duration of training would not exceed 10 months. For that period of time they would have to make their own financial arrangements, because they would work without pay, being furnished only their subsistence and lodging. The majority of the men had attained some substantial position in life, and having resources upon which they could draw, were glad to make the necessary sacrifice for this short length of time. Most of the younger men came from families which could assist them. Upon completion of their training the men were to be licensed or commissioned ferry pilots, transport pilots, air-line copilots and pilots, liaison pilots, tow-target pilots, and flight instructors. Most of these flying jobs called for commissioned or flight-officer status, and men were accepted for training only after passing comprehensive mental examinations and rigid C. A. A. commercial pilot physical examinations.

Prospective trainees had to enlist in the Army enlisted reserve corps or the Navy before enrollment for their first courses as early as July 1942. Trainees already in the Civilian Pilot Training Program at the time had their choice of joining the Navy or the Army. By the end of 1942 some 25,000 men had enlisted.

Army and Navy C. P. T. men received instruction side by side in many schools. They attended all classes together—ground school, military subjects, drill, physical training, and flight. In the middle of December 1942 the Navy trainees received the happy announcement that from then on they would be paid while training. Their classmates, the Army men, received no such announcement. In fact, they doubted that the Army knew they existed. This was pretty bad for morale, but the hurt was not too serious for the men did not slacken their efforts. They had their goal to reach—flying in our war effort. It was later apparent to everyone concerned that the time necessary for completing the entire curriculum would greatly exceed the 8- to 10-month period set out in the original plan. The men would have to finance themselves for a longer period of time. Congress came to their assistance in the spring of 1943 by providing pay at the rate of $50 per month retroactive to December 15, 1942.

This program, later called the E. R. C.—Enlisted Reserve Corps—section of the C. A. A. war-training service program, had been in progress for a year when, after investigation of the need for pilots, the Army, through the C. A. A., announced that the program was to be reduced from approximately 14,000 enlistees and trainees to 7,000. As a consequence, the men were required in July 1943 to indicate their choice of one of the following: First, continue training on active-duty status to become Army flight instructors—other kinds of flying jobs were said to be no longer available; second, transfer to active duty in the Army Air Forces for assignment to technical schools—walking army; third, discharge from the Enlisted Reserve Corps to civilian status.

All men remaining in the program were assured that a real need existed for their services as pilots.

By the end of September 1943, almost all the trainees scheduled to be placed on active duty from enlisted reserve status had received Army orders directing them to induction centers for this purpose. As Army personnel on active duty they were sent to basic training centers including Sheppard Field, Tex.; Jefferson Barracks, Mo.; Greensboro, N. C.; and Buckley Field, Colo., where, in addition to receiving basic military training they were screened, tested, interviewed, and given the Army "64" flight physical examination. As a result of this process 4,978 men were found qualified to continue their training to become Army flight instructors. They were reassigned from the basic training centers to W. T. S. schools, or to the Army Central Instructor School at Randolph Field, Tex., in accordance with previous courses completed, and their status now became that of aviation student.

The program was going smoothly, the courses of instruction being substantially the same as they had been prior to activation of the men, when on January 15, 1944, the Army suddenly directed the termination of the entire program. In his letter dated January 15, 1944, to the Civil Aeronautics Administration, Brig. Gen. Robert W. Harper, assistant chief of the Air Staff, made the following statement:

> Discontinuance of the flight instructors' program is in no sense attributable to dissatisfaction with the training performed by the C. A. A. War Training Service. It is desired to express appreciation of the excellent work accomplished by the fight contractors, ground schools, and C. A. A. personnel who have been engaged in the training of pilots for the Air Forces.

Is there not something strange in the Army's decision of January 15, and its refusal to put to use this valuable flight training? Was the decision of January 15 an overnight affair? Was not the supporting data for this decision accumulated for months prior to January 15? How, then, did this data, which no doubt had been assembled for several months before, compare with the data which motivated the Army's decision in September 1943 to continue the training of 5,000 fight instructors?

Some 4,000 men were left stranded in various stages of progress by this action. Of these, about half are commercially licensed pilots. Many of these men hold flight instructor as well as instrument ratings. All have an intense interest in aviation. They had gone through a course of training which compares favorably with that of the Air Forces combat pilot cadet program, and which is far superior to any other training program. The W. T. S. men have the distinction of having survived one of the most stringent elimination programs in the history of aviation—Flying, April 1944, article by F. Hamlin, page 170.

These pilots were sent back to the various basic training centers, enumerated before, where they were given basic military training for the second time, given more aptitude tests, and physically examined again while awaiting the Army's decision as to their disposition. The Army states in a news release dated March 16 that 2,618 of these men are qualified for technical training. That they are qualified is easy to see, since qualification is based largely on the general classification test—the Army's test of "rate of learning." As a group these men are said to have had higher G. C. T. scores than any group the Army has handled. A great number of pilots in this technical category had already completed courses at the Army Central Instructor School at Brooks or Randolph Field, Tex., or both.

These pilots have been trained in very excellent aviation schools all over the United States—schools which have formerly graduated many fine pilots in prewar years. These schools contracted their facilities to the Government for the purpose of this type of training. Standards were very high and the students found it necessary to study very diligently and practice maneuvers patiently for long hours in order to make the grade. Apprehension over the possibility of being washed out and thus prevented from further flying was always in evidence. These men really wanted to fly. At the end of each course it was required that the student pass a comprehensive written examination as well as a careful flight test. Other tests, both flight and written, were given during the progress of each course.

Should all this expenditure in effort, time, and money be wasted?

At the time of their enlistment, definite commitments were made to these men by Army–C. A. A. sources that on completion of training they would be commissioned and would be used as pilots. To quote the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 3, 1944:

> General Arnold in his report to the Secretary of War in January, pointed out that the Air Force expansion which Congress decreed in 1939 was completely beyond the scope of the existing military establishment. The armed forces were forced to call on the civilian-pilot-training facilities. * * * The graduates of this program are the backbone of the service air forces.

Very few, however, of the trainees who started in the accelerated, full-time C. P. T.–W. T. E. program in the summer and fall of 1942 with promises of utilization in the war effort were ever given an opportunity to be used.

H. R. 4269 provides directly for taking care of W. T. S. trainees, although a possible answer to the question of how to use many of these men might be found in H. R. 4181 now pending in Congress which provides for continuation of the Civilian Pilot Training Program—refer to speech delivered in the House by the Honorable JENNINGS RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 3, 1944.

Why release male pilots who have been trained at great cost and with great expenditure in time and effort from pilot duties just so women can be trained, while receiving salaries of $150 per month, to replace them? As was stated in American Aviation, February 1, 1944, page 1:

> One cannot blame the women for wanting to participate somewhere in the flying end of the war, but the fact remains that they are not as suitable for ferry work as men, and now that men are available there is every reason to use them effectively.
>
> We are probably stirring up a hornet's nest to suggest that the women withdraw from ferrying fighter and bomber planes, for the WASPS are well entrenched and have sufficient power to have survived more than one effort to keep them out of the flying end of the Army. But the women themselves might look at their own record (which isn't so hot) and feel motivated by patriotic principles and permit trained men, many of them with families, to take over.

Is it fair * * * to throw them into the walking army while women less fitted for ferry work continue to remain in the service? The women will insist they are just as good as the men, but the record does not show this, and the Army knows it too well.

The 27-week training course of the WASPS cannot stand any comparison with that included in just the first four WTS courses which average approximately 40 weeks. Further attention is directed to General Arnold's report, in which he pointed out that the A. A. F. cannot train or utilize women pilots at the expense of training or utilizing the services of available men pilots. Why, then, is increase of the WASP program currently proposed in H. R. 4219, which provides for appointment of additional WASP cadets and for their commissions as second lieutenants in the Army of the United States on completion of their training?

Great numbers of men who have not had pilot training are presently requesting technical training of the sort being offered W. T. S. pilots in lieu of pilot activities. Men requesting technical training, although otherwise qualified, are being denied admission to the technical schools, it is said, because sufficient numbers of men have already been trained or are in training. The W. T. S. men were told their opportunity to go to these technical schools was made possible for them only after special consideration of their case. Why train pilots over as sheet-metal workers, radiomen, and so forth? If men in these categories are really needed, why fill the need with pilots when so many other men are qualified by experience or ability for such training, want it, and have not had previous specialized army training? The pilots should be flying planes.

Why train these male pilots over as suggested in the Army's March 16 news release for services for which women are not suited? They are pilots. They were trained to do necessary flying jobs. And just what are services for which women are not suited? Women are doing all kinds of nonpilot jobs in the aircraft factories along with young men who are being deferred from the draft. Women are being trained for radio work in Canada. And look how women are performing in Russia.

These men were promised at the beginning of the C. P. T. program, when they went in without remuneration for their time and effort, that they would be used as ferry pilots, transport pilots, airline copilots, and pilots, liaison pilots, glider pilots, tow-target pilots, and flight instructors.

They were reassured as late as September 1943 that there was still a need for them as Army flight instructors and that they would hold an appropriate rank.

The January decision of the Army has broken all previous promises made to these men with one deft stroke.

Surely we can do something about this situation. What are we going to do about it?

H. R. 4269 provides a measure of rectification.

Congress Must Keep Pace With Executive Agencies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Washington Post of April 24, 1944:

THEY CAN'T BE WRONG

Popular demands for modernization of Congress must be haywire, according to Representative CLARENCE CANNON, because they have never been approved by the men and women who serve in Congress. From the first Congress down to the present session, he says, 9,734 legislators have considered proposals for streamlining Congress and rejected them. Of course 9,734 Congressmen, he concluded, can't be wrong. Newspaper men and Members of Congress assembled to discuss reform of that body's procedure the other night laughed at this statement. It had the ring of an ironic joke. But the speaker left no doubt that he was in dead earnest. His fantastic statement must be attributed to recklessness rather than jest.

In flat contradiction of this pretense that Congress is unanimously opposed to modernization of its machinery, four of the eight legislators on the discussion panel came out positively in favor of reform proposals. A fifth was for limited changes. Only three assumed that Congress can meet its obligations in the post-war era with the present duplication of committee work, the lack of expert assistance, and paucity of leadership. Mr. CANNON neglected also to inform his listeners when Members of the House have ever had a real opportunity to pass judgment upon that body's obsolete rules. It is true, of course, that many proposals to bring the rules into line with modern legislative practice have been introduced. But they have been bottled up in the Rules Committee and the rank and file have had no opportunity to vote for or against them. It should be obvious to the reactionary chairman of the House Appropriations Committee that denial of the right to vote on proposed reforms is scarcely equivalent to their unanimous rejection.

The most cogent argument against modernizing Congress came from Senator O'MAHONEY. He fears that the movement to reduce the number of committees and to strengthen congressional leadership "is part and parcel of the modern passion for centralized management." The best way to fight this centralization mania, he says, is to preserve decentralization in Congress. It seems to us that the reverse is true. One reason why power is now transferred so freely to the executive branch is because Congress functions so clumsily. National policy-making powers tend to slip through its fingers because policy can be formulated so much more readily by executive action. In our opinion, Congress must put aside the trivialities in which it now becomes entangled and enhance its ability to legislate promptly and effectively if our representative system is to survive as anything more than an empty symbol of democracy. Not even Congress can control centralized strength in the executive branch by decentralized weakness in its own.

On the whole, we surmise that the majority of the editors and legislators left this unique discussion with renewed determination to work for a more efficient Congress. The significant fact is that the movement now has powerful support in the ranks of Congress itself. In the end the persuasive arguments of men like Senators MALONEY and LA FOLLETTE, Congressmen MONRONEY, DIRKSEN, KEFAUVER, and others may be expected to make a deep impression on their colleagues who are alert to the problems of twentieth-century democracy.

President Roosevelt Called Upon To Aid Strawberry Farmers Against Unfair Ceiling Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that, under the provisions of section 3 of the O. P. A. Act of 1942, as amended, the President of the United States has been called upon to exercise his authority under the provisions of section 3 of said act.

In his absence from Washington, the following letter was written and delivered to Secretary Stephen Early, also attached thereto the following petition to the President:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C., April 19, 1944.

The Honorable STEPHEN EARLY,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Realizing that the President is out of the city at the moment, I am hereby transmitting to you an appeal on behalf of 50,000 people of Louisiana, according to the provisions as set forth in section 3 of the O. P. A. Act of 1942 as amended, which gives the President the right to correct gross inequities.

I hereby respectfully request that you immediately notify the Honorable Chester Bowles, Administrator of the O. P. A., that an appeal has been made to the President of the United States from his directive as issued placing a ceiling price on strawberries, and that he be thereby requested to withhold enforcing any ceiling price on strawberries until the President of the United States has had an opportunity to return and pass upon the appeal, according to the provisions of the O. P. A. Act of 1942 as amended.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. MORRISON,
Member of Congress.

To the Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America:

Appeal on behalf of 50,000 Louisiana strawberry growers from a ruling and directive issued by the Honorable Chester Bowles,

O. P. A. Administrator. This appeal to you as President of the United States is made in accordance with the provisions of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, which provides as follows, to wit:

"Section 3. Provided, That the President may, without regard to the limitation contained in clause 2, adjust any maximum price to the extent that he finds necessary to correct gross inequities."

STATEMENT OF FACTS

On Thursday, April 13, 1944, a directive was issued by the Honorable Chester Bowles, placing a ceiling price on strawberries. The Louisiana growers, constituting the largest strawberry-producing State in the United States, appealed to their Congressman, JAMES H. MORRISON, of the Sixth District of Louisiana, to protest against these ceiling prices, which are confiscatory, unreasonable, and will severely damage the Louisiana strawberry growers if put into effect. The O. P. A., War Food Administration, and Office of Economic Stabilization have refused to reconsider this matter and therefore comes the necessity of this appeal.

Fifty thousand Louisiana strawberry people have been shipping and marketing their strawberries on a large commercial scale in the same fashion and manner since 1918. The season usually begins in March or April and ends some time during the month of May, depending entirely upon weather conditions. The season this year started on approximately March 14, and from all indications will end about May 15 (depending on weather conditions). Therefore, the present time constitutes the height of the shipping season. The reasons why this O. P. A. ruling should be held up and thereby revoked are as set forth, to wit:

1. That same is capricious and will greatly damage Louisiana strawberry growers at this time because of the serious severe crop failure caused by excessive frost, freezes, and freakish weather.

2. That is present ceilings are put in effect and not revoked, 50,000 persons depending on strawberries as the main basis of their livelihood will incur a terrific financial loss. On the other hand, the over-all economic stability of the United States will not be affected in any manner, shape, or form if the growers are allowed to finish their season without a ceiling price, which will be for a period of a little more than 3 weeks.

Florida, which has been shipping strawberries since December 15, has completed her season without any ceiling price. The increase in price of that particular State in strawberries over last year's season was less than 5 cents per pint box, which was due not to an increase in price, but a decrease in acreage.

From the period in Louisiana of 1930 to 1940, including railway express and truck movements, an average of 3,000 cars per season have been shipped from Louisiana, or an average seasonal return to growers of $5,000,000. (These facts are based on Department of Agriculture figures and statistics.)

Taking the Honorable Chester Bowles' estimates of this season's total number of cars, namely 900 (which Louisiana growers say will be much less), at the highest average price that could possibly be received for the entire season the return to the growers would not exceed $3,780,000 to 50,000 individuals for the entire crop. As an example here in the height of a strawberry season in Louisiana 60 to 70 to 80 cars normally would be shipped per day, while, according to the Department of Agriculture reports, from the period of April 5 through April 12 less than an average of 15 cars per day have been shipped, and from April 12 to date the average shipments per day have been even less. For the entire season up to Sunday, April 16, only 409 cars have been shipped.

Therefore, from the consensus of opinion among growers, shippers, agricultural experts, and all connected directly or indirectly in Louisiana with the strawberry industry, all agree practically unanimously that there is a severe crop failure and estimates run on this crop failure not lower than 40 percent nor higher than 66⅔ percent. Therefore it is safe to assume from a most conservative standpoint that there is a greater than 50 percent crop failure.

The ceilings which have been invoked by the O. P. A. were withheld from being placed on new potatoes which have been placed on the market for the last 30 days, due to the fact that there was a crop failure and a shortage in yield, not however, as drastic and severe as the crop failure and shortage of yield on Louisiana strawberries.

The strawberry farmer started last July cultivating his plants and transplanting same and has constantly worked up until the present moment to produce this year's strawberries. He did not know, nor was he informed that a ceiling would be placed upon Louisiana strawberries until March 1, 1944. If all of the strawberries shipped from Louisiana this season were sent to New York City alone, there would not be sufficient quantity to give each inhabitant in that one city 2 pint boxes.

Louisiana is the only State that produces and ships trawberries in 24-pint crates. Most other States, including Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, North Carolina, Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, Virginia, and other States, either ship in 24-quart crates or 36-quart crates. It costs more money to produce a 24-pint crate of strawberries in Louisiana than it does to produce a 24-quart crate of strawberries in other States for the following reasons:

As an example, Arkansas plants strawberries every 3 years, whereas Louisiana plants her strawberries every year. Louisiana, through a painful, tedious process, picks, grades, and face packs her strawberries into an exceedingly attractive crate, whereas other States gather their strawberries in the opposite fashion, thereby marketing them as field run without grade and jumble pack or no pack as compared to the face pack of Louisiana. As an example, where other States' quarts have competed with Louisiana pints in markets such as St. Louis and Cincinnati, on some days Louisiana pints sold higher than Alabama quarts in Cincinnati on the same market, and never lower than 60 percent of the price that the quarts brought. The same is true of Mississippi quarts competing with Louisiana pints on the St. Louis market. Yet, in spite of all the pleas of Louisiana growers, the O. P. A., disregarding the enormous cost of production of Louisiana growers, made the ceiling on Louisiana strawberries not equal to or 80 percent of those ceilings placed on quarts, but placed on Louisiana pints a ceiling price approximately one-half of that on quarts, which is a gross discrimination against Louisiana growers as compared to growers of other States.

When it is considered that strawberries are purely a luxury, that you or I could live normally in the American way of life for the rest of our span of life without eating a single strawberry, yet, on the other hand, the O. P. A. has failed to put ceilings on many, many commodities that are much more vital a necessity in the lives of all Americans than are strawberries—such as jewelry and many other of the like.

Boiled down, the O. P. A. could not suffer nor could the American public suffer if this ceiling price were withheld until the 15th of May. If it is fair and equitable to withhold a ceiling price on new potatoes because of a crop failure, why not strawberries, which are a much less essential element of diet in American life than potatoes? On the other hand, think of how much withholding of this ceiling price would mean to the economic stability of 50,000 people directly affected, who have suffered a 50-percent or greater crop failure, without affecting in the least the over-all economic picture of the United States.

Therefore, on behalf of these strawberry growers located within my congressional district, I make this appeal to you as a great humanitarian to withhold the effectiveness of this O. P. A. ceiling directive on strawberries until May 15, or increase the present confiscatory price to $7.50 per crate, as you are authorized to do under the provisions of section 3 of the O. P. A. Act of 1942, as amended.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. MORRISON,
Congressman, Sixth District, Louisiana.

How To Prevent Future Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an address of Judge William H. Wadhams before the New York State Agricultural Society.

Judge Wadhams drew upon his experience as an international lawyer, having had offices in Berlin, Paris, and New Delhi, India. As a member of the executive committee of the League to Enforce Peace he worked on the draft for a league of nations, which was subsequently taken as the basis for the Covenant of the League presented by President Wilson to the Peace Conference, where Judge Wadhams was in attendance. He is the permanent adviser to the Chamber of Princes on the Federation of India and was, until the collapse of France, legal adviser to a joint British and French parliamentary committee on post-war organization.

Judge Wadhams said, in part:

The subject of how to prevent future wars brings a sour smile to the backward-turned face of the cynic and yet, to men of good will, it is possible. We often hear it said that all the people of all the nations fervently desire peace. This is not wholly true. There are nations whose people desire war, plan for war, and make war.

To prevent future wars these people must be not only defeated, but so destroyed that they will not have the potential power to make war in the future. No half-way victory will do; and then these people must be taught by the education of their youth that peace and goodwill are a better philosophy. Meanwhile the peace-loving nations will have to be constantly vigilant; that no step toward war is permitted. To prevent future wars we must undertake not only occupation but strict supervision by the victors.

That some form of international cooperation is necessary, and that our own Nation must take part if we are to have the security essential to peace, is self-evident.

There are those who would at once form a federation of the world.

There are others who would reestablish in authority the League of Nations or some modified form of the League.

There are advocates of cooperation in immediate tasks as they arise, leaving the ultimate international organization to some future time.

Having in mind the disasters of the past and our purpose for the future, I have from my experience reached the conclusion that whatever form the governmental cooperation may take, there is one essential to an enduring peace and that is control by law of the individual, and this essential may be included in any plan of international cooperation but without it any plan of cooperation is bound to fail. This essential which I propose does not necessitate a surrender of our national sovereignty.

Any proposal with respect to so vast a subject must necessarily be a mere framework of principles and an outline of methods. I shall at any rate be specific.

First, let us consider what are the causes of war and then inquire how these causes may be prevented. Here it is in outline:

A PLAN FOR MAINTAINING PEACE

I. The causes of war

1. The peace of nations exists only when the freedoms and just rights of their peoples are assured and protected.

2. It follows the conduct which destroys these freedoms and rights leads to war.

3. Every human undertaking is primarily performed by some individual; every act of aggression against the freedom of others is committed by some individual; every encroachment upon the just rights to life and liberty; all deeds which lead to war, are due in the first instance to the misconduct of some individual. And this is true whether the denial of freedom or of justice is committed through group action, as in power politics or in business combination, for such group action is of necessity instigated, set in motion, and, therefore, due to the conduct of some individual or individuals.

Individuals who assail the freedoms and rights of men are the makers of war. And this is beyond question when we look at the realities; wherefore we must conclude that:

4. Control of the individual is necessary to world peace.

Individuals, therefore, must be prohibited from committing the acts which lead to war. As by law we forbid murder and theft, so we propose to forbid by law the commission of acts which lead to or cause war.

Let us examine why leagues have failed.

II. Reasons for failure of leagues of governments

1. A league of governments acts by the adoption of resolutions from time to time and, therefore, depends each time upon the persuasion of each of its member governments to agree, giving constant opportunities for disagreement.

2. Governments acting through their foreign offices are subject to controls by selfish interests and ambitious men, through lobbies and manipulation.

3. The general will of a league, as expressed by the Council of the League, can be defeated by the government of one member nation at any time by mere failure to act.

4. When a League proposal is contrary to the immediate interest of any one nation, or of a special interest controlling the action of such nation, popular support for a refusal or failure of that nation to comply can easily be aroused and supported by a jingo press appealing to a narrow chauvinism.

5. Such a league of governments acts in the interest of the most powerful government or of a group which controls the League, for it is not a league of peoples and soon develops into a league to obtain power and advantage for some at the expense of others, instead of a league to maintain peace.

6. A league of governments of nations without controls of the individuals who compose them depends upon treaties. These have proven ineffective to maintain peace. The memory of the Kellogg Pacts, signed by practically all of the nations of the world, which hoped to abolish war, is bitter.

History proves that wars cannot be stopped by agreement nor by treaties or pacts, but wars can be prevented by removing the cause of war—that is, by stopping the individuals who commit acts that create war by protecting the freedoms that make for peace by definite laws, not by uncertain diplomacy.

There are great advantages in the control of individuals as distinguished from governmental agreements.

III. The advantages of control of individuals as distinguished from governmental agreements

1. Control of the individual establishes the law of nations for all persons alike regardless of their nationality.

It is truly said that nations are diverse and in varying stages of development, but the individual acts which create war are the same in all nations however much they may differ or whatever their stages of development, whatever their race, religion or language.

2. The law of nations once adopted by the people requires no reference to governments for its sanction. Like our Federal laws prohibiting smuggling or counterfeiting, they bypass the state and are directed against violation by any individual regardless of the state in which you reside.

3. Boundaries are no longer of the same importance as sources of war as the law of nations protecting the rights of all persons would apply to each individual whether he resides on this or the other side of the boundary.

4. Regional groupings, such as a Danubian union, a Balkan bloc, the Pan American Union, or even a United States of Europe, may not be objectionable as endangering peace provided all the individuals in each of the nations forming such groupings are subject to the law of nations which is the supreme law of all nations.

5. The plan of individual control removes the safeguarding of peace from the field of diplomacy which has failed to protect the people from war to the field of justice, to the end that in the international as well as the national sphere we may have a rule of law and not of man.

6. It makes no difference whether the nation is large or small. The supreme law of nations applies to all alike. For example, the Federal law of the United States applies alike to Delaware and to Texas.

7. The local laws may vary; for example, the law of Massachusetts is founded upon the common law of England, but the law of Louisiana is founded upon the Napoleonic Code.

8. Individual control, as expressed in the law of nations, applies whatever the form of government of the nation which adheres to the law of nations. It applies equally in a soviet, a monarchy, or a republic.

9. Individual control obviates the long-attempted "balance of power" among nations, which eventually always leads to war. The difficulty is that power does not remain balanced.

I will now outline a possible method, although I am not arrogant enough to maintain that it is the only method by which this control of the individual may be put into effect.

IV. The method of control over individuals to maintain peace

1. Individual control is effected by laws prohibiting acts which cause war—that is, acts which infringe the freedom and liberty of the individual and violate his just rights and are determined to be dangerous as promoting war.

2. These prohibitions may be formulated by a convention composed of delegates chosen by the people of United Nations, men chosen because of their determination to prevent future wars.

3. The convention would prepare codes of law to protect each of the "four freedoms" and such other freedoms as may be adopted in a bill of rights to assure peace. For example, an armament code, a trade and transportation code, an education code, a free-press and free-speech code, a finance code, etc.

These codes together would constitute the law of nations to maintain peace. They shall be adhered to by all peace-minded nations as the supreme law applicable to all their nationals. They must be obligatory in the vanquished countries as part of the terms of peace.

4. Commissions to implement each code; to hear and determine complaints, would be appointed in such manner as may be determined, for example, by an executive committee of the United Nations, which committee shall also fill vacancies from time to time.

And this is important; commissions shall not be appointed to represent any nation but shall be composed of experts in their several fields and charged with the duty of restraining and preventing acts which lead to or may cause war in violation of the codes of law. These commissions would not only restrain acts leading to war by their good offices but would be special grand juries and issue indictments on their own initiative or on the complaint of anyone who has prima facie made out a just case of violation of a code of the law of nations.

V. The supreme world court and its regional courts

Upon an indictment having issued from a commission, an order of arrest would issue out of the nearest regional court and its sheriff would bring the offender before the court for trial.

The judges of these courts, appointed for life by the executive committee of these United Nations, are chosen not to represent any nation or class or interest but for their eminence, independence, and character.

The supreme world court judges would be appointed in the same way and would construe the law of nations and hear appeals from the regional courts.

VI. International sheriffs

The court will have a force of sheriffs, or, as some call it, an international police to arrest offenders indicted and to enforce the court's decrees.

As the Axis enemies will have been disarmed, and as all future armament is controlled by the armament code, and, as the offenders are individuals, the force need not be large to bring violators of the codes protecting the freedoms to trial.

VII. This plan may be applied and is essential to any form of international cooperation to maintain peace

This plan has the advantage that it may be applied whatever the form of governmental cooperation adopted by the United Nations, whether it be a superworld state or federation, or merely an agreement among nations to cooperate. But whatever the form adopted by the victorious governments to establish peace, it is essential that a supreme law of nations be established prohibiting individuals wherever they reside and whatever their form of government from committing acts which lead to war as defined by the codes.

This is the fundamental principle which everyone who desires peace will approve: Every individual of the nations adhering to the law of nations, no matter where he lives, must obey the law of nations and not commit those acts which it defines as leading to war.

VIII. National sovereignty is not surrendered

Under this plan the individual nation continues to exercise its full sovereignty. It recognizes a supreme law forbidding the commission of acts which it has agreed upon, in the proposed codes, as acts which cause war. The agreement upon and adoption of such codes is in itself an act of sovereignty exercised in the same spirit as the present adherence to the universal postal union and to nonpolitical functions of the League of Nations.

There is no surrender of our national sovereignty as we ourselves adopt the law of nations. It is our own law established for our security.

Stop wars at their source. Stop individuals who promote the causes of war and you will prevent future wars, you will establish peace of earth.

Let Us Here Highly Resolve

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the very able junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the American Legion Post, No. 1, in New Bedford, Mass. The address is entitled "Let Us Here Highly Resolve."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am delighted to be here this evening and for a most particular reason.

This is the twenty-fifth anniversary of New Bedford Post, No. 1, the first post of the American Legion organized in Massachusetts. Such an anniversary is, in my mind, a most significant one, because it not only affords another opportunity for men who have served together in time of war to join in happy and congenial reunion, but it also gives all of us an opportunity to pause and think on some of the methods whereby veterans whose active service is over may still work for the good of their country. Some phases of this general question I propose to discuss with you this evening.

In Lincoln's great masterpiece, the Gettysburg Address, you, of course, recall these words, "Let us here highly resolve"; resolve what, as Lincoln went on to say, "Let us here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain."

Since these words were uttered in 1863, how many times have our young men gone forth to fight for our country, its institutions and principles, and how many times have all of us, figuratively at least, highly resolved that "these dead shall not have died in vain."

Twenty-seven years ago you and I set forth on a crusade to save the world for democracy in a war which was to end wars. We did a pretty good job, too, and when it was done, home we came, pretty well satisfied with ourselves, and quite sure that the job was done and that as far as war was concerned we had settled that issue once and for all.

And now where are we? Back into a maelstrom, once more engaged in a life-and-death struggle, which for scope and magnitude and vicious cruelty makes the one in which we fought pale into comparative insignificance. The fine youngsters you and I raised, and into whose upbringing we poured all of our love and affection, are out there in the trenches, in the desert, in the jungle, and on the dark, cold seas, doing the job all over again—and why? Because the American people, while giving lip service to the resolve that our dead should not have died in vain in reality made a sham of these words and proceeded in such a manner as almost to guarantee that it would happen again.

Make no mistake about my attitude as far as this conflict is concerned. I was sure it was our war, long before Pearl Harbor. I was sure we couldn't remain an enchanted isle, peaceful and content in a world menaced from all points by bandits and highwaymen. And when many of our countrymen, blind to the realities of the modern world, were preaching their doctrine of narrow and hopeless isolationism, I urged, with all my strength, that we pick our side and try once more to help settle—once and for all—the age old issue of liberty and human rights.

Now, as we meet here in New Bedford tonight, again highly resolving about the future, let us discuss briefly what we shall do, so that it really will not happen again.

Well, the first thing we must do is to say to the American people—this time we insist that you listen and give heed to the warning and advice of those who have done the fighting, whose sons are fighting now, and whose grandsons will have to do it the next time—if there must be a next time. And further, that in so doing, you discard the advice of those blind pacifists and do-gooders who continually, generation after generation, ignore the fundamental realities of life.

If we want to continue to exist as freemen we have got to win this war and afterward if we want to remain freemen we have got to remember that one of the fundamental laws of nature is for the strong to attack the weak. Our do-gooders know this is so in the animal world, but they think civilization has brought human beings to a point where this law has become academic. I don't know if you can call the Jap or the Nazi a human being, but I do verily believe that unless the great majority of human beings who want to live and let live are strong, and prepared to defend their way of life, their way of life will yield to another.

When I say this country must listen to those who have to do the fighting, let me remind you of what happened after the last war. Pretty soon after we arrived home the professional pacifists and peace lovers started their propaganda from pulpit, lecture platform, and college yard, pouring forth the doctrine that we must disarm, and then maintain peace at any price. Clubs and societies were formed, college students organized, and many an American fell prey to the most fallacious doctrine ever preached—that as a Nation we could be weak and still hope to live in peace.

And then up rose the American Legion. For 20 long years it steadily and consistently preached the doctrine of an adequate national defense.

Listen to some of the statements made to the American people over the past 20 years by those who did the fighting in '17 and '18. Continually, year after year, advocating a strong national defense—in 1926 at Philadelphia it recommended "the training of all field, line, and staff officers of the Reserve Corps, together with the enlisted personnel of the Organized Reserve. A Reserve Officers' Training Corps adequate to provide 5,000 reserve officers annually. A Citizens' Military Training Corps adequate to a strength of 50,000 annually. Procurement, development, and maintenance of such material and camps as will properly equip all the above components (in addition to the Regular Establishment and National Guard) and the further maintenance of an adequate war reserve for three field armies."

In 1933 at Chicago when the Nazi ideology was first burgeoning as a world power and menace, the Legion said: "We believe America will never seek a war and that a war will never seek a prepared America. We believe in an America strong enough to insure and enforce peace. We know that the pitiably small army in existence at the start of every war has never kept us out of war. We are opposed to the disarmament of the United States for the purposes of economy or as an acclaimed means to bring about world peace or as an example which some persons hope other nations will follow."

In 1937 we recommended "Activation of six skeletonized regiments of antiaircraft artillery, complete modern equipment for all active regiments of the Regular Army and the National Guard, and an adequate reserve of equipment for the additional regiments which will be needed immediately in an emergency."

And do you, despite this last appeal and others like it, recall the pictures of the troops, including our own Twenty-sixth Division, in training at Pine Camp, N. Y., in 1940, with trucks dressed up to represent tanks, replicas of machine guns in woods, and so on? And do you recall the pitifully small number of antiaircraft guns we had when Pearl Harbor caught us unprepared?

And as for the Navy—the limitation-of-arms treaty having fixed the United States, Great Britain, Japan ratio on a 5–5–3 basis—the Legion said in 1924: "The American Legion records its demand for maintenance of its position as stated in the limitation-of-arms conference. The ratio is now 5–4–3, with the United States occupying the position of 4"; and continued thereafter to demand a Navy (quoting from the 1939 Chicago convention) "so organized that it can defend our interests in both the Atlantic and Pacific against any possible grouping of aggressors."

In aviation the same sound advice poured forth year after year in the resolutions of our national conventions. In 1919 we urged that "military training in high schools and colleges is to be encouraged." In 1926 "we condemned as unwise and un-American propaganda spread against military training in schools and colleges."

And so goes the record down through the years, while few listened, few paid attention, few were aroused to the danger, few heeded the warning. Had the United States been a force to reckon with and had we been firm and courageous in calling the aggressors to account as, for instance, when Japan invaded Manchukuo in 1931 and China in 1937, as when Hitler first set forth on his career of destruction, had we followed the advice of the American Legion and of the men who knew how unpleasant war is, I firmly believe the world might be at peace today.

But why, say you, rehearse all these unpleasant facts. I do so because when our boys have whipped the enemy, as they will, what then? Shall we again "highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain" and again do nothing? When that time comes, we shall have perhaps 15,000,000 men and women in this country—1 in every 9 persons—who have worn the uniform of their country. And perhaps they will constitute a group sufficiently strong so that we no longer need fear the misguided individual who still thinks the pen is mightier than the sword.

But listen to the voices already raised. In Congress today there is a bill providing for post-war peacetime universal military training—perhaps not a perfect bill—but containing the genesis of sound policy. Listen to excerpts from my mail on this question. One writes "Nothing can be more disastrous for American peace and democracy than the complete militarization of our youth through peacetime compulsory military training." Another, "A year's military training for young men would cause them to be military minded and would contribute much toward making the United States a militaristic nation." Another, "I hope you will do everything in your power to defeat this grossly undemocratic measure." Another, "Multitudes are longing and hoping for a just and lasting peace, and any such action would ensure the likelihood of another war. We should prepare for peace, not war." Another, "Clearly Washington is filled with persons who lie awake nights hatching plots to destroy American liberty. How this (universal peacetime military training) can be construed as anything but flagrantly disloyal to American ideals I know not." Another, "Do you want war to continue or do you honestly want a world at peace?" As if anyone who had seen war, as I have, could conceivably want anything but a world at peace. And still one more, "This bill appears to be the most diabolically un-American possible. American principles will be violated if our sons are taught to kill." I wonder where our sons would be now, in the jungles of the Pacific and elsewhere, if they had not been taught to take care of those who have been taught to kill.

I think it unnecessary to quote further from the voluminous mail I have received on this very grave question. To all of these people I have responded to this effect—that while I never intend to be intolerant of people whose viewpoints do not coincide with mine, I must confess that I do not for the life of me see how anyone in this day and age can even imagine that any nation is going to preserve its liberties without adequate naval and air establishments, and that when the young men of our country are fighting and dying so that we at home may have a country to live in, I cannot understand how anyone can be so unmindful of these sacrifices as to want to send yet more American boys into action without adequate training. And so, to all my correspondents opposing universal peacetime military training, I have concluded by saying that I most certainly cannot conform to their viewpoint, and praying as I do for the welfare of my country, I most certainly shall pray that the viewpoint they represent does not prevail.

I am not one of those who believes in a blueprinted world order, in world parliaments, in world police forces, in subordinating Americanism to internationalism. On the other hand, I am as far apart as the poles from those elements in this country who are merely biding their time until the fighting is over before breaking forth once again with the fallacious doctrine that we must tend to our own knitting and ignore the rest of the world. If we are strong, and if we are firm and fair in our dealings with other nations, I believe we can so organize our relations with like-minded peoples all over the world that we may reasonably look forward to peace and good will in the foreseeable future.

But let us never again let down in our defenses. War aggression is always in inverse ratio to the preparedness of any nation and the cost of preparedness shrinks into insignificance compared to the cost of war. If this has been true in the past, the complicated development of modern weapons and scientific research which advances month by month in seven-league boots, makes it doubly and vitally true in the future.

We were saved by an eyelash this time. We weren't jumped upon without warning as was, for example, Norway—a country which stood foursquare for peace and strict neutrality and believed these objectives could be attained by allowing its defenses to fall to a point where it was practically helpless in the face of invasion. We have had stout-hearted Allies fighting for us while we have been spending 2¼ years in hitting our stride. Unless we are continually prepared, we well may be the Norway of the next war. Another time, under similar conditions, we could hardly expect to be given the time and opportunity afforded us since December 1941.

And so, let us here highly resolve that when this victory has been won we shall listen not to the nationalist, the pacifist, or the do-gooder, but to the voice of experience, the voice of those who fought and who thus know first hand what manner of people we must deal with when we let down our guard. All to the end that this time "these dead shall not have died in vain."

St. Louis Doctors Honored for Work in Rehabilitating War's Badly Wounded

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have taken a great deal of interest in connection with the program to rehabilitate or recondition disabled veterans. I have made many inquiries as to what the Government was doing along this line.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that two outstanding doctors from my own city, St. Louis, both members of the Army Medical Corps, have just been recognized for their outstanding work in rehabilitating veterans. Last week Lt. Col. Howard A. Rusk and Lt. Col. James B. Brown received what is termed "American Design Awards," which are sponsored by Lord & Taylor, of New York City.

A very interesting article on the subject written by Alvin H. Goldstein, a staff correspondent, appears in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of last Friday. Under the permission granted me, I include this article as part of my remarks:

ST. LOUIS DOCTORS HONORED FOR WORK IN REHABILITATING WAR'S BADLY WOUNDED—LT. COL. HOWARD A. RUSK AND LT. COL. JAMES B. BROWN RECEIVE AMERICAN DESIGN AWARDS

(By Alvin H. Goldstein)

NEW YORK, April 21.—Lt. Cols. Howard A. Rusk and James Barrett Brown, both of St. Louis and now serving in the Army Medical Corps, yesterday received two of the four awards of $1,000 each, presented for conspicuous service in behalf of disabled war veterans at the annual presentation of American Design Awards sponsored by Lord & Taylor, New York department store. Others receiving awards were Capt. Henry H. Kessler, of Newark, N. J., and, jointly, Lt. Col. Roy R. Grinker and Maj. John P. Spiegel, also for work in rehabilitation of war injured.

Colonel Rusk, now chief of the convalescent branch in the office of the Air Surgeon, was singled out for recognition by the American Design Awards jury in collaboration with Army and Navy authorities for instituting a program now officially adopted by all armed services for reconditioning men for return to productive civilian pursuits, who have been handicapped by injuries, either physical or mental.

Colonel Brown, distinguished plastic surgeon and former professor of oral and clinical surgery at Washington University Medical School, is now chief of plastic surgery at Valley Forge General Hospital for Veterans, and has served in the European theater of operations. He was selected for the award because of the major contribution he has made to the science of restoring maimed or disfigured features of war veterans.

Captain Kessler, of the Navy, was honored for his work in orthopedic rehabilitation, and Colonel Grinker and Major Spiegel jointly for successful efforts in neuropsychiatry in behalf of veterans suffering from the effects of shell shock or battle fatigue.

COLONEL RUSK'S INSPIRATION

Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, spoke briefly after the awards were presented by Walter Hoving, president of Lord & Taylor. Of the work of Colonel Rusk, Hoving said: "Just a little over a year ago, Colonel Rusk was making the rounds in a 2,000-bed Army hospital in the Midwest. He stopped to talk to a bedridden patient motionless in a plaster cast. He asked the boy how long he had been on his back and the boy said, '6 weeks, sir, 6 long dreary weeks with nothing to look at but this ceiling. I can tell you, where every crack is. Even how many nailheads there are. Last week there was a spider in that corner over there, but it was swept away yesterday.'

"In that moment was born the convalescent training program. Started by an Army doctor merely to alleviate boredom, the plan has grown into such proportions that today its far-reaching possibilities are limitless.

"This Army doctor wanted hospital time utilized for the benefit of the individual, not just wasted. A lengthy convalescence, he felt, should become extra time for learning. So he threw out the conventional occupational therapy of stringing beads and weaving baskets because he felt that such pointless work could never hold the interest of a soldier. Instead he worked out an educational program of study and training, military as well as vocational training.

MENTAL AND PHYSICAL EXERCISE

"A bright-eyed boy flat on his back studies models of airplanes, while another flat on his stomach and unable to move cuts out model planes like paper dolls. A man sitting up in bed can make a camouflage net. He scarcely realizes that the motions involved give him physical as well as mental exercise. Of course, care of the body is strongly emphasized. Bedridden soldiers with arms, legs, or both in a cast do setting-up exercise on hospital cots.

"This whole convalescent program is planned to stimulate the mind while coordinating the body. A soldier with a bad head wound learns telegraphy and taps out code signals. Men able to walk about a few hours a day take machine-shop work, learn to run a lathe, or use a printing press.

"Languages are taught with phonograph records from a simple textbook that is light enough for an invalid to handle and at the end of hospitalization a soldier who has completed an accredited amount of study is presented with a certificate just as though he were graduating from a college.

"This Army doctor's far-sighted plan sees men injured in industry learning a new trade or improving an old one while convalescing.

"Hospital time will never again be lost time, because of this constructive concept which has emerged in these days of destruction, this magnificent job of rehabilitation unheard of in the history of any other war."

HOUSE OF MIRACLES

Describing the work of Colonel Brown, Hoving said:

"In the last war Dr. Brown became familiar with men whose disfiguring wounds prevented them from leading normal lives. He is today chief surgeon of a large Army hospital, and his brilliant work in restoring men has earned that hospital the title 'House of Miracles.'

"During a visit to an Army hospital I shook hands with a smiling soldier. His hand seemed no different than mine. When he first came into the hospital his hands were healed but full of bad scars, with the thumb and index finger so fixed that even the simplest hand movement was impossible. An X-ray showed multiple shell fragments in the hand. Each fragment had swirled around, tearing up nerves, arteries, and tendons.

"It was necessary to remove each piece of shell fragment. At this point our surgeon performed one of his most adroit operations, a split skin graft. This is how it was done. A flap of skin was lifted but not removed from the abdomen of the patient. The soldier's hand was fastened to his side and the skin flap was transplanted to his palm but not severed. It continued thus to receive nourishment until securely healed. Then and then only was his hand released from his side.

"Today our soldier has new hands. This is only one of the miracles in an Army hospital. Every day hundreds of men are given new hands, new bodies, and new hope.

TREATMENT OF BURNS

"In this war a very common disfiguring injury is burn. Pearl Harbor produced nearly a thousand burn victims within a few hours. In addition to the ghastly scars they leave, burns remove the skin, and without skin the vital life forces of the body escape. The patient wastes away before surgery can reach him. One soldier had received severe burns on both legs. He weighed 84 pounds when he arrived at the hospital. Skillful plastic surgery performed its miracles with series of grafts from unburned parts of his body, covering his legs with skin. Operation after operation was performed, because only a tiny square of skin can be grafted at a time to avoid shock.

"Plastic surgery is a long-range job. It takes numerous operations and slow healing. Today this soldier is back in the service. This case is a tribute to the cooperation and teamwork of every branch of the medical corps.

"For his dramatic contributions to plastic surgery, which gives the disfigured a resurgence of hope, the promise of a normal place in society, adding immeasurably to the morale of our fighting forces, I take great pride in making this award to Lt. Col. James Barrett Brown."

The luncheon at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel at which the presentations were made was attended by more than 1,500 guests of honor, including Vice Admiral Herbert F. Leary, Rear Admiral Edward U. Reed, Lt. Gen. George Brunert, Col. Oveta Culp Hobby, director of the WAC's; Col. Florence A. Blanchfield, superintendent of the Army Nurse Corps, and Capt. Sue S. Dauser, superintendent of the Navy Nurse Corps.

It was the eighth annual presentation of the American Design Awards, which until this year had been distributed in the fields of fashions and industry. Because men outstanding in efforts toward rehabilitation of war injured were selected this year, the program was entitled "The American Design for Living."

Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include two editorials—one from the New York Times of April 24, 1944, and one from the Manchester Union, Manchester, N. H., April 24, 1944—eulogizing the late Cardinal O'Connell:

[From the New York Times of April 24, 1944]

WILLIAM CARDINAL O'CONNELL

The influence of William Cardinal O'Connell extended far beyond the church which so signally honored him. Mourned by Catholics, Protestants, and Jews alike, he was recognized not only as a great prince of the church but as a leading figure in the contemporary life of New England and the Nation. He combined the prelate and the patriot.

Born in the mill slums of Lowell, he grew up in the era of the New England knownothings, keenly sensitive to the then widespread prejudice against Irish immigrants and their religion. His long life was proof that the lowliest among them could rise to power and usefulness as great as the old Puritan stock had considered exclusively theirs. Within the church his firm mind and extraordinary attainments soon recommended him for advancement and led him steadily along the road to Rome, where he was ordained a priest in 1884. His subsequent career made it almost inevitable that he should don the red hat of the Sacred College of Cardinals, which he wore for 33 years. Once more in Rome at 79 he was credited with a decisive role in the election of Pope Pius XII.

Cardinal O'Connell was an all around man, interested in whatever pertained to the life of the spirit. He was a finished musician, a powerful writer, a clear, sharp speaker, and an avid reader. His gift for languages was remarkable. He conversed fluently in Latin, French, Italian, German, and Spanish, and also spoke Russian, Syrian, and Japanese. As a citizen of the Republic he never held himself aloof from politics and bluntly criticized whatever displeased him. In Boston, where his popularity was immense and his influence finally predominant, he was always on the side of good government. Archbishop Spellman's tribute might well be his epitaph: "In him, love of country followed love of God, and nobly he served them both."

[From the Manchester (N. H.) Union of April 24, 1944]

CARDINAL O'CONNELL

Deeply mourned is the death of William Cardinal O'Connell. The first loss is that of his beloved church, which he served so zealously for so many years, but that bereavement is shared throughout the Christian world, for it has come to all to know of his eminence. Long ago, in the days of his youth, his piety, humility, and ability were recognized by his ecclesiastical superiors; long ago he was given heavy responsibility; and fully a generation ago, in recognition of his service to God, he was made cardinal, a prince of the church.

Cardinal O'Connell knew in detail of the life problems of his fellow men; he understood because he himself had known poverty and had surmounted it. Indeed, his career is a shining example of the truth that boyhood lack of advantages does not bar the attainment of greatness in this democracy.

So filled with the achievements was his career that it is difficult to select any single one for discussion, but surely the assignment requiring the greatest diplomacy came in 1905 when he was selected by the Vatican to stabilize the church in Japan and to convince the Japanese that Catholicism is universal.

How well he succeeded is evidenced in the fact that within a week of his return to Rome from Tokyo, he was appointed coadjutor to Archbishop Williams of Boston, with the right of succession. In 1911, some 4 years after the archbishop's death, he was made cardinal. As was then written: "Joy among the people of all faiths prevailed."

Cardinal O'Connell was in his eighty-fifth year at time of death. Illness and the infirmities of age had prevented him from taking the active role that he so much desired, but the instruments of good that he had designed and utilized throughout his long and honorable life remained as the rule and guide of others. And will remain. He himself has gone to his reward, but the good that he did is a compelling force. It is among his finest monuments.

Forty Years of Presidents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Silver Spring Standard, Silver Spring, Md., Friday, April 21, 1944:

FORTY YEARS OF PRESIDENTS

The feature of the fiftieth birthday party of the Columbia Historical Society held last week in the Mayflower Hotel was the illustrated talk by George Harris of the firm of Harris & Ewing. Mr. Harris' career in Washington is almost as long as the history of the society itself and his informal and unrehearsed speech held the 300 guests enthralled for 2 hours.

Mr. Harris, born in Wales, first worked as a news photographer in San Francisco and was sent to Washington in 1904 to do special press work. He soon met President Roosevelt who insisted he open a studio in the Nation's Capital as none capable of fine work was then functioning. His first pictures of Teddy's cabinet launched an intimate discussion of great men from 1904 to 1944 but the greatest of these, he said, was Teddy himself.

From then on through the years Mr. Harris has photographed each President down to Franklin Delano Roosevelt and in several cases, the Presidents even came to his studio for sittings, rather than have him come to the White House; this was true of Calvin Coolidge, whom Mr. Harris admired for his puckish humor and sly wit.

Covering the peace conference in 1919 furnished Mr. Harris with many fine subjects for the photographer's camera and many more anecdotes for the historian's notebook. He photographed all the 64 delegates to the peace conference, many of them in informal poses, which are worth far more than their intrinsical value today. One particularly amusing story referred to his breaking into Buckingham Palace, along with a number of other newspapermen.

All in all, Mr. Harris' speech was one to be remembered, and he should be persuaded to make a recording of it so that posterity may hear it, perhaps even repeat it on the one hundredth aniversary of the Columbia Historical Society in 1944.

Only one charter member of the organization is alive today, Mr. Theodore Noyes, and he was unable to attend the banquet. However, he sent a message, which was read and broadcast over the radio by the president, Dr. F. Regis Noel, of Kensington, who is president of the society. The toastmaster of the evening was the Solicitor General of the United States, Charles Fahy.

A World Monetary Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am including an editorial entitled "A World Monetary Plan" which appeared in the New York Times of April 24.

It was my privilege to hear Mr. Morgenthau, Secretary of the Treasury, present his proposal on the establishment of an international monetary fund to a meeting of representatives of several committees of the House last Friday. After hearing the statement submitted by the Secretary, together with an explanation of the proposal, I arrived at the conclusion that this measure should not be hastily approved. A sound, stable, and financial policy is the basis of a prosperous domestic economy. This, in my opinion, is no time to scatter our gold to the four winds with the hope that it will bring peace and prosperity to all. Would it not be better for our own Nation to adopt a sound fiscal policy which would balance the budget and create within our own borders a financial Rock of Gibraltar to which other nations could tie in time of storm? An international monetary fund could eventually control the domestic economy of every country by controlling exchange rates, tariffs, and prices.

A WORLD MONETARY PLAN

Nowhere will international cooperation be more imperative after the war than with regard to national monetary systems and stable exchanges. Unfortunately, the proposal now announced for an $8,000,000,000 international stabilization fund misconceives the real nature of the problem to be solved.

The text of the joint statement begins with the assertion: "It is the consensus of opinion of the experts of the United and Associated Nations who have participated in these discussions that the most practical method of assuring international monetary cooperation is through the establishment of an international monetary fund." On the contrary, the most practical method of assuring international monetary cooperation is through sound economic, budgetary, credit and currency policies within each nation. If these exist, a huge international stabilization fund will be unnecessary. If these do not exist, an international monetary fund, no matter how large, will be worse than ineffective. It could not, in the end, support an unsound currency; but in attempting to do so it would drain part of the resources of the countries with sound currencies. To that extent it would make it more difficult for them to maintain their own soundness.

A huge world stabilization fund of the type now proposed is no more than a method by which the nations with strong currencies make loans to the nations with weak currencies. Each nation will be at any moment a net creditor or a net debtor to the fund. To the extent that the loans go bad, the net creditors will be the net losers. When nations wish to borrow abroad through private international channels, the private lenders, risking their own funds, can judge the probability of repayment with a purely business eye. They sometimes agree to make loans only if the borrowing country will change its economic or financial policies in this respect or that. Now, it is one thing for the private citizens to indicate distrust of a nation's currency; it is quite another thing for foreign governments to do so. It is also embarrassing for foreign governments, even though acting through a general fund, to demand minimum internal financial reforms within a nation before they will lend that nation money. An international stabilization fund could increase the sources of international friction rather than reduce them.

The principal need for world currency stabilization is sound internal policies in each country, not more international machinery. Each nation must want a stable currency enough to accept its necessary consequences. The greatest single contribution that the United States could make to world currency stability after the war would be to declare its determination to stabilize its own currency. It could do this by balancing the budget and by announcing that the dollar was no longer on a 24-hour basis, and subject to every rumor, but firmly anchored to a fixed quantity of gold. This would in turn give an anchor to other nations.

Other nations also would have to give up their faith in internal inflation as a cure for their ills. Our London correspondent reports the existence of an influential body of opinion in Great Britain that currency stability would be gained at too high a cost * * * if the supply of currency be tied to a rigid international standard when the internal situation demands a policy of expansion. But a nation cannot have currency stability and currency inflation at the same time. Nor can it expect other nations to underwrite its own expansionist policies by giving it a heavy drawing account on a fund to which they have contributed. Each nation should give up the fallacious idea that it is to its own advantage to devalue its currency and that it is hurting itself and conferring a favor on other nations when it does not. Each nation should give up the fallacious idea that it gains when it erects huge barriers to imports and loses when it lowers them; that it gains when it blocks its currency or forbids its citizens to export gold, capital, or credit. Each nation should give up the fallacious idea, in short, that it gains when it makes economic war upon its neighbors.

Not until this ideological reform is achieved will currencies be stable. If it is not achieved, any international stabilization fund must eventually break down. If it is achieved, complicated international machinery or huge funds will not be needed.

A Soldier Speaks on Vote Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, much has been said relative to the attitude of members of our armed forces regarding the soldiers' vote law. Some have made the statements that the soldiers were not interested while other statements have been made that were just to the contrary.

I received a copy of a letter that was written by Corp. Kenneth Russell, of St. Louis, Mo., who is now stationed somewhere in Italy. His letter was addressed to the United Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers of America, Local No. 1104, to which he belongs in St. Louis. This indicates the attitude of a soldier on the war front. Under the permission granted me, I include it as part of my remarks:

DEAR SIR: I received your letter today, telling me that you were trying to protect the boys in the service's right to vote.

I'm glad to hear that someone back home is trying to help the boys that are overseas, also those that are in the States (God's country).

If a man is old enough to fight for his country and hasn't the right to vote what kind of a country has he? What is he fighting for? Some of the boys back home think this is a big joke. It is plenty big but is no joke.

The workers at Wagner are doing a great job; tell them to keep up the good work.

KENNETH RUSSELL.

I have written to Corporal Russell, not so much about the law that the Congress passed but as to the law that the State of Missouri passed, especially telling him that the State of Missouri has just enacted a real soldiers' vote law, one that removes all the red tape. He can get a ballot by writing a postal card, a letter, sending a telegram or a radiogram, or one of his relatives can apply for the ballot for him. It does not require any affidavit of any kind nor does it require the signature of an officer or noncommissioned officer in the armed forces. It also provides, if necessary, for the short or Federal ballot.

Everything is going to be done by the State of Missouri to see that those in the armed forces do have the opportunity to vote in the primary and at the November election.

Transfer of Health Activities of Labor Department to United States Public Health Service

REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill this day which will transfer to the Federal Security Administrator and the Public Health Service, respectively, the functions of the Secretary of Labor and the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor with respect to health and for other purposes. This bill would transfer all health phases including industrial hygiene, which is now invested in parts 1 and 2 of title V of the Social Security Act as amended, to the Federal Security Administrator. It would transfer all appropriations and unexpended balances as well as personnel.

As a former State health director in Nebraska I have had the opportunity to observe the activities of the Labor Department as it relates to health. Since the Children's Bureau was established by an act of Congress on April 9, 1912, it has assumed increasing importance in all fields of health. The original act was set up to investigate the welfare of children and child life; to investigate orphanages, juvenile courts, desertions, dangerous occupations, accidents to children, employment of children, and State legislation affecting child labor. The first bill was introduced into the Congress in 1906 and became law April 9, 1912. At this time the Congress provided $25,640 for its work. The staff for the first year comprised only 15 people. The early work was experimental. The Bureau had no medical staff. They confined their work to social, industrial, and civic factors.

It is my thought that the United States Public Health Service should assume all the health activities now being performed in the Labor Department. They are doing much of this work now and by combining their activities we would eliminate duplications, confusion, and the waste of the taxpayers' money.

The Labor Department now conducts an expanding health department. They have the Division of Maternal and Child Health, a Division of Crippled Children, including rheumatic heart disease. There is a Division of Industrial Health which recently has been expanding its activities. This work is being duplicated in the United States Public Health Service. The Labor Department has an extensive vaccination program. They treat venereal disease. They undertake all health activities in connection with their maternal and child-health programs. Much is being duplicated by the Public Health Service. They have a legal definition of a child as anyone under 21 years of age. The United States Public Health Service and the Labor Department each have a large group of investigators and personnel who constantly travel throughout the country visiting the State health departments helping them to set up a program of health activities. The Labor Department and the Children's Bureau have, in addition, a large force of social workers whose main purpose is to socialize health activities. Both bureaus audit the books of the State health departments, check their moneys, propose and pass on health activities, many of which duplicate each other.

In the matter of industrial hygiene we find the Labor Department rapidly expanding their activities. There are now 38 State health departments with a number of county and city departments engaged in industrial hygiene activities. These political subdivisions have about 550 people and are spending more than $3,000,000 in all health phases of industrial hygiene. The public health authorities are doing a splendid job in controlling industrial activities affecting health. It should not be duplicated by the Labor Department.

Each department has certain funds available for matching purposes with the State. The Children's Bureau under the Department of Labor gets its funds under the Social Security Act. The United States Public Health Service derives its money from the Federal Security Agency under titles V and VI. It is all the taxpayers' money. It is my experience as State health director to find that these two agencies and the personnel in the health departments are jealous of each other. Each wants to expand his health activities. The confusion of plans and conflict of ideas made it difficult for State health directors to coordinate their programs to the best interests of the public. I am convinced that if all the health activities were under one head with moneys and plans spent with one objective in view, that we could eliminate much duplication and confusion in the promotion of better public health.

I believe that all accident prevention, wages, hours, and unemployment should come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor, but I do not believe that the Department of Labor and the Children's Bureau should engage in health activities now being carried on by the United States Public Health Service.

Before introducing the bill I wrote a letter to all the State health departments and the State medical societies in the United States. All replies to date are favorable to the purposes of the bill. I feel it will have nearly 100 percent approval by health authorities. It should have the approval of the Appropriation Committee and the Members of Congress because it makes for efficiency in health activities, it eliminates confusion and duplication and will save the taxpayers' money.

Statement of Ex-Gov. James M. Cox

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement made by ex-Gov. James M. Cox on his seventy-fourth birthday. This statement is worthy of the consideration of all thoughtful people:

My thinking of the peace now is as it was in 1920. The star that Woodrow Wilson followed is still my light and guide. He warned us in words that are now prophecy fulfilled.

I cannot believe, following these years of torment and suffering, that a civilized world will permit to be destroyed the noblest project conceived by mankind. Nor can there be, in the face of our tragic mistake, another triumph in this country for a political cabal such as blasted our hopes a quarter of a century ago.

We have feasted so long at the table of the gods that we cease to regard our fortune as a gift, but take it rather as a right. When emergency compels any trespass upon our bounty, we do not respond with our better selves. We complain and criticize. As our comforts and conveniences are disturbed, demagogues try to take our minds from the Nation's great achievements of war to things so little and so relatively unimportant that we should reproach ourselves for even thinking of them.

This leads us to nag and hamper our leaders with energies that might better be employed against the enemy. Thousands of us presume to know more about the direction of armies than General Marshall and of naval strategy than Admiral King.

We should long ago have learned the dangers of such back-seat driving. Our assumption of superior knowledge runs also in other directions. We are reading in the press and hearing over the radio a continuing inquiry into the necessary secrets of the war movement. What went on at the conferences at Cairo and Teheran? What did President Roosevelt say to Premier Stalin? What did Stalin say to Mr. Churchill? And so on and on. A man from Mars might easily assume that we think these leaders are stupid or unfair when the facts are obviously otherwise.

There will doubtless be future differences to adjust, but I have never known a personal quarrel to be bettered by neighborhood meddling. Too many editors, columnists, and commentators demand the details of the most confidential situation. What could they do about it if they know? There would be wide differences of opinion not only as among them, but their readers and hearers as well. There would be no agreement, no solution, only worse confusion. We must trust our leaders. A million commanders cannot win a war.

Every member of our military forces back from overseas, with whom I have talked tells me that in the hour of peril he was in communion with his God. I am wondering whether the rest of us would not better be closer to God and seek removal of the pettiness of our natures. Let us ask Him to destroy the idols of our partisan politics. Well might we ask Him to make us deserve the coming fruits of a tranquil world.

In the First World War we fought for the preservation of democracy. That is what we are striving for now. That is what the boys at the front are fighting for. It is for us, by putting patriotism above politics to demonstrate that democracy can be made to work in war; and then, after peace has come, to work in the adjustments of a lasting peace.

Dangerous Tinkering

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 20, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the fact that the Congress limited the Price Control Act so that it has now to be reenacted witnesses the wisdom of forcing a review of what has always been dangerous tinkering, namely, price fixing by Government fiat as against competitive prices and profits. Was Congress so foolish as to limit the duration of the act on the theory that the duration of the war would be similarly limited and so the need for the legislation would be over after June 1944? Of course not. The conditions under which war-induced scarcities can be rationed and fixed in price, with efficient and economical production and consumption as the end in view, have been ill-defined and require careful review by the representatives of the people, who are compelled to see the difficulties involved from all angles and not alone from the viewpoint of the Administrator of the act, and certainly not just from the viewpoint of individual constituents who have been on the other end of the headaches which are involved in bureaucracy.

That which is most to be feared is not that the act will be amended, but that it will not be amended at all, or not so as to reduce the blind alleys and dilemmas which have become so obvious. Proposed amendments have been commented on succinctly in a recent editorial in the Washington Post under the above heading, Dangerous Tinkering. In disagreement with this comment let me quote that part which relates to discrimination and subsidies favoring high-cost producers:

Heading the list (of amendments) is a proposal to strike out the word "generally" from the text of the present law requiring ceiling prices to be "generally fair and equitable." The effect of that omission would be to compel O. P. A. to fix maximum prices for specific products at levels that would guarantee reasonable returns to the highest-cost producer, no matter how inefficient he might be. Such a proposal would boost price ceilings to cover marginal production costs, thereby giving extra high profits to lower-cost producers. Mr. Bowles explained (to the House committee) that companies unable to make a profit under existing price regulations can ask O. P. A. for relief. Then, if the output of the high-cost marginal producer is considered essential, he can be given relief in the form of a subsidy. But it would be a costly sort of folly for the Government to fix prices so high as to assure every individual businessman a profit regardless of his efficiency. Such a policy, according to Mr. Bowles, would spell the death knell of private enterprise.

Just what is the most costly sort of folly in this connection is open to serious dispute, particularly as related to the problem of financing the war by taxation. If giving extra high profits to lower-cost producers is the way to the cheapest and most efficient production, it is also obvious that that is the way to collect the most taxes for financing the war in general. It is well to remember that under an income tax the more the national income is concentrated in the hands of the few, the less inflationary it becomes because tax revenues are then a greater proportion of income. Inflation can be countered most effectively when money is not being saved but is entering into those income payments which can be and are absorbed in largest proportion by the income tax. Just such issues as these are involved in the question of amendment of the act to ease as much as possible the extreme complexities in which it has become involved.

As evidence that there are two sides to the question raised as to whether "generally fair and equitable" is a wise wording as it stands, I offer the analysis of Prof. Lewis Haney, of New York University, from an article published by the Commercial and Financial Chronicle on March 9, as follows:

It should be clear that, since one basis for rationing is scarcity, everything possible should be done to increase the available supply quantity for all needy cases. This can be done most effectively in only two general ways: (1) By encouraging production, and (2) by discouraging unnecessary consumption. Thus the wholesale price of the rationed goods will ordinarily be high. It should be high enough to stimulate the maximum output, especially from those superior producers who have great resources and low costs. It should be high enough to prevent purchases for wasteful (unnecessary) consumption. * * *

In no case, however, should the "subsidy" policy as hitherto practiced be extended. That policy has failed to recognize that marginal or high-cost production exists or should exist, among all producers—that "marginal" production is not limited to a few "marginal producers." Even the company having the lowest average cost per unit of product can and should have a marginal cost as high as that of the least efficient company. If the low-cost mine does not use its resources so intensively that it produces all that it can without producing any unit at a loss, it fails to do all that it can for society. Incidentally, it fails to make the highest possible net return for itself.

Nothing in the nature of a subsidy should be given, or "extended", which is not an addition to the flat price. Such an addition is not a subsidy, in the current sense of the term, but is a general raise in the price of a commodity. Never should a subsidy be paid merely to "marginal producers" as distinguished from others. If we pay a high price to a "high-cost producer" to induce him to increase his output, we should also pay a high price to the "low-cost producer" to encourage him to increase his output. Usually, the largest potential addition to supply is in the hands of the more efficient concerns which are already operating profitably. Assuming competition, just raise the price and they will expand their outputs at their ("intensive") margins.

This takes care of much of the current foggy discussion about "newcomers" and the "preservation of pre-war competition conditions" in various industries. The simple, clear-cut way is to invite new production into each industry in which increased scarcity exists. This new production may come from old-comers or new-comers, but it should come competitively from any and all who choose to produce efficiently and economically.

A Plea for Abundance Made by the Farmers National Union to the Republican Conference at Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, at the Republican conference held at Chicago April 3 and 4, 1944, the Farmers National Union submitted the following program to the Republican committee on agriculture. This was done at the request of the committee itself.

This program presents a most forward-looking plan of action on the part of those engaged in food production, and at the same time shows a deep determination to win this war and guard against a post-war period of depression. The matter is of such outstanding importance that I submit the whole program herewith:

FARMERS UNION MAKES PLEA FOR ABUNDANCE AT CHICAGO MEETING

We believe that the following specific objectives for our Nation, and for agriculture in particular, will contribute to the peace and security of all people everywhere.

We are urgent in stating our proposals because we are determined that this Nation shall not repeat its tragic errors following World War No. 1 and attempt to return to an economy of scarcity and fear when an economy of abundance and freedom from want is at hand. The spigots of production are today pouring forth abundance for war. They will continue to pour forth abundance for peace unless deliberately turned off. That must not happen.

FAMILY-TYPE FARM

Our Nation's Constitution establishes a Government of, by, and for the people. Agricultural programs which undermine and destroy people within agriculture weaken our Nation and subvert the constitutional purpose of our Government. We believe that American agricultural policy should be built on the solid foundation of the family-type farm, operated by its owner. Existing large-scale, factory-type, farming units must be required to cease exploitation of human beings and the sacrifice of human welfare and security by which they make a fictitious claim to "efficiency"; they must be required to meet wage and working conditions that will permit the workers they employ to live at decent, American levels.

We do not propose a Ghandi-like return to primitive methods, but the use of the most modern machinery, methods, and devices, including cooperation, to promote the security and welfare of the farm family. Family-type, owner-operated farms must not become the barren homes of a rural peasantry. They must afford adequate incomes for a decent level of family living after farm operating expenses and fixed charges have been met. They should be served by the most modern form of energy (electrical or other), equipped with modern machinery and tools, and have upon them healthful and attractive buildings. The families operating these farms must have the best social and community services, such as roads, schools, health programs, and recreational facilities that our demonstrated ability to produce abundantly can offer.

ABUNDANCE

Maintenance of democracy requires that our economic organization function at capacity levels of production, and that it distribute this production widely. Future American citizens, be they rural or urban, will not tolerate the nonsensical paradox of idle workers, idle factories, and idle acres. Poverty in the midst of "surpluses" must be banished from our society. There must be real freedom from want, for we have demonstrated our capacity to produce. That is the most practical advice that can be given those who would return to an economy of scarcity. Time will prove them tragically, if not fatally, impractical, should they fail to heed it. The democratic processes cannot be maintained in a society so beset with monopolies, trade barriers and favoritism to selfish interests that restricted production, want, starvation and disease result. Only force can maintain such an order.

We reject proposals to let our national income fall to $100,000,000,000 per year, because, at this level, agriculture's net income would fall from the 1943 level of 12 billion to 7 billion, leaving 1,000,000 members of farm families unemployed and destitute, 500,000 farm laborers unemployed, and a million farm war veterans without opportunity to find security on the land. They would drift from farm to city and back, competing with each other for more and more of less and less.

The war has demonstrated to the American people that abundance is upon us. They will not tolerate a return to scarcity. We are going to learn to live with abundance and like it.

The National Farmers' Union insists upon the full use of all our human and material resources for production. Nothing less is enough to save the peace.

FAMILY OF NATIONS

We believe the day has long since passed when each and every nation of the world can exercise the full and absolute powers of national sovereignty without regard to their effects on other nations. Within one generation the world has been engulfed in two devastating wars, each more murderous, more costly, more devastating than anything ever before witnessed in the history of man. If we are not to make a pure mockery of civilization, then our country—the most influential in all the world—must accept cheerfully and eagerly its share of the responsibility for peace and freedom. The United States must abandon the policy of isolation, and henceforward assume a sound, constructive, realistic, and cooperative role in shaping the future of the entire world.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGE

Our society, in prosperity and in depression, in peace and in war, has long been handicapped by concentration of wealth, opportunity, economic power, and by the narrow distribution of educational, recreational, and social opportunities; too much political power gathered into the hands of a few; and too little opportunity for all citizens to participate effectively in our democratic processes.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIVE BILLION DOLLAR INCOME

The continuing spectacle of a three-ring circus, in which agriculture fights labor, industry and labor fight each other, and all three are incited to mistrust their own Government, can lead only to national suicide. We must have a $175,000,000,000 national income or all will fail. They must meet, through their Government, and by democratic process achieve a $175,000,000,000 national income; otherwise this Nation and each of these groups will slip into fascism, which has only contempt for political parties, legislatures, and the people's will expressed at democratic assemblages such as this. We are producing at a rate in excess of $150,000,000,000 this year, with 10,000,000 of our most productive men and women engaged in war. A $175,000,000,000 peacetime goal is easily attainable.

Because of the very nature of farming, the national interest requires that agriculture receive due consideration in the way of public policies. Farmers as a group do not want special privileges in the sense that they want to benefit at the expense of other groups in society. It will be wise for Government to recognize the nature of agricultural production and adapt Government policies and programs to fit the needs of agriculture.

STEPS URGED

1. Real stabilization of wartime economy to prevent inflation.
2. One hundred percent tax on profits in sale of land.
3. Annual goals for agricultural production.
4. Maintenance of farm credit agencies.
5. Protection from disasters, like floods and storms.
6. Retirement of submarginal land by United States Government.
7. All farmers to be required to carry out conservation policies.
8. Improvement of marketing efficiency by loans, regulation, and grading.
9. Overhauling of present freight rates.
10. Expansion of farm cooperative marketing organizations.
11. Improved family living, especially betterment of housing.
12. Health, medical, and hospital services within ability to pay.
13. Benefits of social security to be extended to farm groups.
14. Distribution of war surpluses to serve the people.
15. Continuation of heavy public expenditures when needed.
16. Active participation of the United States in world Affairs.

CONCLUSION

Today, in a million farm homes thoughts run from the plans for the 1944 ploughing, planting, and harvesting to the son or daughter, sister or husband who, half way round the world, is fighting to keep that home, that farm, free and secure. Farm people, more than ever before, are concerned about the future, about the organization of a lasting peace. They are, we believe, determined that after this war we shall go forward to new freedom, new opportunity, new security; that we shall end the 40 years of wandering in a man-made wilderness of scarcity and finally enter into the promised land of plenty. They are ready and, we believe, determined to learn to live with abundance and like it.

What Is Wrong With the So-Called G. I. Bill of Rights?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Millard W. Rice, national service director of the Disabled American Veterans, delivered over Station WINX, Washington, D. C., April 5, 1944.

This important bill will be considered by the House in the near future. I entertain a very high regard for both Mr. Rice and the veterans' organization which he so ably represents, but I do not necessarily agree with some of his expressed views herein. Nevertheless, his address illustrates the importance and the need for serious and searching study of the manifold veterans' problems and the further necessity of serious study of the proposed legislation by every Member of this House.

Mr. Rice's speech follows:

During the time so kindly extended to me by this radio station, I propose to tell briefly what is wrong with the so-called G. I. bill of rights now being considered in the House of Representatives of our United States Congress. My remarks in opposition to several of its proposals should prove of interest, particularly to fellow fathers of sons in service, to fellow veterans, to fellow service-disabled veterans, and their dependents, and to fellow taxpayers.

Everyone, I believe, agrees that those who have served actively in the armed forces of the United States, in its most hazardous employment during time of war, deserve some extra consideration by reason of so serving. Every American citizen is desirous of accomplishing the greatest good for the greatest number of servicemen and servicewomen, as nearly as feasible, proportionate to their sacrifices, with the least possible bad aftereffects as to others.

Careful consideration, therefore, should be given to determine the very best method by which to provide justifiable post-war adjustments for America's veterans of World War No. 2. Much better methods, with considerably less ultimate cost to America's taxpayers, can be devised then as provided for in this G. I. bill, which, after being recently passed by the United States Senate, is now before the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Its principal provisions are still badly in need of additional drastic changes, if existing benefits and pending legislation on behalf of America's disabled war veterans, and their dependents, are not to be unduly jeopardized.

America's first obligation is to those of its citizens who have sacrificed a part of their bodies, or a part of their health by reason of their service in the armed forces; that is, to our disabled war veterans, and their dependents. First things should be done first. I submit to you that America's disabled veterans have not yet been adequately provided for, nor have their dependents. Proposed legislation, for example, to provide the same dependency allowances to the service connected disabled of America, as Canada has long provided for its service disabled veterans, is still pending. Our Federal Government has actually been guilty of discouraging its service connected disabled veterans from getting married, and has in effect, encouraged those who have gotten married to exercise birth control. It has really been responsible for causing many married disabled veterans, who have become totally disabled and unemployable, to go into Veterans' Administration hospitals and domiciliary facilities, in order that their wives and children might be able to obtain more of the necessities of life out of their small compensation and pension payments.

Why should our rich American Nation continue to be so niggardly as to its war-disabled veterans? At the present low rate of $100 per month for those who are totally disabled, unemployable, they cannot possibly provide a decent existence standard of living for themselves and their families—to maintain the vaunted American way of life for which they lost their employability.

The so-called G. I. bill of rights provides for education for those veterans who had 6 months or more of service, for a period of 1 year, plus an additional month of training for each additional month of service, so long as satisfactory marks were obtained, in an approved school, for a total period not exceeding 4 years, during which the veteran would receive the sum of $50 per month from the Veterans' Administration, and, if married, the sum of $75 per month. If from 7 to 10 percent took advantage of this provision, it would cost about $1,000,000,000, so if 50 percent of them did, the cost would go up to six or seven billion dollars. The Veterans' Administration has heretofore been the one Federal agency delegated primarily to deal with the problems of service-disabled veterans, including vocational rehabilitation where needed, and, if it is also given the same responsibility potentially as to millions of able-bodied veterans, it will naturally be apt to give less attention to the more complicated problems of disabled veterans. Post-war education for the able-bodied veterans should more appropriately be assumed by the various States, or, if Federal assistance is needed, by the Office of Education.

Another important title of this bill would provide unemployment compensation benefits to discharged veterans during periods of unemployment during the first 24 months after the termination of their mustering-out payments, not exceeding 52 weeks, and for not more than 8 weeks for each 4 weeks of active service, at the rate of $15 per week, plus dependency allowances which could bring the total up to $25 per week—a higher rate than paid in practically every State.

If from 7 to 10 percent of the veterans of World War No. 2 benefited by this provision, it would, according to Senator GEORGE, cost about $1,000,000,000, but if 75 percent should need such benefits, then the cost could go up to $10,000,000,000. This attempt to underwrite the economic maladjustments of veterans following this war, definitely being the wrong approach to the problem, would almost surely fail of its purpose, and thus give rise to no end of demands for further extensions thereto, whereupon the cost could go into the scores of billions of dollars.

Able-bodied veterans who desire gainful suitable employment would probably find lessened opportunities therefor by reason of the fact that higher unemployment compensation rates were available for them. Employers would then have an inducement to extend actual preference of employment to nonveterans, because during unemployment they would be eligible for lower rates of State unemployment compensation benefits, paid for, in effect, by the employer, whereas, during unemployment those veterans would be entitled to higher rates of Federal unemployment compensation.

Much dissatisfaction would, moreover, arise among the veterans themselves when they found that they had exhausted their rights to such Federal unemployment compensation benefits, after which they would receive the lower State rates of unemployment compensation, if entitled thereto. Such State unemployment compensation benefits as might have been frozen to their credit might, in the meantime, have expired, unless all such State laws are further amended. What will be the result when various groups of citizens make comparisons as to their respective Federal and State unemployment compensation benefits? A much better system would be to give an accrual of credits for unemployment compensation purposes on the basis of the length of each person's military or naval service, to be available to the board of unemployment compensation in the State in which any such person may subsequently reside, and thus to be paid to him according to State standards.

The worst part of this so-called omnibus bill which, by some has been referred to as the "ominous" bill, is that it would be administered by the Veterans' Administration, which has had no background of experience concerning the many complications involved.

The Veterans' Administration ought not to be the Federal agency to provide those post-war adjustments for able-bodied veterans. Proponents of the so-called G. I. bill have insisted that the discharged veterans ought to go only to one place to get all of the pertinent information and assistance that they might need relative to any benefits to which they might be entitled. Surely the Veterans' Administration contact officers, if not also the representatives of the various veteran organizations, should be thoroughly prepared to inform each veteran as to all of the various Federal and State benefits that he might be eligible for, but, even if the Veterans' Administration were to be delegated to administer all of such post-war adjustments, any such veteran would inevitably have to go to more than one office to receive the benefits to which he might be lawfully and equitably entitled. Therefore, if there is one place where he can get all of the necessary information as to what he is entitled to, under certain circumstances, then the fact that he may have to go to several different Federal agencies or several different divisions or bureaus of one agency is not of any particular importance. It is, however, important that the Veterans' Administration, which is already overloaded with fast expanding responsibilities for the fast increasing number of disabled dischargees, should not become further overloaded by being required also to administer other new types of potentially costly Federal benefits, for which its officials and employees have had no background of experience.

This so-called G. I. bill of rights, primarily for able-bodied veterans, has already in effect been given the right of way and has shoved to one side other very important, badly needed, and highly justifiable legislative bills on behalf of service-disabled veterans and their dependents.

If the various new types of proposed benefits for able-bodied veterans, as to which there have been no precedents following any previous war, are to be provided for federally, then they should be administered by those Federal agencies which have had an appropriate background of experience, rather than by the Veterans' Administration, so as not to interfere with existing and pending benefits for service-disabled veterans and their dependents.

I am of the opinion, however, that inasmuch as only a small portion of the able-bodied veterans of World War No. 2 are designed to be benefited by this so-called G. I. bill, primarily on a "needs" basis, it would be much preferable that every man and woman who has served should be compensated for the loss of civilian opportunities while so serving by being given adjusted-service pay in the form of an adjusted-service bond, the amount of which could be computed on an earned-rights basis according to the length and place of service of each such person. The amount of such bond could then be made redeemable in monthly installments in the event of need therefor during periods of unemployment or while going to school, or larger amounts could be redeemable in order to buy or improve a farm or home or business, thus giving a free choice to each veteran as to how to use such adjusted-service pay. If it be granted that an adjusted-service pay ought eventually to be extended to discharged veterans of World War No. 2, then it ought to be the first legislation to be enacted for all such veterans, following the precedent established after the First World War. Such adjusted-service method would prove to be much more equitable as to all veterans on an "earned rights" basis and would require much less bureaucratic control and expense. Better still, it would not become the responsibility of the Veterans' Administration and thus could not interfere with or jeopardize existing or proposed benefits for disabled ex-servicemen or their dependents. Moreover, such adjusted-service-pay method would probably eliminate the need for any other type of post-war adjustment for able-bodied veterans, such as those provided for in the G. I. bill of rights.

Legislation for America's discharged veterans should first be provided for on a merits basis rather than a needs basis.

It would be very unfortunate to have the so-called G. I. bill of rights enacted in its present form for it would tend to divide up the country between veterans and nonveterans, thereby developing many more difficulties. The economic maladjustments of our country cannot be solved for its veterans alone, and any attempt to do so will give rise to no end of misunderstandings, bitterness, recriminations, and demands for additional legislation to straighten out the resulting inadequacies and inequalities, ultimately necessitating an expenditure of many more billions of dollars than would be the case by a reasonable "earned rights" adjustment as to every discharged veteran, supplemented by advanced detailed planning to take care of the economic maladjustments of the Nation in such a way as to give to every citizen, thus including its discharged veterans, the opportunity for gainful, suitable, useful employment.

The adjusted-service pay method of providing compensated discharged service persons for their loss of civilian opportunities while actively engaged in the armed forces, measured accordingly on an earned-rights basis, according to length and place of service, for every person who so served, including those who come back handicapped by service disabilities, would be the most equitable and practical method, and the least complicated and bureaucratic. Best of all it would not need to be administered by the Veterans' Administration, and therefore would not jeopardize existing benefits and badly needed pending legislation for war-disabled veterans and their dependents, and for the widows and orphans of those who have died in, or by reason of, active war service.

Those post-war adjustments that can be justified on a "merit," or an "earned rights" basis, whether for disabled veterans, for their dependents, for the widows and orphans of those who have died, or for able-bodied veterans, should be the first legislative proposals to be enacted into law. America's just obligations to those who have served, to those who having served have thereby sacrificed a part of their bodies or their health, and to the dependents of those who have given their very lives, should first be taken care of before going into a new "doles" system. First things should be taken care of first.

Radio Broadcast of Proceedings of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILL ROGERS, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. ROGERS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

SANTA MONICA, CALIF., April 17, 1944.
Congressman WILL ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At the last regular meeting of the Santa Monica Bay District Central Labor Council the following resolution was concurred in unanimously:

"Whereas the affairs of Congress and of Government in general are vital to every citizen; and

"Whereas no present method exists to provide full information to the average citizen about the real happenings in our Congress; and

"Whereas radio is the simplest and most effective medium for communicating with every American in every part of the country; and

"Whereas New Zealand adopted a program of short-wave broadcasts of the proceedings of its parliament, and has successfully demonstrated that full knowledge by citizens of the affairs of government stimulates and strengthens the democratic system; and

"Whereas our Congress could lease radio time from one or more networks, several important and powerful stations, or broadcast by short wave all important debates, excepting such matters as might jeopardize national security during this war: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we propose and urge upon Congress enactment of the necessary measures to establish a Nation-wide broadcast of its proceedings; and be it further

"Resolved, That we communicate with each political party asking that this proposal be considered and included in the program adopted at its next convention; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Vice President WALLACE, to the Members of Congress, to the press, and to the sponsors."

Respectfully,

C. G. O'BRIEN,
Secretary.

Women's Army Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I have this day introduced to the House of Representatives a bill to amend the law establishing the Women's Army Corps. My amendment, in simple terms, will provide that the commanding officer of the Women's Army Corps shall be a major general.

At the present time, by statute, the commanding officer of the Women's Army Corps is given the rank of colonel. My amendment would raise her rank to that of major general. You may ask, "Why the necessity of giving the commanding officer of the Women's Army Corps the rank of major general?" I answer that such would be simple justice and proper recognition of a great organization which is taking an increasingly active part in the great conflict in which we are engaged.

Under the tables of organization of the Army, a colonel is normally placed in command of a regiment, and a major general is normally placed in command of an Army division. In addition to this fact, two brigadier generals are assigned to each combat division, one to serve as assistant commander of the division and the other to serve as artillery officer of the division. Under the old tables of organization of the Army, an Army division was composed of 25,000 troops; but under the new set-up of our armed forces, 15,000 men now constitute an Army division. The Women's Army Corps is composed of approximately 70,000 young women at the present time; and efforts are being made to greatly expand this organization until it will be composed of many additional thousands of WAC's. Considering present enlistments only as a field organization, the enlisted strength of the WAC's would be divided into almost 5 divisions; and if given the number of general officers which the tables of organization of the Army require for combat troops, it would have assigned to it 5 major generals and 10 brigadier generals. Instead of this assignment, we find only one colonel in the WAC's, and she is the commanding officer.

To me, comparisons with the British method or the methods of any other government, are often odious, and certainly not very persuasive with our people. It is interesting to note, however, that the British women's organization is known as the Women's Auxiliary Territorial Force and that its commanding officer has the corresponding rank of brigadier general in our Army.

The WAC's are doing a great job for the Nation during this time of critical shortage of manpower. The Army is having difficulty recruiting the number of young women needed in the war effort, and I think that recognition of this kind, recognizing the proper rank of the commanding officer, and distributing promotions down the line to lesser officers in proportion to the responsibilities of their services, will have a very fine effect upon recruiting of the WAC's and upon the morale of those already in service. We cannot treat this organization as a cast-off shoe and expect it to do its best work. This action is simply a just recognition of a large component part of our Army, and should be put into effect as soon as possible.

The Late William Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD J. WELCH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following splendid editorial from the Washington Evening Star of April 24, 1944:

CARDINAL O'CONNELL

If Emerson is right when he argues that "the genius of our life is jealous of individuals and will not have any individual great, except through the general," the career of such a man as William Cardinal O'Connell is easy to understand. The great leader of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in the United States came to his high office straight from the folk. He was a child of the masses, eleventh born in a poor family of the mill town of Lowell. His infancy and his early youth were spent under conditions of poverty and frustration. He was hurt by the then prevailing prejudice against immigrants from Ireland and their religion. To the end of his life he could not forget certain sorrowful experiences with militant intolerance.

But Cardinal O'Connell was possessed of strength equal to his need. Step by step he developed the powers that were in his mind and soul. By nature a scholar and through rigid discipline a toiler, he made himself master of a vast realm of knowledge from which it was possible for him to draw practical achievements of incalculable value to hundreds of thousands of Americans who even now may not be conscious of their debt to him. Ordained a priest at Rome in 1884, he was granted a ministry lasting nearly six full decades. The award of the red hat was an honor which he earned by his devotion and his labor. He might have won similar success in any other field of endeavor and dedication that he might have chosen, but it was his deliberate and consecrated choice to apply his talents to the church. As a fluent linguist, a convincing orator, a persuasive writer, a competent musician, a theologian and philosopher of supreme distinction, he contributed to the progress of the whole Christian movement in his time.

Cardinal O'Connell also will be remembered as a patriot of wide vision and hope. He was not narrow. In any cause of mutual concern he gladly worked with persons and groups who were not of his own immediate flock. His beliefs were conservative and he always was ready to do battle for them, yet he was not bigoted nor unreasonable. For nearly 33 years he symbolized modern New England in the Sacred College. He was 80 when he went on his last journey to the Holy See to share in the election of Pope Pius XII. Now his striving is done. He leaves many magnificent buildings with which his name always will be associated, but the monument which longest should endure is that which he raised in the recollection of the public which he served.

Golden Wedding Anniversary of Dr. and Mrs. Theodore J. C. Stellhorn, of Sandusky, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. WEICHEL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today is the golden wedding anniversary of Dr. and Mrs. Theodore J. C. Stellhorn, of Sandusky, Ohio. The doctor is a distinguished churchman and both are leaders in the Lutheran Church. I want to pay tribute to them and extend my sincere congratulations, and include the following from the Sandusky Register-Star-News:

DR. AND MRS. STELLHORN CELEBRATE GOLDEN WEDDING ANNIVERSARY TUESDAY

Dr. and Mrs. Theodore J. C. Stellhorn will celebrate their golden wedding anniversary Tuesday, April 25.

A celebration in honor of the occasion has been planned to include not only the families of Dr. and Mrs. Stellhorn but also the Zion Lutheran congregational family, among whom they have spent almost the entire 50 years of their married life.

The celebrating couple was married in 1894 in the old Zion Lutheran Church on the Courthouse Square. Dr. August Dornbirer, oldest brother of Mrs. Stellhorn, officiated at the ceremony. He was the pastor of Zion Church at that time, having followed his father, Rev. Jacob Dornbirer, as pastor of the church.

Mr. George Windisch, of Sandusky, and Miss Ada Loy, of Columbus, Ohio, were the attendants. They are both still living and have been invited to join in the festivities of the golden anniversary.

The first 3 years of their married life the honored couple spent in Fort Wayne, Ind., where Dr. Stellhorn was pastor of Grace Lutheran Church, which he had organized in 1892. Since November 1897 they have made their home in Sandusky, where Dr. Stellhorn first served as assistant pastor of Zion Church, and since 1907 as pastor in charge.

HAVE FAMILY DINNER

Tuesday noon the brothers and sisters of Dr. and Mrs. Stellhorn, together with their immediate families, will gather for a large family dinner in the church meeting rooms. The wives of the vestrymen and several women who served the dinner for the fortieth anniversary will cook and serve the dinner. Mrs. Fred Harple is in charge of the committee. Rev. and Mrs. J. A. Griffith, of St. Paul Lutheran Church, Sandusky, Rev. and Mrs. A. J. Braun, and Mrs. John E. Braun, of Trinity Lutheran Church, of Venice, and Rev. and Mrs. Edwin E. Prange, of Monroeville, have been invited as guests for the dinner.

At 8 o'clock Tuesday evening the membership of Zion Church has been invited to join in the celebration. A brief service of thanksgiving has been arranged for that time in which the congregational family will join.

SON CONDUCTS SERVICE

The service will be conducted by Rev. Theo. Stellhorn, Jr., the junior pastor of Zion Church and the son of Dr. and Mrs. Stellhorn. The only brother of Dr. Stellhorn in the active ministry, Rev. Ernst C. Stellhorn of Ann Arbor, Mich., will deliver the congratulatory address. Rev. Ernst Stellhorn married the former Miss Ann Dornbirer, a sister of the bride of 50 years ago. The senior choir of Zion Church will participate in the service and sing the Latvian spiritual, My God and I, under the direction of Mr. Harold Parker. Miss Helen Louise Reeme, the organist of Zion Church, will preside at the organ for the occasion.

Following the service of thanksgiving, Dr. and Mrs. Stellhorn will receive their friends at the main entrance of the church if Mrs. Stellhorn's health will permit. The many friends of the couple in the community at large are invited to attend this service Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

Dr. and Mrs. Stellhorn have four children who will all join them in celebrating their golden wedding anniversary. The oldest, Luther W. Stellhorn, resides in Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. Howard Hughes lives in Syracuse, N. Y.; Rev. Theo. Stellhorn, Jr., has served as assistant to his father for the past 16 years, and the youngest of the 4 children, Katherine, is at home with her parents.

Petition of the Farmers of Upper Montgomery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the petition of the farmers of Upper Montgomery:

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the farmers of Upper Montgomery, in convention assembled, respectfully petition that early aid be given to more farm labor, the implement and tractor makers, and nitrate plants for the production of more and cheaper fertilizer, so that the impending shortage of food stuffs and feeds may not be so severe. And this must be done at once, because if the farmers are not in a position to plant 60 percent more wheat by September the war may be lost, due to lack of food for the Army and the civilian population. No more men should be taken from the farms and enlisted farm boys in this country returned to their own farms for spring harvest and corn cutting and wheat drilling in fall. Mr. McNutt will also have to allocate enough men to run the farm implement plants.

We further petition that a nonpartisan five man wheat commission be appointed to have full control of wheat. This commission shall be composed of an economist, a dirt farmer, an expert in marketing, storage, and transportation; also a representative of the milling, cereal, and other manufactured products, the fifth member should represent the consumers.

The above in order that a surplus of 3,000,000 bushels may be obtained and held for the future, that production may be wisely controlled, also that exports and imports may be used to the best benefit of our Country. Further that the wheat industry may be welded into homogeneous, rounded whole. With prices maintained at a fixed level, and the amount to be grown scientifically determined in advance. Food is the first war munition, yet it is being overlooked. An Army is a liability without food.

We further petition the Honorable Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, that he request all county agents, and their local committees to hold meetings as soon as possible to encourage 60 percent greater wheat planting this fall, and to acquaint the United States Congress with their imperative needs, in order that this great shortage may not occur, and our Army may feed and fight.

JOHN S. LARCOMBE, Jr.,
President, Gaithersburg, Md.
H. W. BECRAFT,
Secretary-Treasurer,
Washington Grove, Md.

Labor Backs the Boys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, March 31, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a radio address by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, published in the American Federationist for April 1944:

LABOR BACKS THE BOYS

(By William Green)

Every American is proud of the way the armed forces of our country are carrying on the fight against the enemy on the battlefields. Our men in uniform are meeting every test with high courage and driving the enemy back on every front. Who are these stalwart soldiers, sailors, and marines? They are American boys from all walks of life—from the factories, the farms, and the schools of our country, boys from every home and community in America.

More than 1,350,000 of them are members of American Federation of Labor unions. Perhaps another million are members of other labor organizations.

One of the miracles of our times is the fact that these young men, born and bred in a peace-loving atmosphere, have been able to face the horrors of modern war unflinchingly and to defeat the seasoned troops of our enemies. Their record to date inspires us with confidence that when the crucial invasions of enemy territory are launched they will carry out their assignments swiftly and victoriously.

Knowing that great military movements impend and that millions of our young men will be called upon to risk life and limb, we are impressed with the great responsibility of each and every American serving on the home front to back up our boys in uniform to the limit.

Labor recognizes this responsibility and is endeavoring in every way possible to fulfill it. As I see it, labor's responsibility is twofold. First and foremost, we must produce in ever-increasing quantities the finest and best munitions of war, the planes, tanks, ships, and guns which will help the armed forces win victory in the shortest possible time, thus saving life and bloodshed. Secondly, we owe a deep responsibility to those in the armed forces to preserve and protect the free American way of life and the high standards which characterize that way of life, so that when our soldiers and sailors return home after the final victory they will have every opportunity to start life anew under favorable circumstances.

I want to tell you now how labor is discharging these twin responsibilities. It is a story which has not yet been told in its true light and perspective. To a certain degree, the members of the Nation's armed forces have been misinformed as to the facts. To them and to their parents and relatives who are naturally concerned about their welfare, this story should prove enlightening and encouraging.

In the first place, American workers are producing the weapons of war in an awe-inspiring way. I don't ask you to take my word for that. Abundant confirmation—official confirmation—is contained in the third annual report of the Truman committee of the United States Senate, recently made public. This report declares that "the major battles of production have been won," largely through the "astounding performance" of American labor.

"The job that has been done," the Truman committee report says, "not only assures that victory will be won, but it assures that it will be won more quickly and with fewer casualties. Our armed forces have more and better equipment than our foes."

Well, how about strikes? That is the question labor's critics usually interpose at this point. In answer, I should like to quote from the Truman committee report again. It says:

"Strikes receive a very great amount of attention because of their dramatic character and news value, and because the public properly resents these violations of labor's pledge not to obstruct the war effort by striking. However, strikes in mining, manufacturing, and construction in 1943 resulted in a loss of manpower of less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the manpower actually used, whereas the manpower contributed by labor in that period exceeded that used in 1939 by 76 percent.

"This astounding performance exceeds anything of its kind ever achieved in the history of the world. The results obtained are the best answer to the critics of the home front. They do not indicate perfection, but they do evidence accomplishment of a high order."

Mind you, these are not my words, nor the utterances of any other labor representative who might be inclined to advance the best possible interpretation of labor's war record. These are the official utterances of a Senate committee charged with the responsibility of investigating the war effort, a committee which would not hesitate for one moment to denounce labor if the facts warranted. But what does this committee say after carefully examining the facts? It says that "on the whole the performance by labor has been very good."

I'd like to add a few observations of my own to what the Truman Committee reports on the subject of strikes. First of all, let me emphasize that the official policy of the American Federation of Labor is that strikes must be avoided at any cost. In these times of crisis, we insist that no matter how acute the grievance may be, no matter how intolerable the provocation may appear, strikes cannot be justified on any ground. That is our official policy. And the members of the American Federation of Labor have lived up to it almost 100 percent. The comparative few who have broken their pledge are the exception to the rule. We do not attempt to condone or justify their actions. On the contrary, we condemn them. But we do not consider it fair for all of labor to be vilified for the acts of the few. We resent the attempts of antilabor propagandists, who wish to destroy the standards of the American way of life, to blacken the name of the entire labor movement because a small minority of workers occasionally break discipline. We resent it just as much as the men in the armed forces would object to the entire Army or Navy being smeared just because a few recalcitrants may go A. W. O. L.

The truth is that American workers as a whole are on the job and serving faithfully under trying conditions. I challenge anyone to deny that they are doing a remarkably good job—a better job than the workers of any other nation.

Just as surely as America's fighting forces are outfighting the enemy, America's workers are outproducing the enemy. Together, American fighting soldiers and production soldiers constitute an unbeatable team. He who seeks to divide them or set them against each other is an enemy of his own country and a traitor to the cause of democracy.

I have attempted thus far to show how organized labor is supporting the men in the armed forces in our joint and most important task, which is to win the war in the shortest possible time. That support consists chiefly of production, but it is supplemented by universal purchases of War bonds, by contributions to war relief activities, by donations to the Red Cross, and by active promotion of every administrative and legislative policy which strengthens the war effort.

Now I want to tell you about some of labor's activities in behalf of the post-war economic and social security of the millions of men in uniform who will return to private life when victory comes.

On the economic front, labor's chief battle has been and still is to keep the cost of living within bounds. The returning soldier would be hit just as hard by inflation as the civilian. In order to maintain American living standards, labor insists that wage rates keep pace with inevitable wartime increases in prices of the necessities of life. Let no one tell you that labor seeks to profit from the war by obtaining wage increases. Such adjustments in wages as labor demands are for the purpose of maintaining and preserving American standards of life. Obviously, our standard of living is bound to be destroyed if the cost of living keeps going up while wage rates remain frozen. In fighting for economic stabilization labor is fighting for the returning servicemen just as much as for its own members. Anyone who has to depend on wage earnings for a living must join with organized labor in the patriotic effort to protect American standards of living from deterioration.

The first concern of most servicemen returning home after the war will be—where can I get a good job? The law is supposed to provide that those who have left private employment to join the armed forces are entitled to get their old jobs back after the war. But this law has many loopholes. Organized labor has succeeded in plugging up some of these loopholes by means of union contracts and union policies which protect the seniority rights of servicemen. In other words, members of American Federation of Labor unions in the armed services are guaranteed by the policy of their union and the contracts obtained from employers by the union that they will get their jobs back.

Those who did not enjoy the benefits of union membership before the war will be welcomed into organized labor's ranks if they apply and if they are properly qualified to serve in the various trades. The International Association of Machinists has led the way by announcing that ex-servicemen will be admitted into membership without being required to pay initiation fees. Many other unions are following suit. Of course, during the war the unions have volunteered to keep members who joined the armed forces in good standing without payment of dues.

But even these protections will be of little avail if a post-war depression hits private industry. Therefore, the American Federation of Labor has taken the lead in calling for a vast expansion of peacetime production when the war ends. "Jobs for all" is our post-war slogan. We realize it can only be fulfilled if maximum production is maintained. Labor is joining with industry and the Government in the formulation of post-war programs and policies which will promote all-out peacetime production and provide jobs for all.

It would be optimistic, however, to rely entirely on hopes and promises. Therefore, the American Federation of Labor has drafted and secured the introduction in Congress of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, which broadens the entire social security program and particularly provides that ex-servicemen will be entitled to at least 6 months' unemployment compensation if they are not able to find jobs immediately on their return. This legislation stands No. 1 on our list and labor will exert every effort to secure its prompt enactment.

But this is only one of the many protections which labor insists the Government should extend to returning servicemen. We urge that every member of the armed forces should be paid upon demobilization a lump sum adequate enough to permit him to get resettled in civilian status. We favor grants by the Government to enable those who wish to do so to resume and complete their education. Every possible measure should be taken to provide free hospitalization for disabled veterans, to provide disability compensation for them and to make available to them full opportunity for vocational training so that they can become self-sustaining in the future.

These are but a few of the ways in which organized labor is now fighting for the protection of the men in the armed services. I want them to know that labor is actively protecting their interests.

America's debt to those who have given their lives in the war can never be repaid. But we can and must do everything humanly possible to make up, to those who will return, the time they have lost, the opportunities they have sacrificed, the hardships they have suffered and the ghastly experiences they have endured.

Those experiences will leave a deep mark on the youth of America. They will come home determined that victory must bring with it lasting peace, economic security, and political freedom for all. Toward the attainment of these goals, the workers of America will be proud to march hand-in-hand with the veterans of this war.

William Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, William Cardinal O'Connell, archbishop of Boston and dean of the Catholic hierarchy in America and spiritual sovereign over more than a million Massachusetts Catholics and New England's first and only prince of the church, passed to the great beyond at his residence in Brighton, a suburb of Boston, Mass., on Saturday, April 22, 1944, following a lifetime of service to his church and God.

Death came peacefully to this aged and respected priest of the church in his eighty-fourth year as the beloved prelate responded to the prayers for the dying being offered up by his priests and the members of his family.

During these days of sorrow, flags flutter at half mast on public buildings throughout New England and messages of condolence and tribute continue to arrive at the diocesan house at the episcopal residence, Lake Street, Brighton.

In the passing of His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell, the church has lost a noble prince, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a prominent citizen, and the country a most respected patriot.

In the words of Archbishop Francis J. Spellman of New York:

> No American loved his country more than Cardinal O'Connell and none with greater intelligence served America any better. In him love of country followed love of God, and nobly he served them both. Love of God made him a true patriot, alert and determined to preserve our liberties.

He was the youngest of 11 sons of John and Bridget (Farley) O'Connell, poor Irish immigrants. He was born in Lowell, Mass., on the feastday of the Immaculate Conception, December 8, 1859. After attending public schools, he entered St. Charles College in Maryland and later he completed his education at Boston College with a degree of B. A. summa cum laude. Shortly thereafter he received a scholarship to the American College at Rome and in 1884 he was ordained a priest in Rome. In 1895, Cardinal O'Connell was made rector of the American College at Rome, building up an excellent reputation for the college. He was made chamberlain—with the title of monsignor—by Pope Piux XII, which gave him access to the papal chambers. In 1897 he was named domestic prelate and in 1901 was appointed Bishop of Portland, Maine. After 4 years in this position, Pope Piux X named him as assistant to the pontificial throne and selected him as papal envoy to Japan. Bishop O'Connell was an excellent linguist, having the ability to speak Japanese, German, Italian, French, Latin, Spanish, Russian, and Syrian.

In the following year Bishop O'Connell was named titular archbishop of Constance and coadjutor archbishop of Boston, as assistant to the aged Archbishop Williams. The following year Archbishop Williams passed away, and he succeeded him to the See of Boston, second only in the American hierarchy to the See of New York. Since that time Carinal O'Connell's reputation and leadership has been well known in Massachusetts. His sermons and his orations have been masterpieces, and although he never participated in politics, he often spoke out freely on the issues of the day which he considered in the spiritual realm of his church.

He has not only been honored by the Holy Vatican but by governments of many lands. He possesses the Lebanese

Grand Medal of Merit, the Grand Crosses of the Order of Malta, of the Crown of Italy, of the Constantinian Order of St. George, of the Holy Sepulchre, and the Legion d'Honneur.

At the time of his golden jubilee in 1934 when he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood, he was presented with a golden chalice by American bishops and letters of praise were received from Pope Pius XI and President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Three thousand people thronged the Cathedral of the Holy Cross of Boston when he celebrated his mass and thousands more were unable to enter. He later addressed an audience of 30,000 Bostonians, urging patriotism, law enforcement, American unity, and tolerance. Harvard University awarded to him the honor and degree of doctor of letters in 1937, and President Dr. James B. Conant stated at the time:

For three decades archbishop of Boston, he is a person of this Commonwealth honored as a faithful shepherd of a multitude of devoted citizens.

And no finer words could be said than the statement made by the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Boston, spoken a few minutes after his death, when he stated:

In the death of His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell, we, the priests and people of the Boston Archdiocese, have suffered the loss of a beloved spiritual father and a gifted spiritual leader. The Nation has lost a distinguished American; the State of Massachusetts has lost a foremost citizen; the church a preemminent prelate; and the entire world a great man. During almost 60 years of his life he was to be found in the arena fighting for both the eternal and temporal rights of his fellow men. His death now comes in the midst of tragic days when we mourn the loss of so many of our youth, the fine flower of our manhood, in the holocaust of war. They are sacrificing their lives in the noble cause of freedom and for the rights of humanity. To that same cause he, too, dedicated his long life and his extraordinary powers.

For a Clean Sweep of Anti-Ally Nonsense—Even From the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Frank R. Kent that appeared in the Chicago Sun, entitled "For a Clean Sweep of Anti-Ally Nonsense—Even From the Army":

FOR A CLEAN SWEEP OF ANTI-ALLY NONSENSE—EVEN FROM THE ARMY

(By Frank R. Kent)

Mr. Leo T. Crowley, under whom lend-lease is now operated, performed a patriotic service and executed as well an effective piece of personal strategy the other day when, by providing the answers before the questions could be asked, he vaccinated against the anti-British and anti-Russian (but particularly anti-British) rumors that have been current here for weeks and which, if they persist unchecked, are sure to seep through the country.

The Crowley statement was made before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and should have had much wider publicity than was given. For these reports have had great circulation and are promoted with such detail as to make them easy to believe. Among those exploded by Mr. Crowley were (1) that the British had a habit of removing the labels from lend-lease articles, and substituting their own, retransferring the goods to other countries and taking the credit; (2) that Lend-Lease was selling gasoline to the British in various places for 2 cents a gallon which the British resold to our Army for 42 cents; (3) that alcohol sent to Britain on lend-lease had been converted into whisky and sold back to us; (4) that we had sent huge quantities of diaper cloth to north Africa which the natives were using for head dresses; (5) that the Russians had traded some of our planes to the Japanese in return for rubber; (6) that the Russians were using lend-lease butter to grease their boots, etc.

POISONOUS REPORTS

These and kindred stories were denounced by Mr. Crowley as without any trace of truth and as having emanated from enemy propaganda sources. Unquestionably a clear-cut unequivocal denial of these poisonous reports was badly needed.

It should have been made long ago, and Mr. Crowley deserves credit for taking the initiative. The amount of harm such things can do if permitted to go unchecked is hard to exaggerate. In effect, they attribute a degree of depravity to our allies which is almost unthinkable.

They play directly into German and Japanese hands at the most critical period of the war. And they create resentment and distrust when good will and complete faith are vital to the common cause.

SHREWDLY CALCULATED

If there is anything better calculated to weaken the war effort and hamper the essential post-war cooperation than the stirring up of bad blood between ourselves and our allies, it is not easy to give it a name. So clear is this that it would seem worth any exertion upon the part of the administration to render it impossible; that the President, himself, might take cognizance of these things and use his great influence to disabuse the public mind.

Neither the British nor the Russians can afford to take notice of such reports. Yet both are aware of their harmful potentialities, and are deeply resentful over injustices which they are powerless to correct—or even to direct to the attention of the people.

It is a situation disturbing to thoughtful men in Washington. To them, Mr. Crowley's statement seemed particularly timely and needed.

The question is whether it is going to be let alone or followed up. The hope, of course, is that it will be followed up and that this especially damaging enemy propaganda can be wholly nullified. In this connection, our military authorities could very greatly help.

It is an unfortunate but quite well-known fact that there is a considerable anti-British feeling among some of our higher Army officers; that these have somewhat industriously spread the notion that the British want to get back their possessions in the East without having to fight for them; that their fighting planes are better designed for "defending England" than aiding in the devastation of Germany; that the British are holding back on the channel invasion because they are unwilling to pay the price, etc., etc.

INDIVIDUAL GRUDGES

It is a little shocking to hear this sort of talk from men of high rank in the American Army. But it can be heard from them, both in private conversation and around not-too-private dinner tables. These slurs and insinuations are just as false as those so flatly contradicted by Mr. Crowley, and which, he asserted, originally had been put out by Berlin and Tokyo radio.

It is true that the great bulk of American officers are wholly free from any anti-British feeling; have nothing but praise of the British as fighters and friends. But there are enough others who, one way or the other, have been irritated by individual Englishmen and who have been expressing themselves, to cause concern at the top.

JOB FOR O. W. I.

It is time something were done about all this and it can be stated that disciplinary measures are under consideration. Certainly nothing could be more worth while.

With the war about to reach its climax and the effectiveness of the peace resting largely upon British-American cooperation and understanding, discord of this character is about as bad a thing as could be. All these baseless anti-British reports ought to be firmly dealt with and the atmosphere cleared.

The O. W. I. might well find a field here. Putting an end to this kind of disorganizing propaganda would be very much more useful than most of the things it has done or is doing.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WNBF on April 22, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, for some time now, I have received letters from wives, mothers, and friends of our soldiers telling me how much they wanted to see their boys and how long it had been since these boys were home.

One letter on this subject came to me a few days ago which impressed me very much. A mother was writing about her son:

"It has been over 2 years," she stated, "since my boy, John, went into service. He has been overseas practically all this time, and I think it is only fair he get a chance for a furlough."

"I agree with you wholeheartedly," I answered her, "there are countless mothers such as you who stand at their windows in the dreariness each night and listen for the familiar step of their sons far away, thinking that by some miracle of fate he might be coming home."

By the end of 1944, millions of men will have been sent out of the country. The folks left behind will face an even greater test of courage and morale than now. Everybody is united in our determination to win the war. Everybody is prepared to make more sacrifices.

Yet in the heart of every parent, every wife, every child, there burns the unquenchable desire to see son or husband or brother or father. Their very lives are wrapped up on the never ending hope of having him come home if only for a short while to see his loved ones.

I propose then to call for legislation which will make it possible for every soldier, sailor, and marine to come home at the end of 18 months' service overseas if it is at all practicable for him to do so. I have always maintained that every man and woman in the service should have a turn for a furlough.

Therefore, I am introducing in Congress the following measure which I hope will soon be adopted so that your boys who are far across the oceans, fighting on every continent, all over the globe, will have the chance to come home when it is his turn.

This measure reads: "A bill to provide regular furlough periods for members of the armed forces on duty overseas.

"Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1078), as amended by section 2 of the act of May 29, 1934 (48 Stat. 816, 10 U. S. C. 17), be further amended by adding to the section the following: 'Provided further, That no one in our armed forces, except upon his own request shall be required to serve in a single tour of duty in time of war for more than 18 months outside the territory of the United States and its possessions without the granting of a furlough period of not less than 45 days with opportunity to rest and visit his family before reassignment to duty. This provision, however, shall not be applicable in situations where the Secretary of War determines that such limitation would seriously endanger the security of the United States or any of her armed forces, or hamper or impede the tactical or strategical plans of the Department.' "

In line with my thought for the necessity of this measure, let me read some verses written by a war mother:

"TO MY SON IN THE SERVICE

"I have in my window a star of bright blue,
It's there for the best pal that I ever knew.
My house is now empty; my heart often sad;
But he is serving our country for which I am glad.
My prayer is that God in His mercy and love,
Will send a bright angel from heaven above
And watch o'er my son where e'er he may roam,
And bring him back safely to mother and home."

—A War Mother.

Continuance of O. P. A. Is Essential

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the Independent Grocer of Friday, March 17, 1944, entitled "Continuance of O. P. A. Is Essential to Wartime Business":

CONTINUANCE OF O. P. A. IS ESSENTIAL TO WARTIME BUSINESS, SAY GROCERS

(By Martin V. Merritt)

The independent retail grocers of this country are pretty well united on one point. They want the O. P. A. continued. It's a safe bet that every one of them will be glad enough to see O. P. A. go when the time comes, after the war, but right now they feel that it is needed and needed badly.

One does not have to inquire far in metropolitan grocers' circles to learn which way the wind blows on that subject here in New York City. There is a very evident unanimity of opinion and those who express this opinion appear to have sound reasons for their judgment. They are not content to say that they want O. P. A. continued, they insist on reasoning it out with their questioner, and it would seem that no one knows better than the independent grocer why the Government price agency should be carried on.

Unless and until the Economic Stabilization Act is extended by Congress, the official existence of O. P. A. comes to an end on June 30. There appears to be little doubt that it will be given another year of life for even with the opposition to O. P. A. that can be found in Congress without scratching the surface, there are few Members of that august body who would want it on their politic souls that they had voted against O. P. A. and thus caused what would be likely to be the greatest economic holocaust we have ever seen.

As one food manufacturer put it, speaking of O. P. A. this week, the crash of 1929 would be schoolboy stuff compared to the crash and profiteering spree that would follow immediately on the heels of O. P. A.'s sudden and unheralded demise.

BILL INTRODUCED

A bill has already been introduced in Congress to extend the life of the price-control agency until June 30, 1945. Whether this bill will pass in that form or will be roundly amended is something no one can say. There is a marked difference of opinion, however, between many grocers who have expressed themselves on this subject and the Congressman who introduced that bill. The grocers believe that O. P. A. should not be extended for a year and then possibly for another year, but rather should be continued by enactment at this time for the balance of the war and for as long thereafter, with a reasonable limit, as is necessary for an orderly retirement of its regulations.

It is quite obvious that O. P. A. cannot simply close its doors at any time, whether it be this June or 5 years from now, without causing a tragic upheaval in business. The price structure that this agency has set up during the past 3 years must be retired systematically and in good form. It must be done in each specific case at a particularly appropriate time, when conditions in that market are sufficiently adjusted to stand the shock. It is probable that this ideal time will arrive in some fields much more rapidly than in others, and this must be taken into consideration by O. P. A. when it is preparing to close its doors.

Just as O. P. A. established ceilings in various commodities only when and because they were needed, so must O. P. A. retire those ceilings only when and because they are not needed. Of course, some limit must be placed on its liquidation because it seems that everyone agrees that continual Government control of price is not desirable.

RATIONING PROVIDES ANOTHER PROBLEM

The rationing feature of O. P. A. operation provides another problem, for here is a governmental function that must continue as long as there is a demand for food beyond the capacity of our national supply. As long as we contribute to the feeding of post-war Europe and possible post-war Pacific, there will not be enough food to satisfy any demand in this country, and as a result of this condition we must have rationing.

On the price front, the grocers of the city are farsighted enough to know that they would have lost much of their volume had it not been for ceilings on many food items. Had these prices been allowed to climb to unreasonable heights, the average family would have found it well-nigh impossible to buy a well-rounded menu and would have sought specialized fields in foods.

GROCER FARES WELL

It is generally admitted that the retail grocer has fared well under price control. While there have been, and still are, several items in which the grocer may feel a pinch, nearly all of the price-controlled items in today's grocery store provide a fair mark-up—a margin equal to or better than that provided by independent operation in the prewar period.

From the consumer's side, too, there is reason to want O. P. A. continued, say the grocers, for it is evident that the cost of living would have soared high above present levels were it not for the controlling influence of the Federal agency.

SOME ERRORS SEEN

There have been a few mistakes made by O. P. A., grocers point out, but they have been recognized sooner or later and adjusted. The original idea of housewife policing on price ceilings proved to the "bund," as one grocer put it, and O. P. A. was reasonably quick to change the plan.

The multitude of regulations that once flooded and confused the grocers has been reduced and at present is being cut down even more by consolidation of price orders in groups.

O. P. A. has also restyled its orders on a specific price basis wherever possible, thus doing away with much of the confusion of formula plan in retail pricing.

All of these changes show that O. P. A. is flexible enough to correct its own errors—a point that is very much in its favor.

There is little doubt that the agency will be given a new lease on life, but the grocers of New York nevertheless have expressed themselves forcefully in favor of its continuance.

John Roy Carlson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, the Easter recess gave me the opportunity to go about among my constituents, to discuss issues of political importance with them and to draw them out on the subjects close to their hearts and minds. What I learned is, I believe, of general importance. I have asked for the floor to report on these observations. I cannot say whether what I learned in my district is subject to the same reaction as can be obtained from other congressional districts. I believe, however, that what I learned is fairly typical. And I have no hesitancy in stating that the viewpoints and attitudes which I found deserve to be fully known and widely appreciated.

By and large, I found great satisfaction with the military conduct of the war. My constituents have reacted normally and appropriately to the turn in the tide. I would say, in fact, that they have all come to recognize the merits of the over-all strategy of joining with our allies in the defeat first of Germany and then of Japan. They knew all along that the choice was a hard one, but they had a justifiable confidence in our Commander in Chief and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They now accept unreservedly the over-all strategy in this global war. They, as all of us, have been heartened by successes in the European theater of war and in the Pacific and Far East. They see in our military leaders—our President as Commander in Chief, Chief of Staff Marshall, General Eisenhower, Admirals King and Nimitz, Generals Stilwell and MacArthur—and in their fellow military and naval officers, and above all in the large body of Americans now in uniform, worthy links in our American heritage of courage, imagination and competence. They hope for an early victory, but they are prepared for the difficult and hazardous period that lies ahead no matter what its length. And they know, moreover, that the ultimate victory will not come without its cost to us in blood and anguish, in tears and sorrow.

But just as I found a universal sense of gratification and confidence in our conduct of military affairs, so I found a great and depressing sense of bewilderment, worry, confusion, and pained disappointment at the occurrences on the home front and, let me report frankly, at the Washington scene.

Many factors explain this sense of bewilderment and chagrin. For to my constituents, as to all our people, Washington represents something that in its very nature is symbolic of the American people and the American Nation. As such a symbol they look to Washington, to its legislative, executive, and judicial branches to hold high the democratic banner of our way of life, and to bring to our national problems so enormously enlarged because of the war, the serenity of wisdom, the attributes of statesmanship, the selfless devotion that the times call upon us to exhibit. In their stead they find unnecessary conflict and clash; thinly disguised partisanship; the tugs of war of excessive political considerations; unworthy passions. Most of all they are gravely disturbed because in their eyes the Congress to which they normally look for the safeguard of our liberties and institutions does not seem to them to have shown enough awareness and concern for what they regard as one of our great problems; the task of national unity, the avoidance of inner conflicts and the maintenance of harmony among all Americans of all racial and religious groups. They see in such attacks, and in my opinion correctly, a corrosion of the very foundations of our national structure. They see in such attacks however veiled, however artfully presented, the unleashing of forces which would reduce our great country to a disunited and divided people. They know, moreover, that this is a Presidential election year, and that unless checked, these impulses will have an effect upon our national development that will extend far beyond the politics and circumstances of any one year.

This is not dealing with a figurative fear; this is reality itself. My district is composed of Americans of numerous origins, of different races and religious beliefs. My constituents have demonstrated, by their daily lives, the essence of living together peacefully and harmoniously. Broad and offensive generalization about groups in the population; careless slurs and innuendoes which can be interpreted as directed against one or another group; such things become tinder for social conflagration. They have learned to steer clear of them. They expect this distinguished body to do so with even more scrupulous care.

They fail to understand, for instance, the reasons for and the character of the attack on John Roy Carlson, whose book Under Cover has opened the eyes of so many to the existence of subversive propaganda and propagandists in our own midst. They are puzzled that the broad and profound values of the book should be overlooked and indeed thrust aside because of trivialities. They are pained that the essence of the revelations of that book should in any way be obscured by irrelevant considerations about the author as a naturalized American. They wonder what that has to do with the case. They are troubled that divisive lines should be drawn between native born and naturalized Americans as if that distinction were valid for patriotic service to our country. They wonder how the 10,000,000 Americans in uniform feel about that and whether they, out on the fighting lines, are prepared to make the same arbitrary, invidious, and ungracious distinctions between those fighting our Nation's war whose families had the good fortune to come here several generations ago, and those who are recent immigrants or descendants of recent immigrants.

And, my constituents tell me, they feel deep down in their hearts that those who raise irrelevant and un-American questions of presumed degrees of citizenship are doing a disservice to this country and an injustice not only to a man who sought to serve it well as author of a book, but to all of us.

They are pained that, because John Roy Carlson is only a pen name for the author's real name, Arthur Derounian, that this fact should be made the basis for an assault upon the inherent and intrinsic values of his revelations. And they cannot be led to believe that, because the author adopted the procedure natural to such exposure, that is to say, because he passed himself off as a member of these subversive groups in order to gain their confidence, that that justifies contempt and vituperations upon him. How, they ask, can full information of this kind be secured except by such methods that must have been deeply painful to young Derounian? Shall those methods be abandoned by our F. B. I., by our military and naval intelligence, by our local police forces? Is there not something confusing and troublesome in thus concentrating attacks on the author's justified procedure? And what is the purpose of such abuse?

For the issues that are treated in the book, the revelations that are made, and their high average of accuracy are far too important for light dismissal. They are more important than the man who happens to be the author, who labored for years with great risk to himself to gather the vast compilation of information. They are more important because they touch the lives of millions of Americans and our future harmony and stability. Who Mr. Carlson is is of no great moment, but what we propose to do about the situation revealed in his book and in scores of other ways is of first importance.

We cannot be indifferent to the threat to our institutions that lies in the skillful use of propaganda, exploiting the very freedom of expression inherent in democracy. The propaganda tactics of Joseph Goebbels are too well known to justify placidity. The corrupting influence of innuendo, of generalization about religious and racial groups of our Nation, the mockery of our democratic institutions, the sinister whisperings are too grave to be treated cavalierly. Let them not be underestimated. They have destroyed democracy before in other lands. They may yet prove diabolically efficient instruments to injure our own.

I feel that we have a formidable task ahead to strengthen the ramparts we watch, the inner ramparts of our democracy, of our social stability. Let us not decry those who seek to uncover the menace by inconsequential belittlings of their purpose and of their achievement.

Yes, my constituents are concerned as they have every right to be. Not least they are concerned that our legislative body weakens by its dissensions the moral prestige and influence it deserves to have. They feel that such prestige is slipping when unworthy intimations are here made against groups of American citizens and when our National Legislature takes time off for the trivialities of personal challenge and conflict.

My constituents were puzzled by the clash between the worthy gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] and the columnist and radio speaker, Walter Winchell. They are all the more puzzled as to what all the shootin' is about when they know from the records of both the desire of both to expose subversive forces in this country and indeed their past collaboration in just that patriotic objective. This should not be a question of one or another individual. Mr. Winchell earns his living by the honest calling of a newspaper column writer and the equally honest calling of radio broadcaster. We should not be concerned with whether or not Mr. Winchell deals with trivia that happen to be of interest to millions of our fellow Americans, or whether he spells his name with one "l" or two, or what his religion may be. We are concerned that Mr. Winchell, who has so demonstrably been of invaluable service in exposing those who despise and would injure our American heritage, must be diverted into self-defense. We are concerned when these great services are made subordinate to matters of judgment and taste. The solid achievements of Mr. Winchell are incontestable. It is regrettable that occasional heat and tension yield an unfortunate phrase or epithet. But I am sure that neither the gentleman from Texas nor any of the other Members who have excoriated and berated Mr. Winchell on the floor of this House will, on reflection, insist that he himself has been blameless in this regard. Shall such lapses be permitted to divert us from our proper concern with the pernicious forces? If we do so persist we will be an example of the success of the very practice of divide and conquer, against which we all ought to be alert.

This vigilance on our part is all the more important to us now during a year that will see intense political campaigning. I feel, with my constituents, that in such a year we must pledge ourselves to see to it that the political campaign be on the highest level possible. We must demonstrate our awareness of the emergency in which we are living and make sure that what we do will strengthen, not weaken, the democratic process. It may be that in the past we could afford the thoughtless luxury of partisanship and petty politics; we cannot afford them now, in 1944, and in the years that are ahead. We owe it to ourselves and to the American people to avoid doing and saying anything that can even remotely contribute to internal dissension. We cannot have a political campaign giving free reign to the excesses of partisanship which in the long run undermine our democratic system. We must be on our guard in both parties against the raising of false issues, against indulging in smears and name calling, against any appeals to racial and religious prejudices. The responsibility of our political leadership is to see to it—this year above all—that nothing is said or done to raise embittered issues between one group of Americans and another that might unhappily endure far beyond the election date.

We have become a great country—a world power of the first rank—because we have found a method of uniting the common interests of 135,000,000 people and subordinating differences of creed or origin and locality. Continue that process and we will continue to be one great union. Reverse it and we will become another pattern of fragmentized and Balkanized Europe.

By and large, we had no reason to fear a reversal of that process—until recently. But these recent years have made it clear that propaganda to divide us is an all-too-useful instrument in the hands of foreign imperialist nations. Nazi Germany has shown how to use the tools of disunity for ends destructive to our national well-being.

Whatever our personal proclivities, it must be clear to us that racial and religious bigotries among our citizens transcend the area of personal concern only. They become a national menace because they affect our national union and stability.

In the years to come we will have to grapple with the greatest tasks in our national history: The winning of the war, the orderly transition to peace, the prevention of new wars, and the advancement of our prosperity and well-being.

Whether we meet those problems will depend in large measure upon our unity of purpose, upon the collaboration of all Americans of all faiths and of all origins. We, here in the Halls of Congress, have the obligation to set the example to the rest of the country of the reality of such unity. This is the deeply felt judgment and message of the constituency I am proud to represent.

Veteran Rehabilitation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of April 26, 1944:

VETERAN REHABILITATION

That something must be done to restore wounded and sick veterans of this war all agree. But what? We have the convalescent training program of the Army Air Force, the studies which have been undertaken by the National Research Council's committee on convalescence and rehabilitation, and various proposals of Government and private agencies. But we have no system, no plan. Moreover, experience at the front is not directly applicable, inasmuch as the Army is primarily concerned with returning a disabled man to his regiment. All this being so, the New York Academy of Medicine has conducted a symposium, in the course of which about 40 authorities gave their views. What we have is a useful survey which enables us to focus attention on the medical and social problem presented by the disabled veteran.

Convalescence seems to present more formidable difficulties than training the handicapped for an occupation. It is not that physicians are inexperienced but that they are called upon to deal with unfamiliar complications. At present, time, which does more than any anodyne, must be the chief reliance, and time is the same as rest. The men who will need care are all young—much younger than the average patient. They have been touched by unfamiliar, tropical diseases, and they have sustained injuries rarely encountered in civil life. Hence the difficulties. The addresses delivered before the academy did much to clarify these, but the authorities were agreed that, though certain principles are as applicable to convalescent soldiers as to civilians, we need research to give us a new approach.

Training the soldier for a job in civilian life is easier. We have experts enough in this field. Judging from the declarations of corporation presidents, industry is willing to do its share. For some years it will probably need all the workers it can recruit to fill an enormous demand for goods that have not been made since Pearl Harbor. Lastly, there is the general conviction that the disabled and discharged veteran should be given preference when peace returns. Good as the prospects are, there is clearly work to do both for the physicians and for the trainers, and the academy deserves praise for indicating the nature of that work.

A Factory Is Like a Tree

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED NORMAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the best worded and clearest definitions of free enterprise, and all it connotes to Americans, has recently come to my attention, and I would like to call it to the attention of the House.

This reexpression of a few fundamentals of our American way of life is in the form of an advertisement inserted in a number of newspapers in my district by the Harbor Plywood Corporation, of Hoquiam, Wash. It reads as follows:

A factory is like a tree. America was built on a basic idea: That idea that a man—any man, every man—shall be master of his own destiny; the idea that a man can work a little harder than his neighbor and enjoy the fruits of that labor; the idea that ambition and courage will be rewarded.

The idea that a man can go into business for himself; the idea that he will be privileged to risk his time and his money in an enterprise of his own choosing; the idea that he can start a store or a service station or a restaurant or a factory.

A factory—that is a basic thing, like a tree. Through the chemistry of its complex workings, it produces fruit in the forms of pay rolls, and pay rolls are manna for the grocer, the baker, the doctor, the preacher, the teacher, and the whole intricate life of a community.

The sum of the factories, large and small, constitutes the forest we call industry—American industry—most potent force in the land.

A factory—it starts with a man or a group of men. Because this is America, men are not afraid. Men are willing to struggle and take risks, and from this—from this basic American idea—comes the greatest of all great rewards of industry—the creation of jobs; the creation of opportunity for the returning veteran.

Jobs; work; industrial pay rolls. They support the farmer, providing a market for his harvest; they support the merchant, creating his customers; they support the utilities, the lawyer, the banker, the newsman, the policeman, and the whole body of public servants; they support other industries and, in turn, support themselves.

They are America, and while they survive—while Americans have the freedom of opportunity and enterprise—this land will be strong.

Like a tree, the factory has roots—the deep, life-giving roots that convert labor, materials, and risk into the miracle of the American way of life.

Mr. Speaker, in modern jargon, "that says it." There are people in America—and, fortunately, I believe they are very few—who would quarrel with the fundamental ideas expressed in this advertisement. But I am certain that, as they ponder upon it, the vast majority of our people will find the unassailable truths plainly stated in this concise collection of words. I know that many will linger a little longer over one sentence:

And from this, from this basic American idea, comes the greatest of all great rewards of industry—the creation of jobs—the creation of opportunity for the returning veterans.

Most everybody likes to make money; many people would much rather make money than just create jobs. In other words, with many people the main objective still is the simple collection of money, with creation of jobs and opportunities for other people as a subsidiary issue to which they give little thought. But I think that the mere chase after money for the sake of the dollars themselves is becoming a less popular sport in this country. I see signs that we Americans are growing wiser, and that we are more and more awakening to the plain fact that the best economy is that in which, like the old-fashioned Sunday school picnic, there is plenty for everybody.

We must not lose sight of the fundamental reasons why this plenitude can be maintained in America. These reasons are covered in great part by the Harbor Plywood Corporation's advertisement. I want to add a word about the man I presume directed the placing of this message before the newspaper readers of my district. He is Mr. E. W. Daniels, head of the Harbor Plywood Corporation. He is a man of courage, of vision; he is sagacious, but not greedy. I imagine that Mr. Daniels knows every word of this advertisement by heart. More than that, he practices what it preaches. Mr. Daniels—and thousands upon thousands of other Americans like him—have a fiercely burning faith in free enterprise of the good-will type which they follow. Theirs is a flame that will continue to grow until it consumes the unbelievers—the Fascists, the Communists, and all their crackpot companions.

Shall Congress Surrender Control Over American Economy and Money to an International Monetary Body?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to be a monetary expert or a financial wizard, and will therefore not attempt to engage in an argument with such technical experts from our Treasury Department in making my observations as to the merits or demerits of the proposed international monetary fund. The proposal for the establishment of such an international monetary fund was made by Treasury Secretary Morgenthau and his staff to a group of Congressmen in a secret meeting held last Friday.

True to his promise to keep Congress informed, Secretary Morgenthau gave those present at the secret meeting, a general statement as to the agreement reached by the "technical experts of the United Nations upon a set of basic principles for the creation of an international monetary fund." I commend the Secretary for bringing the proposal to the attention of certain Members of Congress before the administration commits United States participation in an international organization which, if created, will undoubtedly dominate and control the economy of the world. I regret, however, that the Secretary and his experts did not deem it desirable to provide a detailed explanation as to the workings, management, and operation of this international monetary body, and the part the United States was to play in the scheme.

Although the administration might now possess questionable legal authority to participate in an international monetary group, which authority I do not concede exists, Secretary Morgenthau definitely promised that the Treasury would ask Congress for legislative authority before committing United States participation in the fund. Since legislation will be necessary to chart our country's course in the field of international finance, I insist that Congress should pass on all details of the proposal and clearly define the authority of the Executive, in advance of the international monetary conference, which Secretary Morgenthau states will be called by the President in the near future. As I see it, congressional action is vital in advance of the world monetary conference to decide if the United States is to be a party in the international monetary organization.

Speaking for myself, I am a realist; and I want all information, secret and otherwise, on every proposal relating to the welfare of the United States and its citizens, before I give my approval for any new policy for our country's future course. The financial experts of the Treasury and the United Nations spent months in reaching an agreement upon a set of basic principles for the creation of an international monetary fund with a capital of $8,000,000,000 in gold and money, one-third of which is to be supplied by the United States, the ostensible purpose being to stabilize world currencies and promote international trade. These are laudable objectives, but, surely Members of Congress are entitled to have more than a 2-hour explanation from the experts before passing judgment on such a far-reaching proposal. Secretary Morgenthau stretched his imagination considerably when he said after the secret congressional meeting, that the reception of his international monetary scheme was "on the whole good." I would say it was quite to the contrary.

There are several dangers if a world monetary conference is held prior to congressional action. In the first place, the President of the United States invites all of the United Nations to take part in the monetary conference and to consider an international monetary plan perfected and sponsored by the United States Treasury. What will happen if Congress fails to approve United States participation in the international monetary fund should an agreement be reached by the conference? Will the international fund function without the United States, or does the President intend to put the United States into it by executive agreement and without congressional approval? Will we be forced to join the fund in order to protect our foreign commerce and the $13,300,000,000 in foreign investment which American citizens and corporations now own?

Secondly, it must not be overlooked that most of the United Nation members are debtors to the United States. Will these nations have the controlling vote over the operations and policies of the international monetary fund? If so, will the fund have the power to fix the value of money in any member country or place sanctions on any nonmember country, and thereby stop imports and exports from such country? Under our Constitution, neither the President nor Congress has the power to delegate to an international body, or any other group, the authority to fix the value of American money. And no agreement can be made requiring Congress to secure the consent of an international body to fix the value of our money. Such a provision is contained in the agreement of the technical experts. Congress alone has the sole power to regulate the value of our money, and therefore it logically follows that Congress should retain complete control over the monetary affairs of this country until such time as the people have directed otherwise by constitutional amendment. I am not willing to turn over the control of American money and our future economy to an international banking group.

The international monetary fund proposal is a forerunner of bigger things to come. I am informed that when the world monetary conference is held an agreement will be attempted to create a $10,000,000,000 international reconstruction bank, with the good old U. S. A. as the majority stockholder with minority voting power. About 17 months ago the United States owned approximately 76 percent of the world's gold, worth $22,743,000,000. As of April 20 our gold supply has decreased by $1,294,000,000 to $21,449,000,000. Who got this gold? You know, of course, it is a crime for any American citizen to possess gold. Both international proposals contemplate the use and transfer of American gold.

I do not want to leave any impression with you that I question the sincerity of Secretary Morgenthau in submitting these international monetary proposals to the world. His motives and objectives are no doubt very laudable, but since the Congress is the guardian of the people's money and other resources, I feel it my solemn duty to demand all of the details before the President and the Secretary of the Treasury commit our country and its resources to an international venture which is certain to leave the American peop'e "holding the bag."

Since legislation relating to gold and the present stabilization fund is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I have requested our distinguished chairman, the Honorable ANDREW SOMERS, to call a hearing at an early date so that the Congress may secure all of the details on the international monetary fund proposal and consider legislation before the President invites the United Nations to take part in the world monetary conference.

An editorial from the Wall Street Journal of April 24, 1944, follows:

NEARER TO EARTH

Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau has made public a proposal for an international stabilization fund, which on its face is a considerable retreat from the Keynes and White plans offered some months ago.

Both of those plans, one of British sponsorship and the other offered by American Treasury experts, went far beyond the announced purpose of currency stabilization. They were in fact blueprints of world economic dictatorship.

It is to be hoped that the sponsors of these plans have indeed seen the impossible folly of their original ideas. However, it is not yet clear that there is justification for placing too much dependence on that hope.

The latest proposal contemplates a stabilization fund of $8,000,000,000. It is the judgment of a great many students that the task of clearing international transactions in a way to prevent disastrous currency fluctuations can be accomplished by an agency with a capital which would be a fraction of that amount.

A woman going about the business of the weekly marketing does not usually take with her a large share of the family resources in addition to money which she might be able to borrow from the neighbors. If she did so, it is entirely possible that she would be unable to resist a new fur coat displayed in a window along her route.

And even in these days $8,000,000,000 is still a lot of money, the possessor of which could do some really extraordinary things.

America's Place in World Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an address delivered by Gov. John W. Bricker before the Ohio Society of New York, at the Hotel Pennsylvania, in New York City, April 25, 1944:

For the second time within the brief span of our generation, America is involved in a grim and bitter world war. We were caught shamefully unprepared. But today, after months of anxiety and preparation, the tide of battle is running strongly in our favor. Our country again is demonstrating the prowess of her fighting men and the potency of her industrial system. Tough fighting and hard work are ahead. But we shall carry on, with increased determination, until Germany and Japan are decisively defeated.

I

We well may pause to speculate concerning the reason for our involvement in these two world wars. We had no territorial ambitions. We had no major quarrels with other nations.

America was settled by people who sought to be free from the interminable wars between the coalitions and alliances of the Old World. But to their disillusionment and sorrow, even in Colonial days, they discovered that the New World was an ever-present pawn in the imperial ambitions and rivalries of the European powers.

Whatever may explain our early involvements, I have no doubt as to the principal forces that involved us in World Wars No. 1 and No. 2. We were drawn in because we had become of such great importance in world affairs, economically and politically, that we could not escape involvement. Neither Germany in the last war, nor Germany and Japan in this war, could hope to achieve world domination so long as the United States stood strong and free in this hemisphere.

The simple truth is that we have always had a tremendous stake in world order and stability. Yet our national consciousness of our commanding place in world affairs has not kept pace with our own national progress. We have not kept ourselves alert to developments threatening world order. And we have not kept ourselves prepared to deal with them before they attained world-shaking proportions.

Instead of accepting, with intelligent self-interest, a degree of responsibility for world events commensurate with our rank, we have allowed events to control us. Almost a half century ago we assumed obligations in the Pacific. We accepted a direct responsibility for protecting the Philippines. The present administration failed to fulfill this obligation in the face of Japan's growing power.

During the past decade we have unwisely pursued a course of day-to-day diplomacy. Hitler seized the reins in Germany about the time the New Deal came into power. Though the threat to world peace was widely recognized, our Government did not exercise ordinary prudence for our national security. We squandered our substance in boondoggling and took no heed of the gathering war clouds. The present administration sought to appease Japan by selling to her scrap iron and oil, in spite of Ambassador Grew's warnings as to the intentions of her war lords. This policy was continued until late in 1940. Our sons are receiving back those materials today, in bullets and death.

II

Any approach to the future foreign policy of this country, I believe, should be based upon three inescapable premises.

First, our civilization cannot survive if it continues to engage in legalized mass murder every generation or two. It must not pervert its scientific discoveries into instruments of destruction. No Napoleon, no Hitler, no Japanese war lord, nourishing overweening ambition, should ever again be permitted to force catastrophe on the world.

Second, we in America must recognize, in view of our vast expanse of territory, our population, our natural resources, and our scientific skills, that we must share responsibility for world order as a matter of self-interest. I have said before and I repeat now: "If we do not, after the present most destructive of wars, make a serious effort to build a better understanding among nations, then we must stand convicted before posterity as ignorant, heartless, and unworthy reactionaries."

Third, we must assume our responsibilities realistically. The pages of history record many plans for preserving peace. From the Pax Romana to the League of Nations, the common men and women of the world have always yearned to throw off the shackles of barbarism and to establish concord. It is not the people who have failed. It is the leaders of people, through all the ages, who have fallen short of their high obligations. When the governments of the world become responsive to the will of the people, peace will abide.

Again many peace plans are afloat. Too few of them have been evolved with a view to the stark realities which the world will face when this war is over. The machinery of peace will be effective only if it relieves the tensions that cause wars. Only as men diagnose the forces that make for conflict can they provide a cure for this moral malady in our civilization.

III

Let us then consider some of the realities that will confront us as we set about the task of establishing world peace.

First and foremost, we must anticipate temporary economic and political instability in many parts of the world.

At the end of the war there will be all too few stable governments in the world. These must be established before any permanent international organization will be possible.

Likewise, there will be multitudes of starving, diseased, and homeless men, women, and children in Europe and the Orient. Their gaunt faces will haunt the peace table.

Millions of the ablest young men will have been killed or disabled.

Wealth and productive facilities will have been destroyed. Land will be depleted. Property ownership will be confused. No one will know who the rightful owners are because of the Nazi and Japanese scrambling of property rights and the destruction of title records.

There will be no financial stability. Money values today in the area of combat are highly artificial. If controls are removed, it is probable that many European currencies will collapse.

Many nations will be without resources with which to buy raw materials or foodstuffs, except such resources as may be made available by the credit of the United Nations.

Finally, we may expect a terrific conflict of opposing political forces struggling for dominance. There will be a release of deep-seated and engendered hate, especially in the occupied countries.

Unless these problems are frankly faced and solved, anarchy will be lurking around the corner. With anarchy, the hope of a just and enduring peace will collapse.

The United Nations therefore face the necessity of providing food, shipping, supplies, credits—and helping industry and agriculture get started abroad. The United States must do its full share, generously and compassionately.

But we must not be led into assuming a burden intolerable to us and demoralizing to others. We alone cannot repair the destruction of this war. We cannot buy international good will. Our major effort should be to help others help themselves. Any promise to do more than we can perform will breed ill will and hate. There must be open and frank consideration of our responsibilities. There must be no secret international agreements affecting the post-war world. International good will can be developed by open and honest dealings with other nations and by keeping our commitments.

The long-range economic problems confronting the world are even more complex. I refer to the problems of currency, credit, markets, and international trade. After the last war, all nations indulged in excessive economic nationalism. This expressed itself in discriminatory trade agreements, quotas, excessive tariffs, monopolies and cartels, exchange wars, barter systems, and many other barriers to international trade and commerce.

Let us not forget that the President of the United States had an opportunity to take leadership in controlling the world-wide economic maladjustment which deepened after 1933. We all know that monetary instability in the world is a serious barrier to international trade—and that trade barriers contribute mightily to wars. They were forces which helped Hitler rise to power. To meet this problem of instability which existed in 1933, the World Monetary and Economic Conference of London was held. The United States was represented. Suddenly and without warning, the President blasted the conference. It was wrecked just as completely as if a bomb had been dropped out of the skies and taken the lives of all assembled. The present administration, then and there, indulged in an act of extreme economic isolationism, and the hope of establishing monetary and economic stability in the world was crushed.

The failure of nations to deal forthrightly with the problems of currency, credit, markets, and international trade contributed, more than anything else, toward sowing the seeds of present international conflict. The practice of international improvisation should end. The hour for forthright constructive action is here.

IV

These convictions impel me to offer some specific recommendations:

First of all, as I have pointed out, there will be economic and political instability in Europe and Asia at the end of the war. Pending the time when we may establish a permanent international organization, we must have some kind of effective machinery to preserve international order and to help set the nations of Europe and Asia on the road to self-rehabilitation.

The United States, the British Commonwealth, and Russia will emerge from this war as the nations having the largest responsibility for world order and the power to maintain it. China is a nation of great potential power. These four nations, in my judgment, while acting as independent sovereign states, must assume joint responsibility for world order until economic and political stability has been regained by the individual nations.

This means that these four great powers should agree now to maintain adequate military, naval, and air power in the immediate post-war period. This does not mean an international police force, or a military alliance. The people of this country are opposed to both. It does contemplate that these four nations shall reach a mutual understanding as to their respective military establishments, and that they shall express that understanding in a temporary and transitional compact to be entered into as soon as possible. Other nations, willing to assume their share of responsibility, should be permitted to join this compact. The compact should also contain the principles and aims which these powers will support in the post-war world. It is important that nations know as quickly as possible what adjustments they must make. Through such a procedure the four great powers, and those who join with them, shall become effective guardians of the peace until a permanent international organization can be established.

Already much valuable time and opportunity to hasten the end of the war have been lost by our failure to make clear, both to ourselves and to our enemies, the prime objectives for which we are fighting.

Second, the United Nations should immediately explore the bases for a permanent international structure for peace. Such a structure cannot be completed until stable governments have been restored. The details must be worked out in the light of developing conditions and after open discussion. Lasting peace cannot spring full born by any grandiose plan, but step by step in solution of the problems which will confront us. Fundamental principles, however, can and should be agreed upon at the earliest possible moment.

I believe that the United States must take her place in a cooperative organization of sovereign nations. We want no supergovernment. We want no dictatorial world state. Moreover, declarations and acts of our allies indicate that they likewise want no supergovernment or dictatorial world state. A cooperative organization of sovereign states, bent upon peace and supported by a will for peace among their peoples, can solve the international problems that lead to war.

The major purpose of such an institution must be to establish a reign of law among nations. We need to develop judicial processes for the settlement of justiciable questions. The Hague Tribunal and the Permanent Court of International Justice have demonstrated that much can be accomplished by this means to avoid recourse to arms. They can be made more effective. Personally, I have always felt that the United States should join the World Court. It is vital that there be a continuing study and revision of the principles and procedures of international law and tribunals. We also need more adequate machinery for the settlement of nonjusticiable questions by mediation, conciliation and arbitration. Every problem solved, every commitment kept, will strengthen the program for peace.

The Republican Party at Mackinac took the initiative in bringing our post-war international program down to the hard ground of common sense. Its proposals may well be our guide.

Third, the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China should now inaugurate a continuing study of such problems as currencies, credits, tariffs, air rights, markets, and international trade.

Of special importance in such a study is the problem of the money standard. This problem should be approached from the standpoint of stabilizing the currency of individual nations. International economic stability must be built upon the foundations of a sound money and sound economic policy in each of the individual nations. Our first step is the establishment of a sound internal economy in the United States.

In formulating a program for monetary stabilization, all visionary plans, such as the Keynes and White plans, must be avoided. There is no need for resorting to radical theories. The best hope for the future lies in the return of the world in due course to the international gold standard. In spite of its defects, the gold standard is the most satisfactory basis of stability the world has yet known. People generally have confidence in it because they can understand it better than any other monetary standard. It requires less management, and hence it is less subject to manipulation by international politics. In short, I believe that we should begin with what we have found best in our experience and endeavor to improve it by international cooperation.

Fourth, the United States is distinctly in need of consistency and competency in its diplomatic relations.

The State Department again must be permitted to exercise the initiative and responsibility that marked the administrations of such able Republican Secretaries as Seward, Blaine, Hay, Root, and Hughes. We need a President who will permit his department heads the latitude to exercise the responsibility that is vested in them. The United States has just as able, adequately trained, and thoroughly experienced career men in the diplomatic service as any other nation. They are thoroughly familiar with the individual problems and viewpoints of the various nations. This Nation has the know-how in international relations. A Republican administration will use it. No one man knows all the answers, but someone knows each answer.

Finally, in our dealings with other nations, we must act fairly, but with resolution. Too often in foreign affairs the present administration has exhibited before the world indecision, vacillation, and weakness. A strong nation should have a strong policy.

The time has come when an American President should be courageous enough to speak out for America—for our rights and for our convictions. For example, I believe that the President, supported by the Congress, should insist upon the retention of certain strategic military and naval bases and air fields which have been built with American money. We should be just as diligent in protecting our own national interests as our allies are diligent in protecting theirs. We can exert a wholesome influence in the world only if we ourselves remain powerful. After the last war the United States held certain ideals before the world. Many of those ideals were promptly repudiated by the statesmen of Europe. We ourselves let them go by default. We yielded, and we lost the respect of other nations. Indeed, we earned their contempt and, worst of all, the armistice proved to be only an armistice. That tragedy must not be repeated.

America's cooperation with other nations must not be at the expense of her principles, her honor, her ideals, or her form of government. But I believe we can have international cooperation with justice and with honor, and that America must play her full part and do her full share. To do otherwise would be to break our covenant with those who struggle and die for us at this hour.

That is what our fighting sons and daughters are thinking. That is what fathers and mothers everywhere are praying for. Our great objectives must be the speedy winning of the war, the establishment of a just and enduring peace, and the maintenance of a strong America—an America firm in her convictions, cooperative in the building of a better world, and free to enjoy the blessings which can only be assured in a world delivered from the scourge of war.

Address at United Jewish Appeal Real Estate Dinner

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me at the United Jewish Appeal Real Estate dinner, Hotel Lombardy, New York City, April 20, 1944:

Friends, not a day passes without our seeing a newspaper headline that proclaims some new persecution, some new and more terrible tragedy that has overtaken still another section of the Jews of Hitler-dominated Europe.

Last month it was fresh word of the massacre of more Jews in Poland, many of whom revolted and fought to the last man, taking with them before they were killed a few scores, or perhaps hundreds, of our common enemy. Then, a few weeks ago, came the shocking realization that the Hitlerite assassins, in overrunning Hungary, were embarking on a program of complete extermination of the 900,000 Jews of that country who, though previously living under ghetto conditions, at least were living, and doing so in the hope of eventual liberation. Now, unless the agencies for which we are meeting tonight can save them by some superhuman effort, all these 900,000 will be doomed to extinction.

Only recently, long after it seemed certain that all the Jews of Germany had been either deported, or killed, or both—came the amazing news item from that country that the Nazis, now more in need of a scapegoat than ever, were suddenly launching a program to exterminate half-Jews and so-called Aryans married to Jews.

So there seems to be no end to the nightmare of the Hitler horror, and the picture would be black indeed if that were all there is to it. Fortunately, however, the picture has another side—that of the humanitarian efforts made by all the United Nations, but particularly under the lead taken by us in America, to rescue these people, to rush relief as rapidly as we can to as many of them as we can, to aid in the escape and eventual rehabilitation of as many hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, as it is humanly possible.

In making this great effort, we recognize, as the President does, that the humanitarian front is no less important than the military front, though at this moment the latter has inevitably a prior interest. What we do to save lives, to preserve human decency, liberty, and dignity, not only affects the lives we actually save and restore, it also provides a new hope and courage around which those still in captivity in enemy-held territories may rally and find heart to resist all efforts to exterminate them, and in many cases to fight back.

Essentially, that is the message of the united Jewish appeal. It is the living affirmation of the principles for which we fight. As we materialize its vast program of rescue and relief, we give proof to the world that our convictions are not empty words, but actualities.

I would like, at this point, to refresh your minds as to the high points in the extensive work supported by the united Jewish appeal. As you know, it supplies the funds for three separate and distinct major agencies.

One of them, the joint distribution committee, carries on lifesaving activities in more than 50 different nations and areas. Last year it maintained wholly or in part upwards of 50,000 refugees in the neutral nations of Switzerland, Sweden, Spain, Portugal, and Turkey, emigrating many of them to Palestine and the Western Hemisphere, where they began new lives on a secure basis in places of permanent safety. Last year, for instance, the help extended by the united Jewish appeal through the joint distribution committee supported 21,000 refugees in Switzerland alone—to which country, by the way, many more are still escaping every month, every week, every day. Recently, the joint distribution committee has boosted to 5,000 the number of packages it is sending each month to Soviet Russia, for distribution among the 450,000 Polish Jews scattered throughout that war-torn country from Siberia to the border of Iran. These packages contain sorely needed, in fact, lifesaving, supplies of food, clothing, and medicine. In 1943 the joint distribution committee helped to integrate 125,000 refugees into the communities of the republics of South and Central America—a reconstruction effort it is still expanding. And this is just a fraction of that committee's activities, which exert a vital, healing influence upon the lives of more than 1,000,000 people annually.

Another of the agencies represented by the United Jewish Appeal is the United Palestine Appeal, devoted exclusively to the building and strengthening of Palestine as a great, permanent homeland for our people. I am aware of the dangers threatening Palestine, through the infamous white paper laid down in 1939 by the Chamberlain government of Great Britain. But I assure you, this obstacle will be brushed aside, as others have been brushed aside since the inception of the homeland. The terms of the white paper will be modified, or scrapped altogether, provided we have the same determination we have had in the past to compel, by the thriving reality of Palestine itself, rectification of the injustices that have been done to it. And I want to assure you that right now, in the present, between six and seven thousand Jewish immigrants have been received into Palestine for permanent settlement in the last 6 months, with another 30,000 still holding visas to go there, a figure that will raise the Jewish population of Palestine, even under the terms of the white paper, to the number of 650,000 and more.

Among recent immigrants to Palestine and those now on their way to this sanctuary are refugees from such far-flung places as Yemen, the Balkans, Turkey, Iran, and elsewhere. Most of you know that 2 or 3 months ago Palestine received over 800 immigrants from every corner of Europe who came to their new homeland via Spain and Portugal, after innumerable hardships and hairbreadth escapes in Holland, Belgium, and France.

Some of the help sent to Palestine by the United Jewish Appeal takes the form of supplementary assistance to the families of soldiers serving with the British armed forces, of whom there are 28,000, all volunteers. Continued development of that country's agricultural and industrial resources, useful in both the war and post-war effort, are of course of the greatest concern to the United Palestine Appeal, as it also fosters a traditionally strong religious, cultural, and educational program.

Then there is a third agency whose work the United Jewish Appeal makes possible, that of the National Refugee Service, which operates exclusively within the United States to accomplish the quickest, most effective integration of past and present refugees into the fabric of American life. Two hundred and twelve thousand Jews have come to our shores since the rise of Hitlerism, and because of the cash relief provided to tide them over their immediate destitution, the vocational training they have been offered, and finally the job and professional placement service this agency renders, none of these refugees have constituted any kind of a problem. Today, despite the wartime restrictions on transportation, about 100 new refugees still reach the United States every week. All, except those unemployable by reason of age or illness, have been or are now being restored to normal, productive, self-respecting independence. To slacken in this work would be to jeopardize the immigration of future waves of newcomers escaping from the hatreds and horrors of Europe.

Such is the work made possible by the United Jewish Appeal. But even that is not the whole picture, as it takes account only of the present period and not the immediate future—the rest of 1944 and the early months of 1945.

To take care of its present needs, the United Jewish Appeal is asking the Jewish community and the public at large to help in raising the largest war chest—I might almost call it hope chest—in all of its history. It is asking for $32,000,000 as the smallest figure that will enable it to finish the tasks of 1944, provided no further emergencies arise. That is an amount almost twice the sum raised last year, and there is only one way that fund can be raised—by the doubled generosity of you people who support and make it possible.

But as I said at the beginning of my speech, every day's headlines bring us news of fresh horrors befalling our Jewish brothers and sisters in Europe. There can be no doubt that there will indeed be many, many more emergencies than the budget of the United Jewish Appeal at present allows for. The picture would, as I said, be totally black, were it not for the actuality, the living, fighting, life-saving fact of the agencies of the United Jewish Appeal.

We know, further, that as new areas abroad are liberated from the grip of Hitlerism we will find the surviving three or four million Jews living amid conditions of utter destitution. They will be starved, freezing, shelterless, and ridden with the epidemics, ranging from tuberculosis to typhus, that inevitably accompany such conditions.

Do we want these people to die—as their 3,000,000 brothers have already died—even on the day of their liberation? Would it not be to our eternal discredit if they survived the ravages of war, only to perish through our indifference in the now plainly foreseen era of peace?

We cannot wait until the storm of fresh disasters, fresh emergencies, new famines, and plagues are upon us. To meet them, when they come, we must plan now, build now, work now, and above all—give now.

The future of many hundreds of thousands of Jewish people in war-torn Europe hangs in the balance, depending solely upon what we in America determine to do. And from the bottom of my heart I believe, too, that our own futures depend upon their receiving the help it is our great responsibility to send.

Cardinal O'Connell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very timely statement on the passing of His Eminence William Cardinal O'Connell, archbishop of Boston, which appeared in the Daily Evening Item, Lynn, Mass., on April 24, 1944:

CARDINAL O'CONNELL

A stanch rock, steadfast amidst the swirling tides of modern skepticism, unbelief, and transient philosophies, Cardinal O'Connell symbolized the calm assurance, the gentle yet militant spirit and the unwavering devotion to rectitude which characterize those whose lives are patterned on that of Christ. First and foremost, from his early days as a humble altar boy at St. Peter's in Lowell, through the successive achievements and honors of a rich and busy life, he was a Christian—a follower of Christ. All else was secondary.

His sublime faith was accompanied by a diversity of personal gifts which would have won him eminence in any field. He had a keen, sternly disciplined mind. His instincts were those of the artist and found expression in his lifelong love of music, his skill and strength as a writer, his beautiful eloquence in the pulpit and in his other public addresses, his keen appreciation of the subtleties and cadences of foreign tongues and his love of nature, in which he saw the continuing and undying manifestation of God's goodness to men.

Yet His Eminence was no cloistered priest. He was keenly alert to worldly developments and he could sense a trend, particularly if it were a morally dangerous one, long before other men realized its import. Courageous and outspoken, he never hesitated to condemn sinful or harmful tendencies, no matter where they appeared, and his opinions were feared by the wrongdoer and eagerly hailed by those, of no matter what faith, who were fighting for righteousness.

An able administrator, he made the Archdiocese of Boston a model for the entire Catholic world. He was the good shepherd, ever mindful of the needs of his flock, and the countless schools, hospitals, churches, mission enterprises, and welfare institutions which were established and administered under his prudent and judicious direction will long stand as temporal monuments to his forethought and wisdom.

He was a patriotic American who loved his country, but he was no isolationist. All peoples were children of God in his sight. Archbishop Spellman's beautiful tribute might well be his epitaph: "In him love of country followed love of God and nobly he served them both."

Greater Lynn was frequently honored by his gracious presence, either at ecclesiastical functions or during the summers he spent at his seaside homes in Nahant and Marblehead. A great and kindly man has gone, leaving a void that will not soon be filled.

Air-Line Service for Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, as further indication of the urgent need for through transcontinental air-line service from the Boston Airport, I call to the attention of the Congress, the following resolutions recently adopted by the Massachusetts House of Representatives:

Resolutions in favor of improved and additional air-line service for Massachusetts

Whereas the Commonwealth of Massachusetts now lacks through transcontinental airline service to many important cities throughout the country; and

Whereas many other areas of less size and economic importance enjoy multiple trunk line air service in many directions; of the five largest metropolitan areas in America—New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, and Boston—Boston alone is so discriminated against as to be served by only one transcontinental airline; and

Whereas Washington, which was also served by but one transcontinental air line, has had its situation rectified by recent action of the Civil Aeronautics Board so as to enjoy today the facilities of all the transcontinental air lines; and

Whereas emphatic consideration should be given to Boston as an ideal point of arrival and departure for trans-oceanic traffic. It is nearest to Europe of our large eastern cities and its airport facilities at Boston and Bedford will be adequate to handle the largest airplanes of the future; and

Whereas the lack of competitive trunk transcontinental air-line services is working to the detriment of the commercial and industrial welfare of Massachusetts and its development: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of Massachusetts urgently demands that the Civil Aeronautics Board grant additional certificates of convenience and necessity to competing transcontinental air lines that will give to Massachusetts through trunk-line routes direct to important cities throughout the country without the necessity of changing at New York, in order to bring to Massachusetts the benefits to be derived by the future traffic of the air; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded by the state secretary to each member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, to each of the Members of Congress from Massachusetts, and to such other persons and bodies as may, in his opinion, have the interest and authority to assure Massachusetts of its rightful place in the air world.

Danger of Disunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, last week the Secretary of War, Hon. Henry L. Stimson, delivered a very interesting address before the annual meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. Under the permission granted me I include that address as part of my remarks. It follows:

I welcome this opportunity to meet this gathering of editors from all parts of our country.

By nature I tend to devote myself to a single-minded and perhaps too narrow concentration on the job at hand. For the past 3 years my job has been primarily with the Army and only secondarily and more remotely with public opinion.

Your job is public information and public thought, and what concerns us tonight is public thought—the trend of public thought toward our armed forces.

Possibly I have exaggerated it but it seems to me that today the press reflects a growing disposition on the part of our people to set apart the Army and the Navy from those in civilian life; in other words, to separate a part of our population as a disconnected task force which has been selected to do a difficult, unpleasant, and dangerous job. And while they engage in this desperate assignment, a large part of the remainder of the country feels free to climb up into the grandstand, prepared to watch the show. You should know whether this impression of mine is correct. You are intimately concerned with what the people think and contribute largely to the formation of their thought.

The disturbing thing is that there is much plausible reason for the setting up of such a mental condition of separation. Except for the personal tie of love and affection for individuals who are in danger, the war has moved far away from our vicinity. The efficient setting up and training of powerful armies on land and sea and in the air and their transport to theaters of offensive action thousands of miles away has given an almost irresistible impression of ultimate and even prompt victory. What better opportunity could there be than this for reverting to undiluted, self-interested human nature—for discarding from our minds the necessary sacrifices which should be in the thoughts of a nation at war for its very existence.

And yet, I believe that there is no one among you who does not realize, in the bottom of his heart, that such an attitude of mind, such an illusion is all wrong, and that in it lies the only possibility of our ultimate defeat. That is the condition upon which our enemies, still powerful and still unconquered, are staking their chance for victory. From the very beginning they have continuously and consistently preached to their armed forces and to their people that the United States was too soft, too self-interested, too divided to wage war on the gigantic scale which they would force upon us. They believe it now. They have staked their future on it. Division of our war effort, either by division among our armed forces themselves, or between the armed forces and the civilian population (which was the major cause of the collapse of Germany in 1918), or division between ourselves and our allies—there lies the possibility of defeat.

As to the first, I have no alarm. I should be willing to guarantee that no matter what the tide of battle may bring, your armed forces will fight in complete unity until the race is run. In that direction our enemy has made a major miscalculation. Our supposedly soft and pacifistic youth have emerged from the fire as more than a match for their battle-hardened and supposedly invincible opponents. They have already justified their place in history.

As to the other possibilities of disunity, if in this crisis of the war they should occur, I do not presume to place the responsibility. History will have to do that.

But I do not shrink from pointing out the dire effect which would be caused by such disunity or the vital necessity of complete union in mind and effort of our whole people which will be required to pass the present crisis and to win the war. I see among you men who like myself were in uniform in Europe during the vital year of 1918 when in the last World War the power of the United States was called upon to solve a situation which was dangerously approaching a stalemate. You will remember as I do that it was not so much the actual appearance on the battlefields of that fraction of our strength which reached those fields, gallantly as they fought, which produced the final collapse of Germany. On the contrary it was the prospect of the unlimited strength which lay behind those forces, acting in a superb unity, and approaching in readiness to bring giant strength to the cause of the Allies.

I assure you that the same situation is even more critically upon us today. Britain is in the fifth year of a long, harassing, and critical war. Russia has been fighting with all her giant strength for nearly 3 years. We are only now approaching that climax of our effort which will occur on the battlefields of Europe when for the first time our Armies meet the masses of German Army strength.

When that major issue is joined, our enemies must be made aware of an overwhelming surge of military power which they cannot resist. They must also be made aware that behind that military power comes the even greater power of this united Nation ready to make every bitter sacrifice which will be needed to break the spirit of entrenched evil in Germany as well as the entrenched might of her armies.

At such an hour every symptom of vacillation, division, or disunity on our part will be eagerly watched for and welcomed by our enemies as an encouragement to prolonged effort; while on the other hand the revelation of a united country standing behind our Armies, spreading its spirit like an aura over their efforts, will be the weapon that will break the Nazi heart.

That is the picture as it lies before my eyes. I believe it to be conservative and not in any way exaggerated. I therefore suggest to you gentlemen that in solving the particular problems which may confront you, in your comment upon events as they unfold, and in your guidance of public thought, you always keep in your minds this objective of delivering against our enemy the overwhelming power of a united nation.

If you approach the news of the coming operations with this objective, examining closely the opportunities for praise and blame—weighing carefully the problems of emphasis—and considering possibly even the duty of silence during moments of trial and tribulation, I have no doubt that the verdict of history will credit you with a major part in the victory which must and will be ours.

American People Can Win Present War Only If Everyone Takes Part in Struggle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by

Lowell Mellett, entitled "American People Can Win Present War Only if Everyone Takes Part in Struggle," from the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., April 25, 1944:

AMERICAN PEOPLE CAN WIN PRESENT WAR ONLY IF EVERYONE TAKES PART IN STRUGGLE

(By Lowell Mellett)

Someone once said in better language that in times of great crisis a man always emerges to meet that crisis. Much history is cited as proof that this is true, but I believe it is open to debate.

True, the American struggle for independence produced George Washington and the Civil War produced Abraham Lincoln. True, the present world condition has produced Churchill, Stalin, Chiang Kai-shek, and Roosevelt. But, it seems to me, a lot of crises in the history of the human race never were met, whether because the necessary man did not emerge or for some other reason.

The crisis was not met for untold millions submerged in the misery of the Dark Ages. The crisis was not met for the little people of our own time in the late great depression. True, the country as a whole was pulled out of it, but for the babies that starved or suffered such malnutrition that their whole lives have been affected, the crisis was not met.

VICTIMS OF TWO CRISES

The country seems sure to pull through the present crisis as a nation, but can it be said that the men who give their lives or their limbs to the effort have pulled through? I don't think it can be. They are the absolute victims of two crises, the one which followed the last war and which was not met, even in the terms of the Nation's interest, and the one which has engulfed them now as a result of the first failure. By that I mean failure of our statesmen to do their part toward forestalling this present World War.

The great man of all history will be the man who succeeds in doing what Woodrow Wilson tried to do. But I don't believe that any one single man will be able to do that. Just as we cannot leave it to one man to win this war for us, just as we cannot leave it to any one or all of the four men named, we cannot leave it to one man or four men to win the next great crisis in the world's history—before it occurs.

Eisenhower cannot win this war. MacArthur and Nimitz cannot win it. Nor can Marshall and King. Roosevelt cannot win it. Only the American people can. And the American people can win it only if they are all in it. I think this is coming to be understood. I think there is a great deal of soul-searching going on in this country at this time; that people are beginning again to ask themselves as they did in the days immediately following Pearl Harbor, "Am I doing all that I can?"

ACCEPT SITUATION PHILOSOPHICALLY

I don't believe there is as much resistance by the people to the Government's efforts to fit them into the war program as a lot of political and other leaders appear to think. I believe the people recognize that it is not easy to devise a system of selection that will automatically produce complete justice for all men and women. I believe they are willing to accept such unavoidable injustices as occur.

Many have reason to feel they have been miscast, that their best abilities are being disregarded, but almost without exception they seem to accept the situation philosophically. They aren't quitting. This is not a Nation of sunshine soldiers and summer patriots.

We are going to win this war. The American people are going to win it. The thing to pray for is that when we have achieved this victory we will put the same concerted effort into meeting the next crisis—before it occurs.

If we do that, we will be the greatest people in history.

The Honorable James M. Graham

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVAN HOWELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to pay tribute to the Honorable James M. Graham, former Member of Congress from the Twenty-first Illinois District, who observed his ninety-second birthday on Friday, April 14, at his home in Springfield, Ill.

Mr. Graham served three terms as a Democrat in this House during the Sixty-first, Sixty-second, and Sixty-third Congresses, beginning on March 4, 1909, and ending on March 3, 1915. He is the oldest living former Member of Congress in the United States.

I commend to the Members of this House a story appearing in the April 13, 1944, issue of the Illinois State Journal, Springfield, Ill., with reference to Mr. Graham's life. It follows:

HE WON'T GET OLD—CONTENT AND PHILOSOPHICAL, JAMES M. GRAHAM FACES 92

(By Shirley Rogers)

Tomorrow James M. Graham will celebrate his ninety-second birthday, and four generations of Grahams, scattered throughout the country, will be thinking of the illustrious head of their family. Besides the immediate family circle, consisting of 3 sons, 3 daughters, 11 grandchildren, and 14 great-grandchildren; more than 100 cousins here and in Champaign County can also claim him.

Visiting with Mr. Graham is a most stimulating affair, for his interest and knowledge of current affairs makes him a gifted conversationalist. The atmosphere of his home is pleasant and cultured, and his books, numbering almost 3,000, reveal that he has never ceased being a student.

Summing up the events of his life for almost a century, he modestly claims that he has never done anything outstanding.

CAME FROM IRELAND WHEN 16

At 16 he came to America from Ireland, helped his father farm for a short time, taught school over a period of 7 years, studying law at night until he passed the bar. He was most active in court circles, and in 1885 was appointed to serve on the national uniform laws committee, a position which he maintained for 20 years.

Elected Congressman in 1909, when the late William Howard Taft was President, he remained in Washington until 1915. His fellow legislators, Graham says, were men of high grade and fine ability, possessing both intellect and honesty. He believes this holds true of Congress today and agrees thoroughly with his colleague the late Champ Clark of Missouri, former Speaker of the House, that a man who breaks into Congress must have a quality which gives him distinction—even though it only be a sense of humor. Many famous men served with him during this time, including New York City's little flower, Mayor LaGuardia, who he says is one grand fellow.

James Graham returned once to the country where he was born. For 2 short months he visited England and Scotland as well. As a boy he was enchanted by Roman and Greek history and had always desired to visit Italy. But at that time it was impossible for him to visit the Continent, and now he fears that he will never be able to do so.

CATHOLIC HONOR SURPRISES HIM

In 1935 he was informed through Bishop James Griffin, and a personal letter from the Pope he had been appointed a knight of St. Gregory. This honor, bestowed on only a few laymen in this country, came as a total surprise to him and he has never been able to understand why he had been singled out from amongst so many others.

Graham is erect, agile, and still active in civic affairs. He attends meetings of the Lincoln library board, the Sangamon County Building and Loan Association regularly. He is president of the Civic Lincoln Memorial Gardens Association and manages to visit the law offices of Graham & Graham in the Reisch Building at least once a day. Though he is known to be the oldest former Congressman living there is little in his looks or actions to prove it. Facing another birthday Friday, James M. Graham says that one of the things which have kept him young are his many good friends who refuse to allow him to go into retirement.

Post-War Readjustment Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, it is most heartening to know that leaders in many communities are looking into the future—thinking and planning ahead for the post-war readjustment period.

The Glenwood (Iowa) Chamber of Commerce is to be congratulated for adopting the following resolution, which proves that it is alert to the problems facing the people of America and their great desire to preserve free enterprise, under which system our Nation has risen to greatness.

May Divine Providence give us the necessary strength, wisdom, and tolerance to preserve it, and may we on the home front do our part to deserve it, so we can look our returning veterans squarely in the face and say, "We kept the faith; here is your America—unaltered and unspoiled—the America for which you served and fought so gallantly and victoriously."

Resolved, That the Glenwood Chamber of Commerce give its unqualified endorsement to the following statement of principles and procedures.

One of the vital requirements of a free, democratic society is that the farms, the factories, and the business establishments of a country shall be owned and successfully operated by the people themselves, and not by the Government. Accordingly, under all circumstances, during prosperity or depression, our Government should direct its energies toward preserving and strengthening private enterprise.

The serious national problems of the last depression arose so suddenly that unplanned, hasty Government action was unavoidable. The procedures followed, especially in unemployment relief, were inevitably inefficient and wasteful, and gave little consideration to the need for maintaining our private enterprises, such as contracting firms, in a sound condition. Direct employment of labor by Government results in destroying the normal sources of private employment which are a vital part of our democratic structure.

We now have an opportunity to profit by those past experiences in the advance plans being made by private enterprise, as well as by our National, State, and local governments, to meet the readjustment problems of the post-war period. Private enterprise must plan to use every means at its command to provide adequate post-war employment, but our National, State, and local governments must be prepared to supplement normal, private employment if such action should be required to avoid unemployment hardships.

Such goverment planning should include local financing of public works projects, insofar as that may be feasible; and should, in each community, give preference to available projects of the greatest social or economic value, which are not competitive with established private enterprise; and, as already emphasized, should avoid direct government employment of labor by using established private contracting firms.

Such a procedure will be beneficial to all, as it will give employment to the idle, will help preserve established private enterprises, and will produce better results at lower cost. In other words, under such a plan, our entire economic and democratic structures will be preserved, and the money spent will produce the greatest results in terms of wealth created for the benefit of all.

Address of Hon. Clare Boothe Luce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Representative CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, of Connecticut, to the New Zionist Organization of America, delivered at the Hotel Commodore, New York City, April 23, 1944:

In London on November 2, 1917, Mr. Balfour, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, issued what has since come to be known as the Balfour Declaration. This pledged the British Government to the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people. For this reason above all Palestine was mandated to the British at the end of World War No. 1.

In 1922 the Congress of the United States passed a joint resolution favoring the establishment of this national home.

Two years later, in 1924, after an American-British convention on the subject of Palestine, President Calvin Coolidge issued a proclamation with respect to the rights of our nationals in British mandated Palestine. The ratification of that proclamation was advised by the United States Senate and then signed by the President and Mr. Austen Chamberlin the following year. Article 2 of the proclamation stated that "the mandatory shall be responsible for placing the country under such political, administrative, and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish National Home." Article 5 squarely placed the responsibility on the British mandatory for "seeing that no Palestine territory shall be ceded or leased to or in any way placed under the control of any foreign power." Article 6 pledged the mandatory to facilitate immigration and settlements. Article 27 said: "The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of this mandate." Whereupon to this proclamation was added in treaty form article 7: "Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate, as recited above, unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States."

It is important for Americans to realize, since many apparently do not, that under Republican administrations in time past our Congress has gone overwhelmingly on the record in favor of the purpose for which the mandate was primarily created, a national homeland for the Jews; that our Government signed a treaty with the British that no modification of the terms of this mandatory could ever be effected without the consent of the League or the United States, and that this consent has never been given.

But all this was 20 years ago. Time marched on. The Jews came to Palestine in many numbers. Their capital, industry, diligence, sweat and brains, raised the living standards of themselves and the Arabs unbelievably. Their great dream, the dream of Israel was coming true. They made the very desert bloom. And then, as Hitler came into power, Palestine became not only a home, but a blessed sanctuary for the driven and persecuted German Jews. And then came Munich, the climax of the terrible and bitter, and, in the end futile, drama of British appeasement of the Nazis. Gradually the logic of strong Nazi policy conspired with the logic of weak British policy to betray not only the Jews of Germany but the Jews of Palestine. This betrayal was embodied in the British "white paper" promulgated in May 1939, which stopped at the end of 5 years any further Jewish immigration into Palestine. In Great Britain's agonizing search for allies anywhere, and everywhere, Chamberlain's government, but another Chamberlain—Neville—sought to appease the rising nationalistic spirit of the Palestinian Arabs. The Balfour Declaration became another famous "scrap of paper." And Britain's unilateral action, illegal because it was taken without the consent of the League of Nations, or recognition by the United States of America, the 1924 treaty with our own Government became a scrap of paper, too. Though few Americans realized at the time that the white paper was not only an illegal but an immoral document, one great Britisher realized it fully.

Let me read you some quotes from Mr. Winston Churchill, then a simple Member of Parliament. On the floor of Commons, 5 years ago this May, he said this about the white paper:

"I cannot understand why this course has been taken. I search around for the answer. * * * Is our condition so parlous and our state so poor that we must, in our weakness, make this sacrifice of our declared purpose? * * * I must say that I have not taken such a low view of the strength of the British Empire, or of the very many powerful countries who desire to walk in association with us; but if the Government, with their superior knowledge of the deficiencies in our armaments * * * really feels that we are too weak to carry out our obligations and wish to file a petition in moral and physical bankruptcy, that is an argument which, however ignominicus, should certainly weigh with the House in these dangerous times. But is it true? I do not believe it is true. I cannot believe that the task to which we set our hand 20 years ago in Palestine is beyond our strength, or that faithful perseverance will not, in the end, bring that task through to a glorious success. I am sure of this, that to cast the Balfour plan aside and show yourselves infirm of will and unable to pursue a long, clear, and considered purpose, bending and twisting under the crush and pressure of events—I am sure that that is going to do us a most serious and grave injury at a time like this. * * * What will be the opinion of the United States of America? Shall we not lose more—and this is a question to be considered maturely—in the growing support and sympathy of the United States than we shall gain in local administrative convenience, if gain at all indeed we do? What will our potential enemies think? What will those wha have been stirring up these Arab agitators think? Will they not be encouraged by our confession of recoil? Will they not be tempted to say: 'They're on the run again. This is another Munich.'"

It was another Munich, of course, as everyone now knows. But before American public opinion had a chance to protest this violation of our treaty and this betrayal of the Balfour plan, war came. And while England stood heroically alone against the Nazis, Americans could not, dared not, deny Great Britain whatever help or comfort she may have thought she derived from the Arab world through her action on the white paper. Moreover, then we were implicated too deeply ourselves in the appeasement of Nazi Germany.

But now 5 years have passed. As one of the mighty United Nations, we stand fighting side by side with our British Allies. Today, the ultimate defeat of the Axis is in sight. Today, the Middle East is no longer in vital danger. Today, there is no physical need, as there never were moral grounds, for appeasing the Arabs, if indeed they demand appeasement, which many wise men deny. And yet the infamous, cynical, illegal white paper, born of long forgotten British weakness and terror, went into effect on April 1 of this year. April Fool's Day. What an appropriate date that must have seemed to the persecuted European Jews. How the Nazis must have rocked with glee at this bloody April Fool's joke which democracy and Christianity itself had played on the Jews.

Today, unless our Government acts to expunge this illegal act from the record, to redeem the honor of our treaty, we Americans will be endorsing the very spirit of Munich anew.

I say unless our Government acts. Now, I shall be quite frank with you. It is the only way I know how to help. Mr. Churchill was, and I believe still is, a loyal supporter of the Balfour Declaration and of the treaty which Calvin Coolidge signed putting the American Government behind the purposes of that declaration. All who know Mr. Churchill are certain of this. But the same forces, the very same sinister forces of appeasement in the British Foreign Office which promulgated the white paper, tie his hands now. How do they tie them? They simply argue that action is up to the United States of America. If the American Government, which under its 1924 treaty has every right to protest the white paper, does not protest it, they say, with some reason, why should they take the entire onus of an action unpopular with the Arab world? But if our American Government insists on Britain upholding her treaty with us, and a return to our joint pre-Munich agreements on Palestine, in honor and under law, they will have to give way.

Now, this Seventy-eighth Congress tried to advise our administration that this was precisely what it wanted our Government to do. Congress introduced the Wagner-Taft resolution in the Senate and the Wright-Compton resolution in the House early this year to demonstrate to Britain and before the world that its will was that the white paper should be stricken from history's record. But those resolutions were killed. How? By the urgent, off-the-record advice of General Marshall and the State Department at secret hearings. Anyone who knows the inside story of what happened on the Hill—and I followed it quite closely, as many did—knows that in this question our President, while Commander in Chief, took the advice of his chief of staff; our President, while sole designer and arbiter of our day-to-day foreign policy, took the advice of his State Department against any action now. In short, our administration gave the Palestine resolutions no support in the House. Had it done so, those resolutions would have been overwhelmingly passed, and the British white paper would be dead now. If ever there was a time for constructive and positive statecraft in the active solution of a problem, this was it. To be sure, although there was no action, our administration did give the Jews of the world some very inspiring and, I hope, comforting words—the promise of justice for the cause of Zionism—at some future time. The promise to bring to the block or the gibbet their Axis persecutors—at some future time. Now Zionists can live on promises. They have had thousands of years of doing so. But will promises, however happy, keep trapped and persecuted Jews in the Balkans and elsewhere in Europe alive? Will the knowledge that the Nazis are to be punished for their crimes keep life in the Jews who are dying in countless numbers under their heel today? You know they will not. It is all very well to look into the future through rose-colored glasses. But not, as Sam Grafton says, when that rosy hue is really imparted by the blood of other men. The Jews of Europe were promised one small home. They are inheriting a million yawning, nameless graves.

For my part, I know that the whole question of Zionism, as an intellectual one, has long been debatable. Jews themselves continue to debate it, even while Jewish blood stains the blue Mediterranean red. But there is no debate and can be no debate about saving people's lives now and today. When all the fine rhetoric is over, there are only four things that can be done about the refugee Jews of Europe.

1. Admit them into Palestine as we and the British had agreed to do before the white paper made mock of our "long, clear, and considered purpose." I think that this is the proper, the sensible, the legal, and the entirely possible thing to do.

2. Find another homeland in someone else's territory for them. Such a special search, fraught with a variety of economic, nationalistic, and emotional considerations, awaits the end of the war and international conferences on the subject. It is no solution to either the Palestine question or the refugee question now.

3. Let down the bars of immigration for them here and in Great Britain. This would require a revision of our own immigration laws, which I do not need to tell you is a political impossibility at this time.

4. Let the Jews die.

When all the talk is done—or perhaps because all the talk is never done—we are letting them die. To this extent we are as bad as Hitler. I do not see how I can put it any more plainly than that.

I am told very often by my friends on the Hill that the only conclusive argument for the white paper—but the one they all accept, with streaming eyes—is that the Arabs "may make trouble" if we do not assent to it. In short, that now and in the post-war era, there will be unrest in the Arab world, if we return to our pledged word and signed deeds on the Balfour Declaration. As one who has been in that part of the world, I don't believe it. I have seen far too many evidences of friendly Arab cooperation with the growing Jewish homeland in Palestine. And I believe that vigorous, sincere statesmanship could shortly bring the Arabs into amicable accord on the question of Palestine. But suppose it is true? Is this a sufficient reason for Americans to allow their own treaties to be dishonored? And I ask you, what does our Government intend to have an international police force for, a four-power treaty for, a world organization, court, or league for, if not precisely to enforce the sanctity of our treaties and keep justice and peace in troubled parts of the world? If the United Nations cannot keep peace in little Palestine with the vast force we already have there, and the "instrumentalities for keeping the peace" we intend to create in the post-war world, then where in God's name—and I say in God's name—shall we keep the peace in this world?

I think not only of our Palestine treaty with Great Britain, now dead in letter, but I think of the Atlantic Charter and the Moscow agreements, and yes, if you will, of the "four freedoms"—though one freedom, liberty, will do, I suspect, for the Palestine Jews. And I repeat for Americans and to America, Winston Churchill's ringing 5-year-old words: "Is our condition so parlous and our state so poor that we must in our weakness make this sacrifice of our declared purposes? Are we too weak to carry out our obligations? Do we wish to file a petition in moral and physical bankruptcy?" What, so soon?

Zionist friends, friends of a free Palestine, above all friends who simply wish to save innocent human lives, whether they be Jewish or any other nationality, persuade our Government to act. I have sometimes been criticized for saying frankly that I believe our country should be the greatest, the strongest, in the world. That it is the strongest today there is no doubt. But we shall never be the greatest if we default, not only in our obligation to stand by the treaties our Government has signed but in moral and Christian leadership. This we are doing on the question of the white paper now.

Can't we have done, we Americans, with pleas to a foreign government, to a British Prime Minister, who is either bound by his own Foreign Office, in which case he cannot act; or now persuaded against you himself, in which case he will not act? Let us make our respectful plea to the two men to whom both he and his Foreign Office must listen respectfully—to our President and our Secretary of State. Causes can never be won abroad which are not first won at home.

Let us make our plea simple; no more rhetorical promises but honest action—action to reinstate the treaty which our Government signed with the British just 20 years ago; action which will give sanctuary and liberty to a people who have suffered too much, too unjustly, and too long.

Then we will have accomplished two things: The restoration of our country's honored pledges and the salvation of many innocent Jewish lives. Then what Max Lerner considers the greatest argument for all men of good will, "the simple and shining truth of humanity," will not be denied. We must not let it be. As Jews and as Christians, as Americans all, let us see to this for the sake of all for which we claim to fight this war. But especially for the sake of our immortal souls.

President Roosevelt and the Judiciary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, quarreling between members of President Roosevelt's United States Supreme Court has broken into the open several times recently in form of sharp statements contained in divided opinions of the Court in which justices of one opinion were highly critical of the course taken by the others. The Court has even charged itself with being inconsistent. These recent outbursts are causing many to question the wisdom of course followed in making present appointments. Practically all the "nine old men" who were the target of New Deal theorists in the early days of the Roosevelt administration are now gone.

President Roosevelt's hand-picked majority on the Nation's highest tribunal now totals seven of the nine justices. Six of his seven have been members of the inner sanctum. Justice Black carried the torch for the President in the Senate; Justice Reed was Franklin D. Roosevelt's Solicitor General and represented the administration in such noted Supreme Court cases as N. R. A. and others; Justice Frankfurter has been close adviser to the President; Justice Douglas had a colorful career as a member and later chairman of S. E. C.; Justice Murphy, New Deal Governor of Michigan and Governor General of the Philippines, went to the Supreme Court from Franklin D. Roosevelt's appointment as Attorney General; Justice Jackson served successively as general counsel for the Bureau of Internal Revenue, Solicitor General, and Attorney General. Justice Rutledge is the only Roosevelt appointee to the Court who did not grow up in the New Deal family.

No other one President in this Nation's history ever appointed so many Justices of the Supreme Court. The roster of the Court against which the President launched his attack was composed of the then Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Van Devanter, appointees of President Taft; Justices McReynolds and Brandeis, appointed by President Wilson; Justices Sutherland and Butler, appointed by President Harding; present Chief Justice Stone was appointed by President Coolidge; and Justices Roberts and Cardozo appointed by President Hoover. Of this nine only Chief Justice Stone and Justice Roberts remain.

In the United States circuit and district courts 216 of the 238 presently sitting judges have been appointed by President Roosevelt. No other President ever came near making such a vast number of judicial appointments. Political appointments run down through the lot, even to the extent that the Governor of one State called the appointee a pawn in the hands of a political boss. Outstanding in political appointments to Federal courts have been Members of Congress who have been repudiated by their constituents, only to land a judgeship. Writing in a recent issue of the Kentucky Law Journal, Prof. Charles Smith, Jr., of the University of Kentucky, stated:

Although political appointees to the Supreme Court sometimes have been very good ones, no evidence is available to indicate that appointments to lesser courts made to please Senators who want to pay off political debts or to please party bosses who need patronage, have ever turned out so well. President Roosevelt's record in these matters betrays an attitude toward the judiciary which could hardly be called one of reverence, and it is not calculated to inspire reverence in the minds of others.

The Supreme Court was the object of a smear campaign in 1937. Today the Congress is target of a similar effort. The Federal judiciary must handle the problem of interpreting the Constitution and enforcing the laws as between the citizen and his government. It is an unfortunate state of affairs when the confidence of the people in their courts and in their Congress is destroyed. Federal judges are appointed for life and judgeships should not be made a haven for disabled politicians. The voters can take care of their individual Members of the House every 2 years.

Executive orders constitute another phase of the broad control of Government exercised by the President in an unprecedented manner. President Roosevelt has issued 45 percent of all Executive orders since and including the administration of President Lincoln. He has issued twice as many as any other President in the history of our Republic, and twice as many as the combined number of Executive orders issued during both the Civil War and World War No. 1. In some years his Executive orders, which often have the effect of law, have even exceeded the number of laws passed by Congress in the same period. Since he took office in 1933, President Roosevelt has issued 3,707 Executive orders as compared to 4,553 laws enacted by Congress during the same period. These Executive orders are in addition to the multitude of administrative orders issued by his bureau chiefs in the jig-saw puzzle of New Deal agencies.

Maverick, Man of Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star of March 12, 1944:

MAVERICK, S. W. P. C. HEAD, MAN OF ENERGY

(By Edward A. Harris)

When burly, bass-voiced Maury Maverick, of Texas, was selected early this year to head the Smaller War Plants Corporation, a murmur of approbation could be heard all the way from Capitol Hill to the big White House at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. From past experience the murmurers knew what to expect as Maury charged in with his usual rollicking gusto—and they expected the best.

For one thing, they knew that Maury was better equipped than the two preceding board chairmen, Lou E. Holland, of Kansas City, and Robert W. Johnson, of the eastern surgical supplies family, both of whom dropped the steering wheel after short trial runs.

For Maverick knows all the front portals and back alleys of the Nation's Capital. Having spent half his life in public service, he has learned how to circumvent red tape, how to sidestep slow or contrary officials. He is well versed in the gentle art of cocktail small talk, the tidbit social chatter that smooths the way for receptive ears in Congress and Government agencies the next day.

PHONE RINGS INCESSANTLY

The redoubtable Maury, who is 48 years old and tips the scales at 220 pounds, arrives at his office each day at 7:30 in the morning and usually stays until 6:30, working at his large, neat desk in his shirt sleeves. He has a dictaphone at his home and often knocks off letters and memoranda in the comparative leisure of his living room until midnight.

His office telephone rings incessantly, and in the hurly-burly of activity he sometimes is so pressed for time that he shouts dictation to his secretary in an adjoining office to save the few seconds it would take her to walk to his desk.

But if his office scene is unorthodox, Maury has method in his madness. His associates, secretaries, and assorted functionaries—and even his colleagues on the War Production Board, of which he is also Vice Chairman—are impressed by his industry and effectiveness no less than they are amused by his antics and unorthodoxies. For Maury, the nonconformer, has "savvy." He goes at things in a big way. And ahead of him lies one of the biggest jobs he's ever tackled.

Of equal importance with his know-how and boundless energy is the fact that Maverick came to his new post with a deep and sincere interest in the small businessman. He had, as the saying goes, been one himself—a lumberman. He had always fought for the underdog, and this job was cut to his lathe.

"LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORPORATION"

He is fond of bringing this fact home. Not long after he assumed his new duties early this year, he described his agency as the "little people's corporation," and joyously defined "little business" as "any business which cannot hire a lobbyist in Washington."

It is too early, of course, to assess Maverick's concrete accomplishments with the Smaller War Plants Corporation, but in view of his record of independence and assertiveness, his sympathy with the "little guy" and his progressive but realistic political philosophy, the outlook is promising.

He is quick to point out that the corporation is the only war agency set up by act of Congress, the others being Executive creations, and he adds happily that the Smaller War Plants Act was enacted as a nonpartisan measure, having been passed by both branches of Congress without a dissenting vote on June 11, 1942. As head of an independent agency, Maury has plenty of elbow room for freedom of act, and in this respect he fully exercises his prerogatives.

Purpose of the S. W. P. C., he has pointed out, is to enable the largest number of small business concerns to make military and essential civilian goods to the greatest extent possible. This is accomplished by going to bat for them with the various procurement offices, by actual financial assistance and by general advisory service.

His basic views dovetail so nicely with his duties that in talking he is apt to lump the two together. "We are for free enterprise and the American system," he declared, "and we are against cartels, dividing markets, against trusts and the cutting down of production in order to keep up prices. Restricting production through monopolies would restrict small enterprise—or kill it."

He favors decentralization of industry throughout the country: "You have more stable economic conditions if you have a diversification of industry, not only in big cities like Washington, St. Louis, New York, and Philadelphia, but in towns of 50,000 to 250,000. Take me away from big industrial cities." Here he was referring to post-war economics. "When our boys come back," he said, "we should try as much as possible not to have a reconcentration in the big city with the consequent development of housing, congestion, crime, and similar problems.

"The big cities of America should try to raise the standard of living and become better cities instead of bigger cities."

Our national industrial economy, he believes, rests not on a few large centers of mass production, but on countless small towns, each with one or more small factories. On demobilization the returning servicemen must have the opportunity to start out on their own, to establish small businesses and accomplish the aims and ambitions they have dreamed of—the cause for which they are now fighting.

In present war production, he says, "we've overestimated the importance of gigantic concerns and overlooked the techniques of small businesses." If the country fails to look ahead, if it permits cartels and monopolies to return after the war, it will be inviting a dangerous situation. Therefore we must blueprint post-war plans now.

"The effects of this war will be felt for at least a generation," he feels. "That's why it's downright silly to think that when the war is over every one will go back to dancing around the maypole and drinking Falstaff or Griesedieck beer in St. Louis without a thought about the future."

HASTE CAUSED MISTAKES

Maverick is often asked about Government bureaucracy, and he has a ready answer: "Some of the worst bureaucrats are those who've devoted their lives to denouncing bureaucracy. Much of our so-called bureaucracy stems from the vastness of the job the Government is doing. The Axis nations were organized for military action and we were not. We were compelled suddenly to create a huge wartime organization, and naturally we made mistakes.

"I think the combination of divergent forces that came up here to try to work together has resulted in the most remarkable job of organization and action in the history of the world. And in doing it we've retained the form and substance of a democracy."

While adhering firmly to the principle of free enterprise, Maverick makes it plain that he still favors public works. "After the war we will have a backlog of essential public improvements costing from thirty to fifty billion dollars—public health, reforestation, irrigation, conservation, the building of highways, slum clearance and all the rest. We need these things, not only to furnish employment for the needy, but for the welfare of the Nation.

"It's not socialism, not communism, not radicalism. It's just a part of the improvement program of any nation on the earth. I say it's essential to civilized society to have these things. And while we're on it, in St. Louis there is need for much city replanning, rehousing, and a reallocation of sunlight and open spaces—like many other cities of proportionate size."

It is interesting, in any appraisal of the new rampaging S. W. P. C. chairman, to note the genesis of the dictionary's definition of a "maverick" as an "unbranded animal." When Maury's grandfather, old Sam Maverick, was paid 450 head of cattle in settlement of a debt about the time he was signing the Texas Declaration of Independence, his Negro slaves neglected to brand the calves to such a consistent extent that whenever neighboring ranchmen spied an unmarked calf they at once drawled: "Guess that's Maverick's."

So it was that maverick came to mean an unbranded animal, a nonconformer, and in the past two decades the capital and generous portions of Texas have learned to concur in the definition in its literal application to old Sam's grandson.

Fighting Wins Wars, and Privates Are Important

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday night it was my privilege to attend the annual dinner of the American Society of Newspaper Editors as the guest of Mr. Fred Christopherson, editor of the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader. All who were there will agree that it was outstanding in these days of outstanding events. Mr. Roy Roberts, president of the society, stated that editors present represented newspapers with a combined circulation of more than 24,000,000 copies. The speakers of the evening were headed by the Honorable Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, and the Honorable James V. Forrestal, Under Secretary of the Navy. The Chiefs of Staff for the Army and Navy were present, many members of their staffs, and many Members of the Congress. Reviews were given of the progress of the war on various fronts, and of the outstanding miracles in production and invention that have marked our efforts.

It is significant, I think, however, that the greatest applause of the evening went to some remarks that paid tribute to that almost forgotten soldier—the foot soldier, the infantryman. The remarks were given by Brig. Gen. William L. Wilbur, assistant division commander of the Thirty-sixth Infantry, and under permission granted by the House, I insert them at this point:

THE MEN WHO PROTECT OUR FREEDOM

(Address by Brig. Gen. William H. Wilbur, U. S. Army, Assistant Division Commander, Thirty-sixth Infantry Division, before the annual meeting, American Society of Newspaper Editors, Washington, D. C., April 22, 1944)

As the war progresses I am greatly impressed by the marvelous job that American industry has done. Certainly its achievements have never been equaled in history. But, let us make no mistake, essential as it is, production cannot win a war. It is true that lack of production can lose a war, but, production cannot win one. I wish that it could.

The products of industry are used by fighting soldiers. The period when they are used on the battlefield is the critical, decisive, phase of war. Sometimes our soldiers smash that equipment. More times the enemy does.

I remember working my way to a vantage point on the front line—within sight of the famous monastery above Cassino. I saw what appeared to be an empty fox hole; for as I got close to it I noticed a Garand rifle, thoroughly chewed by shell fragments. The wooden stock was in slivers—the mechanism worthless. To my surprise a soldier stuck his head from the hole. I asked him if that was his rifle. "Yes, it is," he said, and reached over and placed his hand on the wreckage. "It is pretty well smashed," he said, "I should have taken better care of it. It was that shell that just lit here a minute ago. I was just able to duck, myself." Then he brightened up a bit. "But," he said, "I've still got six hand grenades."

Equipment of all kinds is used up, smashed and worn out, from Garand rifles to the most complicated machines of war. Industry must continue to feed in its products, in great quantity, and of the highest quality.

I wish that every American would see just what our men have gone through, and are going through, in Italy. For the fighting soldier at Anzio and Cassino it means day after day of struggle; struggle against rain, sleet, and ice; struggle against fatigue: heavy, sodden, overempowering fatigue; yet his job requires him to go up another thousand feet; struggle against the stupefying blow that strikes when one of his comrades is killed.

I wish every American could have been with me when I have asked one of these men, "How are you getting along?" Covered with mud, bleary-eyed from lack of rest, the infantry soldiers have looked up, squared their jaws and, without exception, have replied: "Fine, sir." They were not fine. They knew that I knew they were anything but fine. But they would not admit anything else.

All Americans can be deeply proud of them.

You will be interested to know of the joy and appreciation of the Italian people when liberated from the German yoke.

Typical of every town is the situation which we found when we went into the ruins of the village of San Pietro. Out of their caves and cellars came the pitiful villagers, dirty, fearful, dressed in worn and tattered clothing—a sorry sight.

An old man rushed up to me, threw his arms around me, and before I could get my guard up, kissed me. Others crowded around expressing their joy and appreciation to the Americanos.

I gave a gaunt old man a 5-cent package of Life Savers. "Molto grazia, molto grazia," he said, and then dove back into his shelter and shortly came up with a bag of dried figs. With real graciousness he tried to get me to accept some of them, although I am sure that he badly needed every one of them.

These pitiful villagers told us that the Germans had systematically looted the town before leaving, that they had taken not only the grain and other food but had collected all woolen clothing, women's as well as men's, for dispatch to Germany. Being slaves of Germany is hard.

Just as we were about to leave the village we encountered an Italian who spoke some English. I asked him how it happened that he spoke English. "Me, me live in Boston for 14 year. Oh, Boston. If me only there now."

Remembering the safety and comfort of our homes in America, we went on with a better understanding of just what we are fighting for in this war.

Contact with home is most important. The soldiers crave letters—they thirst for information of the little things that are going on at home. Anything that typifies your world means a lot to them. Red Cross girls handing out doughnuts are a breath of America. It is interesting to watch the reaction of the soldiers as they receive their doughnuts—each one handed out with a smile. Some, of course, make wisecracks. Others stand with open mouths—happy just to get a look at a fine American girl.

Blood plasma and its miraculous action is another strong tie to the people at home.

The combat soldier has great difficulty in understanding statements indicating that the war will be over very soon. He cannot understand any let-down of effort. Every day he sees his comrades wounded and killed. He sees no weakening on the part of the enemy in front of him. I have talked to a considerable number of German prisoners recently. They were mostly German infantry soldiers. They are solid in their belief that Germany will win the war. It is striking, and very disconcerting, too, to hear them say, with calm conviction, "Germany will win because we all will never quit." Their faith in the final outcome appears to be absolutely unshaken.

The attitude of those German prisoners explains, in part, why bombs and artillery fire cannot do the decisive part of the job of winning this war.

We had hoped that airplanes, tanks, artillery, and machines could carry the major part of the load of battle. We had hoped that in this war infantry could be charged with a minor role. It does not appear to be so. The infantry soldier still carries almost the entire load. On those fronts such as in Italy, where all elements of our fighting forces are in daily action against the enemy, this is most apparent. There for each individual private soldier of the artillery, Air Corps, engineers, or other arms that is killed there are 30, 50, even 100 privates of infantry who make the supreme sacrifice for their country.

Tanks, airplanes, rocket guns, and mines in the hands of the enemy have all combined to make the task of the infantryman a heavier one than in any war of the past. Our infantry realizes this. We, too, must realize that this war can be won when, and only when, the German infantry is defeated. The struggle of infantry against infantry, the physical domination of every German by a superior, free soldier, must be accomplished. In this struggle the human element is the vital one.

This is a war of survival.

In such a war every citizen should feel that he exists to help those men who are fighting the battle. Every worker, every factory, the War Department from top to bottom, every military agency between here and the battle front, exists to help the combat soldier do his tough job.

Wars are won by fighting men, individuals who have the courage to overcome danger, the stamina to withstand hardships of the toughest kind, the individual will to keep going forward regardless of murderous hostile fire, regardless of overpowering sodden fatigue, regardless of the fact that their comrades have been killed and wounded.

Those are the men who protect our freedoms.

When General Wilbur concluded his remarks, Mr. Speaker, that assembly of newspaper editors, supposedly hard-boiled when it comes to speeches, broke into prolonged applause and then stood and cheered for minutes. I do not think they were cheering the speaker, well as he had delivered his remarks. They were cheering the boys he had been talking about. And they hoped, I believe, that the fervor of their applause might somehow reach the boys and might somehow reach the soul of America.

In that thought I have placed the speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a worthy part of the story of the common doughboy, the foot soldier, the infantryman, the private with the gun and the hand grenade—in this war. And in the same vein, Mr. Speaker, under permission also given by the House, I offer for the RECORD an editorial from a small daily paper in South Dakota—the Daily Belle Fourche Post—entitled:

PRIVATES ARE IMPORTANT

Miracles of plastic surgery performed on our wounded servicemen are familiar to all of us. But they have been, until recently, a wonder done for a soldier somewhere—somebody's son, of course—but not one of our own.

Last week, a young soldier, on sick leave from one of these surgical miracles, spent a day in Belle Fourche with friends on his way to the Northwest country to visit relatives.

One side of his jaw and face had been shot away. Plastic surgeons had taken a piece from one of his thighs and grafted it into the wound. So skillful was the operation that the only difference between the two sides of his face was that one would grow a beard, the other wouldn't.

The scar line still showed plainly but that would fade—practically disappear—the surgeon had told him. Cheery as his spirits were, however, the youth showed that he was a wounded veteran, home on sick leave.

Before such sacrifice, I felt unworthy—as we all do—and mumbled something about how much he had suffered for us.

"Everybody says that," answered the soldier. "Everybody has been so kind—on the train, in the station, on the bus—as if they couldn't do enough for me.

"It's the attitude I've felt from the moment I entered combat duty—probably before—but I didn't realize it. It's as if every American serviceman were important—something precious being risked to save the Nation from the enemy. The precautions taken for our health, our safety and our contentment—even in those hellholes where we have to fight.

"When I was wounded, I couldn't have received more consideration had I been a general. From the first, I was assured that I'd have a new face—made, as my lieutenant told me, by the best damn surgeon in the world. Not once did anybody let me feel that all this was too much bother for a buck private.

"The doctors in the hospital—big boys who can ask their price in private practice, and get it—did their darndest on me, one of the millions of Joes in the Army. I've had the best of nursing, Red Cross care—every mile of the way from that fighting front to the Denver hospital—U. S. O. services to help me forget my pain, my mail rushed to me—as if the whole Nation knew I was wounded and wanted to make me just as comfortable as possible.

"I've offered my life, I know. I've had a lot of pain. And I'll probably have some more. But a country like this—where a private is important—is worth suffering for. And just as soon as they'll let me, I'm going back to help finish the job."

I broke away as fast as I could. I knew that boy would call me a darned pantywaist if I blubbered before him. I wanted to get by myself where I could pray, as I had never felt a need to pray before: "God, help us that we may never let that boy down."

A Further Reply to the Seventeenth District Americanism Commission of Los Angeles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, on April 21 I inserted in the RECORD a statement in reply to some Legionnaires in Los Angeles, Calif., who had accused me of misusing my franking privilege.

In accordance with the unanimous-consent request granted me, I herewith submit a letter sent to me by some lady who had inquired at the national headquarters of the American Legion concerning the action of the Seventeenth District Americanism Commission of Los Angeles. The following letter is self-explanatory and requires no comment:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Indianapolis, Ind., April 21, 1944.

Miss OPAL ESSANT,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MISS ESSANT: I have for acknowledgment your letter of April 17 about Congressman HAMILTON FISH.

You probably are now referring to the radio broadcast of Walter Winchell on last Sunday night in which mention was made of the Seventeenth District Americanism Commission of Los Angeles, Calif.

That particular Americanism commission represents a very, very small segment of the American Legion and its actions has not had either county, State, or National approval.

Sincerely yours,

H. L. CHAILLAUX,
Director, National Americanism Commission.

Reduction in War Profits by Renegotiation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the Maritime Commission is to be congratulated on the agreement reached with the Oregon Shipbuilding Corporation by which the profit on Liberty ships was reduced to approximately $25,000 per ship.

As part of my remarks, I include a statement issued by the Commission. It follows:

An agreement with the Oregon Shipbuilding Corporation has been set up as a basic formula for renegotiating the ship construction contracts awarded to the group of Liberty shipbuilders who received their first contracts in 1941, the United States Maritime Commission announced today.

The case of the Oregon Shipbuilding Corporation covered the first 5 contracts awarded to that corporation aggregating 181 Liberty cargo ships completed prior to May 4, 1943. The renegotiation agreement as signed finds that this corporation has received or accumulated $6,322,954.08 in net excess profits, after deducting $163,960.60 for items adjusted in renegotiation. This amount, less credit for taxes paid on unreceived income, if any, is to be credited against fees which the contractor has earned since May 4, 1943, and not yet received.

Oregon earned $23,958,564.68 in fees under the terms of its contracts. The renegotiation procedure reduced this to $17,471,650, or $96,528.45 on each of the 181 vessels. From this was deducted $1,267,000, representing disallowances of items claimed by the contractor, leaving $16,204,650 income after renegotiation but before taxes. The net income of Oregon for its services in building 181 ships, after renegotiation and after estimated taxes are deducted, amounts to $4,537,302, or approximately $25,000 per ship, or 1½ percent of the cost of each ship.

The Liberty ship construction contracts all contained an incentive principle based upon the payment to a contractor of a normal fee for his services in building the ship, with additions or subtractions dependent upon variation from the man-hour standard set in the contract.

The original normal fee of $110,000 per vessel could reach a maximum of $140,000 or a minimum of $60,000. Subsequent contracts have successively reduced the maximum to $60,000 and the minimum to $20,000, respectively, without in any way doing violence to the integrity of the contract or destroying the incentive principle which has contributed such a great stimulus to production, the Maritime Commission said.

The Commission has periodically adjusted the maximum fee payable to this group of contractors, first, to $120,000 per ship during the first 15-month period, $100,000 per ship for the next 6 months, and $80,000 for the following 6 months, and $50,000 for all ships delivered thereafter. The savings that have resulted from the reduction in the maximum fees substantially exceed the total of all fees paid to all Maritime Commission shipbuilders.

The formula as established in the Oregon case sets up four factors, based upon the actual performance record, which modify the maximum amount payable upon a ship. It continues the incentive features embodied in the shipbuilding contracts, is consistent with the Commission's action of negotiating reduced fees in the award of subsequent contracts to these yards, and yet accomplishes the purpose of the Renegotiation Act by eliminating excessive profits.

For each one of the four respective periods, the yards are rated according to their actual performance record. These ratings are established on the basis of: (1) The lowest number of man-hours actually used in the construction of each vessel, (2) The lowest dollar cost of each vessel, (3) The largest number of ships delivered during the period from each shipway in the yard, and (4) the lowest dollar investment of Government facility in the yard charged to each vessel. By taking these four ratings and combining them for each yard and applying the result against the perfect rating of 100 percent, the actual rating of each yard is obtained. This percentage is then applied to the difference between the maximum and the minimum fee for each given period and this establishes the actual fee to be paid to the yard for each vessel delivered in that period.

Where special circumstances made it necessary, such as where a part of the Liberty ship program has been temporarily set aside in order to construct special types of ships, these ratings are correspondingly qualified.

Speed was the essence at all times in connection with the construction of the Liberty ships, and in the renegotiation proceedings. The time factor has been considered the most important element involved.

The incentive system established under the Liberty ship contracts created keen rivalry among shipbuilders to reduce man-hours and cost. This competition reduced the man-hours from the first estimates of 635,900 per ship to an average of 520,000 and in one case to below 350,000. In terms of money saved this has reduced the cost of Liberty ships to approximately $157 per deadweight ton, as compared to about $210 for the Hog Island vessels of the last war, despite the very substantial increase in wage rates that now prevail over that earlier period.

The Coast Guard—Fighting Handyman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an article which appeared in an issue of Sea Power, entitled "The Coast Guard—Fighting Handyman," written by Kensil Bell.

This article is a splendid contribution to the history and service of the Coast Guard and a brief résumé of the Coast Guard's magnificent service with which everyone should be familiar:

THE COAST GUARD—FIGHTING HANDYMAN

(By Kensil Bell)

Inspired by the deeds of the United States Coast Guard in the Solomon Islands landings, the African invasion, and the Sicilian campaign, enthusiastic war correspondents have been cabling home something like this: "Our Coast Guard men are no longer merely shallow-water sailors."

The correspondents intend a compliment, of course. Yet they show themselves—like most Americans—uninformed on the history and duties of this oldest United States naval service. For the Coast Guard has been a blue-water force since the first days of the Republic. What is more, it has burned its share of powder in every major American conflict.

Confronted with a job of smuggler-busting and customs-collecting, Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, founded the Coast Guard back in 1790. Congress had passed a law, on July 31, 1789, authorizing "the collection of duties * * * on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States." Boats could be used for enforcing this law, Congress said, but it neglected to provide funds for building them.

Almost a year later Secretary Hamilton wrote to Congress and pointed out that "there are persons concerned in trade, in every country, who will, if they can, evade public duties for their private benefit." To thwart such people in the United States the Secretary asked for $10,000 to build a fleet of 10 boats measuring 36 to 40 feet in length, each armed with swivel guns, and manned by a captain, a lieutenant, and 6 seamen.

The appropriation which Hamilton needed came through on August 4, 1790. Congress spoke of the boats as revenue cutters and designated their officers as officers of the customs with power to board every ship arriving in the United States or within 4 leagues of the coast and bound for its shores. The officers were to make a thorough search of the incoming vessels, certify their manifests, fasten their hatches and all other communications with their holds, and remain with them until they docked.

The little fleet of cutters showed the country a worth-while profit from the beginning. During their first calendar year at sea, they helped collect more than $3,000,000 in revenue—three times the average annual revenue for each of the three preceding years. But this peacetime occupation was shortly supplemented by combat duty.

When trouble with France showed on the horizon in 1797 Congress authorized an increase in the complement of any cutter to 30 marines and seamen for defending the seacoast and repelling hostilities to herself and commerce. Thus, for a period of 9 months—until the creation of the Navy Department on April 30, 1798—the revenue cutters sailed as the first and only combat force under the United States flag.

The actual rupture with France soon found the cutters Pickering, Governor Jay, Eagle, General Greene, Diligence, Virginia, Scammel, and South Carolina under Navy orders. Their complements then stood at 50, 70, and 90 men. Ranging from 98 to 187 tons, they mounted 10 to 14 four-pounders and six-pounders and comprised one-third of the United States Fleet at sea in 1798. Of the 84 sail captured during the war, they accounted for 18, which they took single-handed or in concert with the heavier naval vessels.

During the early months of the French difficulty the cutters served with the Navy solely upon the authority of President Adams. For no law defined the relationship between the Treasury Fleet and the Navy. Early in 1799, however, Congress confirmed the Chief Executive's action and decreed that the cutters should cooperate with the Navy whenever the President directed. This law has never been rescinded, although the cutters have always returned to the Treasury at the end of every national emergency.

When the War of 1812 commenced nine cutters immediately dropped their Treasury duties for naval cooperation. The first capture of the war came within a week, the British brig Patriot taken by the cutter Jefferson. The cutter Madison reached Savannah a few days later with "the fine British brig Shamrock of 300 tons, 6 guns, and 16 men" and immediately followed this by bringing in the schooner Wade, carrying $20,000 in specie. So it went throughout the war. Yet the cutters suffered losses, too. The Eagle, overwhelmed by three men-of-war after a day and night of fighting on Long Island Sound, and the Surveyor successfully boarded during a heavy fog near Gloucester Point, Va.

At the outbreak of the Seminole War, President Jackson ordered eight cutters to the Florida coast. Their duties with the Navy and Army included dispatch-carrying, troop-transport, convoying prison ships, carrying refugees to safety, and hauling provisions and ammunition—in addition to combat. Part of the Jefferson's record gives some idea of the strenuous work. During one period of 100 days, she spent 73 at sea.

Hostilities with Mexico in 1846 found seven cutters at a rendezvous in the Gulf to aid the Navy. Before the war ended, Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry, United States Navy, was commending the cuttermen's gallantry and skill under fire.

Forty-six cutters saw service at various times during the Civil War. The Harriet Lane, for example, accompanied the Sumter relief expedition in April 1861, and later participated in the attack on Fort Clark and Fort Hatteras which brought the first Union victory of the war. The Naugatuck aided the Monitor against the Merrimac and afterward led an unsuccessful expedition up the James River in an attempt to take Richmond. The Miami served as President Lincoln's personal transport on several occasions, and covered the landing of troops at Willoughby's Point. Among those standing blockage duty were the Hercules, Hope, Phillip Allen and Agassiz.

Twenty cutters reported for combat when the Nation armed to the battle cry of "Remember the Maine!" The McCulloch has become the best known of these through her service with Admiral Dewey at Manila Bay. The Windom, on one occasion at least, earned a "well done" for her conduct in action; and the Hudson received Presidential commendation for "special gallantry in the face of a most galling fire."

During the First World War, Coast Guard officers held command duty with the Navy, aboard combat craft and transports, and at air stations. Six cutters served as convoy escorts between Great Britain and Gibraltar. One of these—the Tampa, with 115 officers and men—became the greatest single naval loss sustained by the United States in World War I when a German torpedo sent her down virtually without trace.

The peacetime record of the Coast Guard is no less impressive than its war record. Almost from its inception, the service has been a Government handyman, although the saving of life and property at sea has now become one of its chief duties in addition to its antismuggling work.

In 1799, Congress ordered the officers of the customs to enforce the quarantine laws of the various States while they were also acting for the Treasury aboard incoming vessels. Combating piracy, suppressing the slave trade, and protecting the Nation's live-oak supply also became regular, full-time assignments in the early years of the nineteenth century. Winter cruising along the Atlantic coast, for the relief of vessels and crews distressed by severe weather, had its start in 1831 and continues to this day.

The cutter Lincoln was the first Government vessel to visit Alaska after the purchase in 1867. Other cutters going northward in the years immediately following made invaluable contributions to the exploration of the Territory. The Bering Sea patrol is an outgrowth of these early voyages. Cruising approximately 75,000 miles during the ice-free season, the cutters detailed to the patrol carry out a varied mission—protection of fisheries, birds, and fur-bearing animals including sea otters and the Pribilof Islands fur seals; medical and dental aid for natives; judiciary service; hydrographic development; boarding vessels for routine safety inspections; transporting Government agents and supplies.

The international ice patrol is another Coast Guard duty. Inaugurated after the sinking of the Titanic in 1912, it has halted the loss of life through berg collisions on the North Atlantic.

Further peacetime Coast Guard duties include assistance to anyone in distress—or likely to be distressed—ashore, afloat, or aloft; enforcement of the Whaling Treaty Act and the Oil Pollution Act; patrolling marine parades and regattas; the maintenance of more than 30,000 lights, buoys, radio beacons, and other aids to marine navigation; supervising the anchorage and movements of vessels in United States harbors; destroying or removing derelicts and other hazards to navigation; maintaining weather-observation stations at sea; relieving the flood-stricken on the western waters.

The annual report of service activities for 1939—the last normal, peacetime year—shows more than 9,000 instances of lives saved and vessels assisted. The value of these vessels, including their cargoes, totaled more than $63,000,000. Other instances of assistance to persons in peril, including many lives actually saved, numbered 10,615.

The present-day Coast Guard is a consolidation of three services: Alexander Hamilton's cutter fleet, the Lifesaving Service, and the Lighthouse Service. The Lifesaving Service originated in the Treasury in 1848. It was largely administered by officers relieved from cutter duty—until it became a separate service in 1871. In 1915 the Cutter Service and Lifesaving Service were combined as the United States Coast Guard. The Lighthouse Service, dating from 1789, also originated in the Treasury. It later transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor—and then to the Department of Commerce. In 1939 the lighthouses returned to the Treasury to become part of the Coast Guard.

Today, as in all of our previous wars, the Coast Guard is operating under the Navy Department by direction of the President—and has been since November 1, 1941. This does not mean that the Service has lost its identity. In fact, Secretary Knox has ordered that the bureaus of the Navy Department are to have no responsibility in connection with Coast Guard administration. The Service simply has become a temporary division of the Office of Chief of Naval Operations under the Commander in Chief of the United States Fleet.

A statement by Vice Admiral Russell R. Waesche, Coast Guard Commandant, helps clarify the relationship of the Coast Guard to the Navy in wartime. In the Commandant's words, the transfer of the Service is not "just a case of throwing into the Navy that many more men, ships, and stations." Instead, it is largely a means of strengthening the fleet with specialized personnel and equipment which the Navy has neither the time nor the necessity to develop during peace. For example, on June 3, 1941, the Navy received 2,100 Coast Guard officers and men to train its personnel in small-boat handling, fully man 4 transports, and serve as boat crews aboard 22 others.

Another instance of Coast Guard usefulness to the Navy occurred during the days of neutrality patrol. Several cutters shared the duty in Greenland waters with the Navy. For Coast Guard officers, men, and ships were especially fitted for service in those northern regions due to the experience obtained through years on ice patrol.

Coast Guard personnel totaled approximately 23,000 officers and men on December 7, 1941. This has since grown to 151,200, including the women's reserve designated as SPARS—a name derived by combining the first letters of the words in the Latin and English versions of the Coast Guard motto: Semper paratus, always ready. Cutters in service numbered in the neighborhood of 300. The largest class, measuring 327 feet, carried 200 officers and men. Other classes measured 240 feet down to 75 feet. These were supplemented by picketboats, fireboats, tugs, tenders, lightships, and almost 3,000 small boats. The air arm was flying approximately 55 planes—mostly land-based, although each of the 327-foot cutters carried a small observation plane.

By the time of the Pearl Harbor attack, virtually all Coast Guard craft suited for combat were on a wartime footing, euipped with such armament as 5-inch guns, 3-inch antiaircraft guns, machine guns, depth-charge racks, and Y and K guns for projecting depth charges.

Also, by the time the Japanese struck in the Pacific, coast guardsmen were long accustomed to a constant alert. For, from the outbreak of European hostilities in September 1939, they had played a major role in enforcing the Neutrality Act, patrolling the Nation's 40,000 miles of seacoast and inland waterways on watch for fifth columnists; supervising and docking, loading, and sailing of belligerents' vessels; cruising offshore in search of submarines.

Today, the service is contributing more to the country than at any time in its 153-year history. Coast guardsmen on foot, on horseback, and in jeeps maintain a constant lookout along the seacoast. These men are chiefly based at the lifesaving stations which have done valiant work in rescuing torpedoed merchant sailors. Watchmen at aircraft plants and shipyards are enlisted in the Temporary Coast Guard Reserve. Waterfront security is entirely in Coast Guard hands. It prevents fire and sabotage; supervises the loading of explosives; supervises warehousing; fingerprints and identifies water-front civilian workers; polices the going and coming of commercial deep-sea fishermen; embarks troops; inspects cargo carriers. Regular and Reserve members are being invaluably aided in many of these duties by the Coast Guard Volunteer Port Security Force and Coast Guard Auxiliary which are composed of civilians serving on a part-time basis.

Much Coast Guard activity, therefore, is centered ashore at home, yet there is probably an equal amount offshore and overseas. A Coast Guard Patrol Bomber Squadron flies above enemy territory. Cutters and planes along the Atlantic coast share in the anti-submarine patrol and rescue of torpedo victims. Convoys plodding to Russia, England, and Africa find a clear track through the watchfulness and marksmanship of Coast Guard cutters. When invasions come landing barges and transports are manned by Coast Guardsmen.

It was Coast Guardsman John C. Cullen who discovered the Nazi saboteurs put ashore on Long Island by a German U-boat. It was Coast Guardsman Douglas A. Munro who gave his life to rescue almost 500 marines from a precarious position during the Solomons invasion. It was a Coast Guard cutter—the Icarus—which captured 33 Nazi submariners after her gunfire sent their U-boat on its last dive off the Carolina coast. Another cutter—the Spencer—bagged 40 more Germans after a running gunfight with their sub, which tried to give her the slip by dodging through the convoy it planned to attack. The George W. Campbell fought six U-boats within 12 hours and finally made a definite kill by ramming the last one she met. Dispatches from Africa, Sicily, and the Aleutians mention, among others, Lt. Comdr. R. R. Smith, Lt. Ivet L. Logan, Chief Boatswain's Mates Hunter Wood and William G. Lawrence, Gunner's Mate Donald E. Burns—some of the many Coast Guardsmen who have distinguished themselves in the drives against enemy-held beaches—and these are only a few of the officers, men, and ships who have shown once more that shallow water and deep water are the same to the United States Coast Guard.

Why Discriminate Against American-Flag Air Carriers in Providing Equipment?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYLE H. BOREN

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, in a statement recently issued by the Minister of Munitions and Supply of the Canadian Government, we find the following passage:

The building of the Alaska Highway was the cause of great activity in air transport in a territory that was being served by Canadian Pacific Airlines, and that company was assisted by the United States Army in obtaining new and modern airplanes, from United States sources, with the result that the equipment of the company was augmented considerably at a time when all other air lines on this continent found it impossible to buy new equipment.

In other words, it is revealed that at a time when our own air lines found it impossible to secure new equipment the Canadian Pacific Airlines was furnished new and modern airplanes in numbers which augmented considerably that air line's fleet. And this occurred despite the fact that one of our own air lines was operating between this country and Alaska, able to serve the territory through which the Alaska Highway was constructed.

Furthermore our own Civil Aeronautics Board some months ago authorized a number of foreign-flag air lines to operate into Miami, serving the Caribbean region, on the ground that those air lines had airplanes with which they could render necessary service and that our own air lines did not have available sufficient equipment to render the service which our national interest required in the Caribbean region.

It is strange indeed that foreign-flag air lines should thus receive benefits from this Government at a time when our own air-transport system has been literally starved for new airplanes. Our air lines are unable to carry essential passengers and cargo because of lack of space. Every day the situation becomes more acute and more harmful to the progress of our war effort.

Announcement has just been made that our domestic air lines will be permitted to acquire nine new airplanes, a modest number indeed in the face of the dire need for air transportation. But at the same time it is indicated that special Presidential approval will have to be secured before any more airplanes can be allocated to our domestic air lines. Apparently some kind of ceiling has been imposed upon the number of airplanes which our domestic air lines can secure. It appears that this ceiling was imposed shortly after Pearl Harbor. Why any such ceiling should continue to be in effect is difficult to understand. Conditions today are far different from the conditions prevailing immediately after Pearl Harbor.

But it is even more difficult to understand why our own air lines should be denied airplanes at a time when our Government is extending privileges such as those indicated to foreign-flag air lines. Something is amiss somewhere which should be corrected and corrected promptly.

Tennessee-Tombigbee Canal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter addressed to me under date of April 18, 1944, from Mr. John L. Bogert, associate editor of the Marine Journal, concerning the proposed Tennessee-Tombigbee Canal project:

MARINE JOURNAL,
New York, April 18, 1944.

The Honorable FRANK W. BOYKIN,
Chairman, Committee on Patents,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The action of the House of Representatives in leaving out of current rivers and harbors bill item relating to Tennessee-Tombigbee Canal was disaster, in my judgment.

For the last 10 years I have devoted much time to a study of transportation economies, especially in relation to living costs of the people. Those studies convince me that only after we have developed our waterways to the limit will all our people achieve a higher standard of living.

As long as products of farms and mines must depend upon railroad transportation to reach our coasts, a higher standard of living for farmers, miners, and countless others will be impossible. The reason? A rail rate structure which cannot average much below a cent a ton-mile.

Utilizing waterways wherever possible mean rates for ores, grains, and other bulk materials as low as 1 mill a ton-mile, only one-tenth of what railroads must exact or go bankrupt. Even at rates which have existed, $4,000,000,000 worth of railroad bonds have defaulted out of a total of some $19,000,000,000 invested in railroad securities.

Argentina lives on export of farm products to Europe. Distance to channel ports is about 7,200 miles. Freight rate for grain is, in peacetime, $5 a ton, or seven-tenths of a mill a ton-mile. With rail rates from wheat-growing regions of the West superimposed on ocean rate from Atlantic seaboard to channel ports, we cannot possibly compete with Argentina. Through use of improved Missouri, Ohio, Mississippi, and other rivers, the bulk of grain movement from the West to channel ports could be almost wholly over waterways. Then our farmers could compete with wheat growers in any other part of the world. Connected, the Tennessee and Tombigbee Rivers, flowing through industrial heart of South, would yield incalculable benefits.

Yours very truly,

JOHN L. BOGERT,
Associate Editor.

Development and Regulation of Civil Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over Station KADA, Ada, Okla., and Station KYFF, Shawnee, Okla., April 19, 1944:

One of the sorest cancers in our body politic has been the discrimination against the Southland in our railroad rate structure. Whatever the historic excuses for this discrimination, it should now be apparent to all that the economic power of one section of our people cannot be kept in a state of subjection by any such unnatural and unfair device.

We are now on the threshold of a new development in transportation, the development of an air-transport system which will contribute to the efforts of every section of our Nation to attain increased prosperity and a richer enjoyment of the great resources with which God has blessed our country.

After a year of work, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has presented to the House a carefully framed bill to modernize and perfect our legislation for the future development and regulation of civil aviation.

Symptomatic at once of the care and fairness with which the committee has drafted this bill, and of a determination that the ills of our surface-transport system shall not be permitted to infect our new system of air transportation, is a provision which the committee has included in this bill designed to forestall the possibility of sectional discriminations in the future rate structure for air commerce. This bill provides for an amendment to the declaration of policy in the Civil Aeronautics Act stating that the act shall be so administered as to provide for "the regulation of air commerce * * * so that its advantages will be available, so far as practicable, to all points on fair and uniform terms and without discrimination." Here, for the first time in transportation legislation, there would be definite provision by Congress forestalling the possibility of sectional discriminations which keep one region under an unfair and unjust economic burden.

The civil aviation bill carries out the theory that if air transportation is to be developed according to its inherent advantages and so as to confer greatest benefits upon our country, reasonable uniformity of regulation, prevention of artificial barriers, and assurance against regional discrimination, should be the essential objectives of Federal legislation. If there are selfish interests who would oppose the growth of air transportation, their ends can most effectively be gained by combatting this theory. For my part, however, I believe that the public interest will best be served, and that our future security and welfare will most effectively be promoted, by taking action now, during the infancy of air transportation, that will save it from the artificial restraints which have plagued other forms of transportation.

Fortunately in the case of air transportation, the system has so far developed on a basis providing uniform service and uniform rates under uniform conditions throughout the nation in commerce within States and between States, and within sections and between sections. This essential characteristic of the air-transport system, as we now know it, must be preserved for the future. The civil aviation bill is written with that end in view. And if that theory guides us now and in the future in providing for the regulation of air transportation, we will go far toward assuring for every American, wherever he may live, the advantages and the benefits of the swiftest of all forms of transportation on fair and equal terms.

To no State is this objective more essential than to the State of Oklahoma. Blessed with a central location in our great commonwealth of States, blessed also with weather and terrain ideal for aviation development, only man-made restrictions can prevent us here from enjoying the fullest development of air transportation. Especially to our farmers, that development will bring a new outlet for commerce. Markets in distant States will be brought close to us. Indeed, the trade of the whole world can be brought to the doorstep of every farmer and merchant in Oklahoma if we but keep our air routes free of artificial barriers and discriminations.

Change WAC Uniform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

Col. OVETA CULP HOBBY,
Director, Women's Army Corps,
War Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL HOBBY: We applaud your efforts to bring the Women's Army Corps to its authorized strength of 200,000 and we wish you full measure of success in this regard.

Wherever possible, we have been stressing the urgency of expanding this corps. There has been noticeable, however, a considerable lag in enlistment. I venture the assertion that the Army could use a minimum of 600,000. Indeed, General Marshall states that the ranks of the WAC's must be increased tenfold. The Air Forces have said they must have 100,000 additional WAC's to serve on domestic airfields. Thousands more are wanted for overseas duty.

May I offer a suggestion which might aid in the recruiting of more young women? Is it naive to assume that the drabness of the WAC uniform, perhaps, dulls the edge of an enthusiastic prospective recruit? In conversations with numerous WAC's, I am told that their uniforms are far from inspiring, that they lack distinction, and are, frankly, drab and uninviting.

Olive drab material might be essential for combat purposes in men's uniforms. It offers proper resistance to inclement weather and can stand the stresses and strains and is adaptable for camouflage purposes. But WAC's will not enter the active combat or battle zones, although they may enter the theaters of operation. Most will remain in the United States. Many will be on duty in the United States, Australia, or China, but, in most instances, will be far removed from actual combat. Therefore, the same reason for the drab uniform does not obtain as in the case of the male soldier.

Must we not recognize the femininity of the problem? "Equality of uniform" seems unwise. May not the drop in enlistment be, in part, due to the lack of military pertness in the articles of clothing including caps, stockings, and shoes?

It is natural for the WAC to desire to look attractive. She cannot satisfy that craving with the unsuitable, undistinguished apparel granted her. Even girls in bright slacks and colored scarf and blouse in the war plants seem coruscant in comparison. Girls operating elevators regaled in brightly colored uniforms seem more alive. Give any girl an outward attractive appearance and you immediately create an inner self of higher morale.

This is, by no means, any disparagement of the WAC now in service. Despite the handicap of dull clothing, they are doing a spendid job. All power to them, but may we not even boost their present accomplishments with more self-expression in apparel. Let them feel that they look better than a brigade of ciphers.

CONVERT CINDERELLA INTO THE PRINCESS

It is not my purpose to make the WAC's appear as drum majors in a circus or to convert the corps into a Mardi Gras festival. They might well look piquant yet dignified, stern yet charming, but the present lack of sparkle in uniform places them under a handicap. Even the cap is stiff and fails to flatter. It has not even a little piping, cord of trimming, or a seam of color. I am told it likewise is uncomfortable.

Pretty soon we will see the summer uniform. On a hot day, after a short time, it becomes completely rumpled and shapeless.

In comparison with the WAC uniform behold the apparel of the Red Cross nurse. Her navy blue cloak with red facing, white dress, and blue hat suit her admirably and she wears it with proud distinction. The uniform of the United States Marine Corps Women's Reserve emphasizes the shortcomings of the WAC uniform. Those of the WAVES and SPARS, while not perfect, are far more attractive, in my humble masculine opinion, as are those of the United States Cadet Nurse Corps.

Of course, there will be considerable expense in effecting a change of uniform. However, the expense will be inconsequential if you can recruit your full quota.

Very truly yours,

EMANUEL CELLER,
Representative, Tenth Congressional District, New York.

Air Transportation and Its Role in Our Future National Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYLE H. BOREN
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, we are all interested at this time in trying to visualize the potentialities of air transportation in the years to come. In this connection I would like to take this opportunity to insert in the RECORD the following remarks on this subject made by Edgar S. Gorrell, president, Air Transport Association of America, over the Mutual Broadcasting system on April 2 during the program entitled "Wide Horizons":

What does air transportation mean in the years ahead of us for American farmers and merchants and workmen and housewives and children?

It means a closer unity for our country. It means news opportunities for pleasure at faraway points brought nearby. It means new channels of trade for communities hitherto limited by the slow pace of surface transport. It means new careers, new jobs, a new source of stimulation for our whole economy. It means bringing the markets of the whole world next door to every American farm and village and city.

But it means something more than all that. It means a fresh guaranty of national security in a world which requires such guaranties as long as the lust of conquest lurks in the hearts of men.

After this war the Army and Navy will go back to a peacetime basis. Perhaps that basis will not be as inadequate as in the past, but in the nature of things they will not be equipped to stamp out distant threats to our security unless they have always available an air transport complement ready for instantaneous action. Such a complement provides the transport wings which can bring our Army's and Navy's force to bear upon danger points.

Our civil air lines have provided that emergency complement in the past. In the future it will be more than ever their duty to do so. Always geared to go into action anytime and anywhere on the earth's surface, bearing critical troops and matériel, our air line system will add their bit to real security for America.

Take Heed for Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the war is not won. But it is so nearly won that it is high time we gave some thought to what must follow.

Today both production and consumption are at the peak. Tomorrow, with the close of the war, consumption will decline and production must decline with it. When war consumption is over, war production is over. Industry has already discounted the drop. In every industrial center groups of men have been planning for months for the inevitable end of the war boom. But on the farm front every energy is being devoted to maximum production, with no thought of tomorrow.

As a result farm products are being piled up in record-breaking quantities never approached before. Every warehouse, elevator, refrigerator, and cold-storage plant is filled to capacity. Even the arteries of transportation are congested until another car cannot be loaded until a corresponding car is emptied.

Our national food problem is not scarcity but surpluses. We are shipping more hogs than the packers can process. We are marketing more eggs than the plants can store. We have produced more cattle than we can feed.

We began the current year with half a billion pounds of frozen fruits. That is a year's supply and another crop is now coming on. Canned and dried and salted products are stored in like quantities. Never were there such mountains of food as are on hand today all the way from the farm to the front. The War Food Administration has a $500,000,000 operating stock pile of food. Every Army and Navy quartermaster's depot is piled to capacity with reserve stocks of food of every character. At the close of the war the Government will own $2,000,000,000 worth of surplus food that will have to be thrown on the market in competition with the huge supplies held by the Nation-wide chain-store system, and the 1945 crops at that time coming into harvest. The stored surpluses are too large to be fed into the market without demoralizing prices. There will be no market abroad because every European and Asiatic nation will be destitute. They will have nothing with which to buy. We have most of the gold and silver in the world piled up at Fort Knox and West Point, and they will have nothing with which to buy. The result will be indescribable. The debacle which followed the last war will be as a summer zephyr to a hurricane.

There is only one recourse. The Government must maintain the same legislative floor under farm wages and prices it is maintaining under industrial wages and prices. There is no alternative. Any other course means a return to the $2 hogs, 30-cent wheat, 5-cent cotton, 12-cent corn, and 6-cent eggs of the last post-war period.

That is what short-sighted interests which exploit agriculture are headed for. But 1920 should have taught even the exploiters a lesson. When the farmer can no longer buy, the merchant can no longer sell; when the merchant cannot sell, the factory cannot operate; and when the factory closes down, neither labor nor management has a job. Inevitably the conflagration started on the farm spreads to the cities and eventually the entire Nation is engulfed as in the last depression. Only through the maintenance of fair prices and the preservation of an American standard of living, on the farm as well as in the cities, can the Nation prosper. There must be parity prices in the field and the feed lot to preserve parity wages and dividends in the factory and the shop.

But to maintain prices you must control production. To attempt to insure prices without limiting production is to be drowned in wheat, smothered in cotton, overwhelmed with livestock, and flooded with vast surpluses of every supported farm commodity. No amount of legislation or legerdemain can maintain prices on glutted markets. For example, it is the abundance of food and not price ceilings that has kept the cost of living down. If you entertain any doubt about it look at the recent slump in the price of eggs. The ceiling on eggs is 75 cents per dozen but in the face of an oversupply there has been the greatest difficulty in maintaining the price at even 30 cents per dozen, and on days of heavy shipments it has dipped as low as 19 cents.

Those who loudly demand unlimited production and decry scarcity production and who affect to see in the application to agriculture of the same measured economy they themselves practice, a regimentation of agriculture, are advocating serfdom and peonage on the farm in order to load the tables of the cities with a superabundance at less than the cost of production. We cannot continue wartime production when wartime demand is past. We must necessarily discontinue wartime production when war markets close. To think of unlimited crop production in the post-war period is insanity.

American agriculture must return to crop-production control as soon as the last gun is fired, if not before. Agriculture, like every other industry, must produce only the amount needed to supply the demand. The smallest percentage above that amount will surfeit the market and leave the farmer at the mercy of the buyer—a mercy which in the last few years has been a cross between the rapacity of a shark and a termite.

We must begin to plan immediately a post-war crop-control program. How can such a program be best effectuated? The Agricultural Adjustment Agency is the ideal agency. It operated successfully and satisfactorily before the war. It has the organization and the program; it has the experience and the personnel. It is a going concern. Although the duties connected with acreage admeasurement and checking compliance have been temporarily discontinued, it is contributing to agricultural rehabilitation and is in a position to resume crop-control operations on short notice, as indicated in the following letter just received in this morning's mail:

DEAR MR. CANNON: We believe that the Congress of the United States should be interested in the activities of the various county agricultural conservation associations functioning under the A. A. A., and we use this means of reporting such activities for St. Charles County, Mo., through the year 1943.

The elected members of the county committee, together with 18 elected community committeemen and 4 employed office clerks, have shared the responsibility and work in the following:

Made personal contact on the farm with 2,173 owners or operators to assist in preparing the 1943 war-production plan, advising increased production, suggesting production of special war crops, and advising prevention of erosion and maintenance of soil fertility. As a result of this planning, as evidenced by complete reports by farmers at arranged meetings with committeemen, again in personal contact, 1,975 farms representing 86 percent of the total farms in the county, all war-crop goals were met and production increased over the previous year, except where production was lost due to river flood.

On 550 farms, 5,095 hundredweight of 20 percent phosphate and 3,475 hundredweight of mixed fertilizers were used to supply added plant food to obtain increased production. Of this amount, 3,198 hundredweight was distributed by direct aid through the conservation materials program of the association.

On 675 farms, 20,729 tons of ground limestone were applied to correct acidity and supply calcium for growing legumes to build and maintain soil fertility and increase production. Of this amount, 5,373 tons were distributed by direct aid through the conservation materials program of the association.

On 758 farms, 9,802 acres of clover were plowed down as green manure crops.

On 240 farms 2,736 acres of permanent pastures were mowed sufficient number of times to destroy weed growth.

On 484 farms 4,678 acres of hay seed was harvested to supplement diminished supply of available seed.

On 133 farms 1,672 acres of lespedeza was incorporated into the soil to stimulate increased production and prevent erosion.

On 95 farms 2,165 acres of small-grain crops were contoured for the same purpose.

On 39 farms 4,855 pounds of pasture grasses and legumes were seeded to improve permanent pasture stands.

On 17 farms 16,576 cubic yards of earth were moved to construct permanent dams for livestock water.

On 26 farms 79,600 linear feet of standard terraces were constructed to conserve moisture and control erosion.

On 27 farms 27,670 cubic yards of earth were moved in constructing farm ditches to remove surplus surface water to increase production.

On 7 farms 81 acres of alfalfa was renovated to secure better growth and longer life for the stand.

On 16 farms 137 acres of small grain, used as winter cover crops, were plowed down as green manure.

Other practices are also listed, too numerous to mention in this report. Sharing in these practices on these farms were 2,519 owners and operators; and of this number, 2,516 cooperated fully, only 3 having refused.

Under the Federal crop-insurance program, we serviced 506 wheat contracts. Claims for indemnity by 479 applicants received a total of 145,002 bushels of wheat to compensate for losses by flood and, in a few cases, excessive rain and winter kill.

In administering the dairy-feed program 1,027 subsidy-payment applications were approved and sight drafts issued for production of 26,188 hundredweight of whole milk and 75,288 pounds of butterfat for October, November, and December.

Assistance was given to 401 truckers in preparing applications for "certificates of war necessity" for transporting farm products, and recommending approval, by the transportation committee, with triple-A committeemen as chairmen.

Under farm-machinery rationing, purchase certificates were issued for 58 tractors, 53 tractor plows, 64 tractor cultivators, 23 combines, 16 corn pickers, 18 corn planters, 14 manure spreaders, 38 mowers, 18 hammer mills, 31 peg and spring tooth harrows, 40 disk harrows, 10 grain drills, 10 soil pulverizers, 13 side delivery rakes, 9 hay balers, and 174 certificates on other equipment such as corn shellers, corn binders, milking machines, and other items.

Recommending approval on applications for farm building, rationing of lumber, electrical equipment, and copper wire when used for farm production.

Meat-slaughter permits were approved for 47 farm slaughterers to permit sale of dressed meat in compliance with their 1941 practice.

Checked farm production and made recommendations on applications for tires and for nonhighway gasoline. Conservative estimate is more than 3,000 applications checked in 1943.

Supplied information of farm production on applications for agricultural deferments to the selective service board.

The community committeemen who are actual farmers in various parts of the county are leaders in conservation practices on their farms, particularly the better mechanical practices, and these practices are rapidly spreading throughout the county with their help, as they have had special training in use of transit to lay out terrace and contour lines.

Because of the wealth of information which reaches the association office due to the numerous contacts with farmers of the county the office is called upon by most farmers for every type of information pertaining to better farming.

Tabulation of calls, etc., is considered impractical; however, a tabulation was made for March of 1943. It was determined that 616 farmers made personal calls at the office for information, 94 persons not farmers called for information and assistance on the various rationing programs, 204 individual letters received from farmers were answered, and 294 phone calls requesting information relative to agricultural problems were handled through this 1 month. A conservative estimate would be an average of 25 personal visits, 10 individual mail contacts, and 20 phone contacts per day, which does not include contacts by farmers with committeemen at their homes. While we know such contacts are numerous we hesitate to estimate the number, while we are conscious of their value.

Three circular letters were mailed throughout the year each to more than 3,000 farm owners or operators. Five form letters pertaining to special phases of the program each mailed to more than 1,500 cooperating farm owners and operators.

Requests for seed, fertilizer, and feeds are among the numerous services handled through the office from listings of such commodities, and in some cases samples are left at the office.

Requests pertaining to various erosion and soil-improvement practices are answered from experiences of other farmers who willingly cooperate by giving such information. Sufficient data are available in the association office as evidence to the fact that St. Charles County farmers (whether they participate in the triple A program or not, and no coercion was ever used in this county to secure association membership) are using their Agricultural Conservation Association for the benefit of agriculture and the Nation, and that the elected committeemen and their office personnel are rendering a valuable service.

Very truly yours,

ANTON J. BOSCHERT,
Chairman, St. Charles County Agricultural Conservation Association, St. Charles, Mo.

Mr. Speaker, we are already talking of domiciling returning soldiers on farms and financing them in crop and livestock production through loans made on favorable terms and convenient amortizations. I hope it can be done. It will assist in the solution of post-war employment and will contribute both to individual and national prosperity.

But there must be some assurance of permanency and success. To sell our soldiers farms and encourage them to invest their future in agriculture and then knock the bottom out of the price of everything they produce, as we did for the soldiers who came back to the farm from the last war, will be the sorriest deception ever practiced in the history of legislative chicanery.

If we place them on farms we must, in all fairness—and in appreciation of the service they have rendered their country in its hour of need—assure them an honest wage for their labor, a fair return on their investment, and a parity price for their products. To do that we must put a floor under prices and restrict production to the normal demands of our foreign and domestic markets—the markets for which our farms must produce after our war plants close and our armies demobilize and our boys come back to start life anew.

Farmers National Union and Our Post-War Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the National Farmers Union presents a philosophy on our foreign policy that clearly indicates that we should make a Herculean effort to stabilize world peace, and avoid in the future a disastrous war such as we experienced in 1917 and are now experiencing. This philosophy is clear cut and drives to the point without "ifs" and without "reservations." If we start in on reservations we shall soon reserve the entire policy out of existence. I submit herewith the full text of the statement coming from the Farmers National Union:

POST-WAR FOREIGN POLICY

All the world is looking forward to a peace which goes beyond the mere cessation of hostilities and becomes a thing lived, enjoyed, and depended upon by the great mass of people everywhere. To attain such a peace we must follow these guides:

1. The future welfare of the world demands active participation of the United States in world affairs. This participation must be economic, social, and cultural, as well as diplomatic. We must give world leadership to a movement aimed at eliminating trade barriers, thus expanding the flow of goods and services among nations. As means for accomplishing this end, we should participate in world organizations to stabilize currencies, properly direct the flow of international investments and materials, and regulate international shipping.

2. Although we have placed first emphasis upon economic, social, and cultural collaboration with other countries, it will also be necessary to have some form of international organization of nations whose primary aim is to prevent military aggression.

3. One of the main contributions we can make to the stability and security of the world is to run our own economy at capacity levels of production and be willing to trade with other countries. Our economic conditions at home will have tremendous repercussions throughout the world. The maintenance of peace in a prosperous world is much easier than in a world beset with depression and unemployment. Moreover, the maintenance of prosperity in this country is a large and important factor in maintaining world prosperity.

WORK OUT THE PEACE NOW

Basic considerations that will have to be faced in the making of the peace need examination now, so that policy may be formulated and proclaimed now. Areas of agreement in the organization of peace must be worked out now. By so doing we will speed victory and make genuine peace easier to achieve.

First, as an indispensable prime necessity, we, as a people and a government, must develop an understanding of, and better working relations with, our allies and with the peoples and the legitimate governments of the countries now under Axis control. We cannot afford to maintain an arms-length attitude of fear, suspicion, and fatal hesitation toward our allies and the people we are pledged to liberate.

We have come of age in world affairs. We must accept and discharge adult responsibilities with good will and decision. We must deal with other peoples as equals, neither as inferiors to be exploited nor as superiors who might outwit us. We must deal as equals with England and the British Dominions, China, Russia, the French, and, no less, with the smaller peoples whose contributions to our civilization, notably in the fields of cooperation, practical democracy and culture, have been and one day will again be as important as any furnished by larger nations who, through accident of geography, climate, and resources, have greater material power. Russia is, and will be, a great world power. An understanding with this people is essential to peace. Such an understanding need imply no judgment by either nation on the government of the other.

Second. Essential to the building of an enduring peace is recognition that all men belong to a single human race. Were the peace to be a bill of denial to certain peoples because of color instead of a bill of rights, as set forth in the Atlantic Charter, then we should have laid the ground work for a third world war. Every agreement, indeed every act, of discrimination because of race by the dominant powers at home or abroad is a step toward a future war. Every agreement, every act of world neighborliness toward other races is a step toward a just and therefore lasting peace.

The Italian Campaign Should Continue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL K. HOCH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, because Mr. Theodore Terenchin, of Reading, Pa., has asked me to bring his recent letter to me to the attention of the House and Senate membership, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HONORABLE SIR: While reading the morning paper, I saw an article by Representative SUMNER (Republican, Illinois) stating the Italian campaign as homicidal lunacy. It is hard to believe that one holding such an important post in the Government should make such a stupid, blundering statement. To give up the Italian campaign at this time, after all our efforts, would not only be the biggest American defeat in history, but it would be something the United States Government and the American public would never live down until eternity. If we have made some blunders, it is not due to the inefficiency of our military experts, but to the gigantic and far-flung scale of operations.

Representative SUMNER'S statement of restrictions of lend-lease to Russia is another example of her stupidity as a would-be diplomat and statesman. Perhaps she does not understand the definition of lend-lease. I do, and furthermore I make this statement: Every dollar our Government invests in lend-lease to Russia is the greatest investment our Government ever made to safeguard American lives and property. Lend-lease is not a contribution; it is an exchange of goods for a price. Therefore Russia is not obligated to us for anything. We in turn should thank our lucky stars to have such a powerful and fearless nation as an ally. If Russia would suddenly cease hostilities with Germany, and 250 divisions would be freed and turned against us (God forbid) I would be very much in doubt as to the outcome of this war, and our chances of winning would be very slim indeed.

My humble suggestion would be to start the western invasion as soon as possible and have our bombers and fighter planes just a little ahead of our invading armies. We know by experience that no war can be won by merely bombing from the air. We have only aerial photographic proof of the damage caused by our bombing raids. We are losing millions of dollars in bombs and planes, and hundreds of pilots which takes month or years to train, and so far no territory has been taken for our great effort. Who knows, perhaps most of our bombs are falling on decoys. Gentlemen, I do not profess to be a military expert, but to lose 60 bombers and 500 airmen on one bombing mission seems such a big price to pay. For what? However, I am glad that we have men in Washington that do not wear an iron cross, and in the future the American public would be served better by men using four-letter words who have eight-letter minds, instead of the opposite.

I sincerely wish that this humble letter be read during a session in Congress. Who knows, perhaps I am expressing my thoughts for millions of American citizens.

Respectfully yours,

THEODORE TERENCHIN.

Montgomery Ward

REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DEWEY] stated he is introducing a resolution to investigate why the Government has taken over Montgomery Ward & Co. I greatly deplore that it became necessary for the Government to take their plant over, the same as was done in the case of some of the coal mines, railroads, and industrial plants which have set themselves up above the Government.

Mr. Speaker, we all should be grateful that we have a Government that is able and does function. I know that the President and those connected with the administration, as well as the Congress, feels that the laws passed by Congress and the power given under the Constitution should be exercised whenever it becomes necessary.

I feel that this Government cannot afford to permit any individual, it matters not how clever, shrewd, or hardheaded he may be and regardless of the institution or corporation he represents, to set himself up above the Government and above the law of the land. Personally, I have seen this company grow from its infancy, the same as many other mail-order houses and chain stores, who believe themselves so great and powerful as to continue to demand of Congress legislation and protection and, at the same time, refuse to be bound by the action of the Congress and the authority vested in the Chief Executive.

With respect to the resolution introduced by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. DEWEY] it will in due time receive the consideration that it deserves, but I am hopeful and firmly believe that within a few days Mr. Avery will come off his high horse and will agree to carry on under the old agreement with the unions until such time as a union election will be had.

Mr. Speaker, I recall that only a few years ago Montgomery Ward & Co.

were in an extremely precarious financial position and had been losing a great deal of money, but due to the aid, protection, and assistance this Government has given them it is reported, notwithstanding the present rate of wages which was asked to be extended for a few months, that the net profit of the company last year was over $20,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that the Government has no jurisdiction in this matter and that the plant cannot be considered a war plant. However, is it not true that the company handles hundreds and hundreds of items which enter into war needs? But I shall not dwell on this further except to state that the action of Mr. Avery, president of Montgomery Ward & Co., will serve to focus the eyes of the American people upon these great mail-order houses and the three or four chain stores which have grown so tremendously at the expense of thousands upon thousands of small storekeepers and small businessmen that the demand for legislation to curb them, which the war stopped, will be renewed.

Checking the wages of employees in mail-order houses and chain stores, it is found that the wages are far below those paid in other businesses and industries in the United States. The group of employees working for the mail-order houses and chain stores surely falls into the category of underpaid white-collar workers whose wages average $22 to $24 a week.

An editorial appearing in the April 26 issue of the Washington Star fairly presents the issues, and under the leave given me I will insert it as part of my remarks. It senses the resentment of the American people to the unfair, bureaucratic position taken by Mr. Avery, president of Montgomery Ward, who also is a director of other large institutions, which, however, may have no direct connection with Montgomery Ward.

I appreciate that I will again be criticized by certain antiadministration newspapers, most of which represent the viewpoint of these big corporations and vested interests, but that will not deter me from expressing my views. The editorial is as follows:

UNREASONABLE STAND

The latest clash between the War Labor Board and Montgomery Ward turns on a small point, but it is one of those small affairs that is capable of causing a great deal of trouble.

During most of 1943 Montgomery Ward had a contract with the C. I. O. United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees' Union covering the employees in its Chicago mail-order establishment. In November of last year the company raised the question whether the union still represented a majority of its employees and refused to renew the contract when it expired in December pending proof of the validity of the union's claim to representation rights.

The case was referred to the W. L. B. and that agency directed Ward's to extend the life of the old contract pending an employee election, which the union was ordered to apply for within 30 days. The union asked for the election, which must be conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, but the company refused to extend the contract, and that resulted in a strike by union workers on the 12th of this month. The W. L. B. then referred the case to the President and the latter issued orders that the strikers return to work and that the company abide by the W. L. B. directions. This Presidential order has been complied with by the union, but the company has notified Mr. Roosevelt that it will not extend the contract, and this refusal presumably will result in the seizure of the business by the Government.

There are many aspects to this controversy. For one thing, the company has waged a long fight in the courts against the W. L. B. maintenance-of-union-membership orders, but the Board through a variety of legal maneuvers has been able to stall off a court test of the legality of these orders. This, to say the least, has not been productive of mutual good feeling. Then there may also be a serious question whether a concern like Montgomery Ward, which has no Government war contracts and which is not engaged in war production, comes within the scope of the President's war powers. But so far as the present controversy is concerned these are secondary considerations.

The order to extend the contract pending the election—the main issue now—is not an unreasonable one, for the extension would automatically expire if the election were to show that the union did not represent a majority of the employees. Had Ward's seen fit to comply with the order it does not appear that its position would have been prejudiced in any way. But if the company, by reason of its refusal to obey, now loses control of its business it will be prejudiced by the loss of any support in public opinion which it might otherwise have enjoyed.

McNary in Statuary Hall

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOWELL STOCKMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial about the life and service of the late Senator McNary, which appeared in the Oregonian of Portland, Oreg., on April 12, 1944:

M'NARY IN STATUARY HALL

In an article written for La Follette's Progressive of Madison, Wis., printed on this page today, Capt. Richard L. Neuberger, of Portland, suggests that the late Senator Charles L. McNary deserves a statue in National Statuary Hall. It is the closing sentence of a warmly appreciative article, and it deserves serious consideration.

National Statuary Hall occupies what was at one time the Chamber of the House of Representatives in the National Capitol, and it has many historical associations. Within its walls, Madison, Monroe, and Fillmore were inaugurated or took the oath as President of the United States. Webster and Lincoln both sat there as Members of Congress. There, in 1825, when no candidate for President had obtained a majority of the electoral college, the Members of the House chose John Quincy Adams as President over Andrew Jackson, Henry Clay, and William H. Crawford. It was the scene of debates over the War of 1812, and the Mexican War and of the earlier controversies over slavery.

After the Capitol was enlarged, and a new Chamber for the House provided, the room was by act of Congress set aside in 1864 for reception and display of marble or bronze statues, not more than two in number to be contributed by each State, of deceased persons who had been citizens thereof, and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military service.

About 50 statues have been contributed to the Hall but Oregon has never been represented therein. There is a statue in the Capitol of Col. Edward D. Baker who, after serving briefly as Senator from Oregon met heroic death in the Battle of Balls Bluff, but it was placed there by order of Congress and not as a State contribution to Statuary Hall.

Sporadically in the past names of Oregon men thought deserving of representation in the Statuary Hall have been suggested—James W. Nesmith, Joseph Lane, Matthew P. Deady, George H. Williams, and others. Their contributions to Oregon's welfare and progress are unquestioned, but we think of none whose renown was so nationalistic as that of Senator McNary or who drew such friendly regard and confidence without as well as within this State. And he was a native son.

O. P. A. Threatens to Destroy Swiss Cheese Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, for more than a year the Swiss-cheese industry in the State of Wisconsin has been threatened by a proposed order of O. P. A. to eliminate grading of that product which has been in effect for more than 20 years under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture in the State of Wisconsin. If the proposed order is issued, it will in effect play into the hands of the cheese monopolies and destroy an industry that has been built by the farmers, most of whom reside in my congressional district in Green County, Wis.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including herewith an editorial which appeared in the Monroe Evening Times of April 21, 1944:

CURRENT CHEESE COMMENT

More speculation goes on now about the future of the foreign type cheese industry than ever in its history, if the impressions of observers can be depended on.

There appears to be no doubt in any one's mind now that it is only a question of days until the State's system of grading Swiss cheeses will be knocked out by the ruling of O. P. A. that a single ceiling price shall be established, placing Swiss of all qualities on the same basis.

That in itself is the basis for the greater speculation, pointing largely toward a universal belief that the final shakeup will be that after the war, and maybe before, there will be fewer factories, and that larger plants will be established to take care of milk production, while the business goes under the ownership of a few larger concerns. What that will do to the industry is problematical now.

Whatever the outcome may be it is not questioned that the end of the days when the former good, wholesome, and rich Swiss was made may be in sight.

It is probable, according to the argument going on, that much of the Swiss production may be killed off in favor of some other variety, and that the total production may be shoved into processing channels instead of going out into the counters of the country as good natural cheese.

During the whole history of the foreign type industry production has been an individual matter. It has been an individual business, with the quality of cheese produced depending greatly upon the skill of the maker, and his desire to make a good quality cheese, or upon his indifference to quality. Grading has tended to create improved quality, and it is feared that if it is done away with that quality will hit bottom very shortly.

There appears to be little doubt that doing away with the grade system will play into the hands of processors. Any quality can go into that sort of product, and it would not be surprising to see the prevailing price drop to a level comparable to that paid for the low quality now.

A. A. A. Committees in Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the unselfish and outstanding work being done on the home front by the A. A. A. committees in Pennsylvania. I do so at this time particularly because of the partisan and unjustified attacks which have recently been made upon this organization. Constructive criticism is always welcome, but if these critics, both inside and outside the Congress, are sincere in their desire to correct faults in this agency, they should in all propriety await the results of a fair and impartial investigation of the alleged irregularities rather than undermine the confidence of the people in the management of the food front.

Undoubtedly, there are instances here and there where criticism is justified, but on the whole, the administration of A. A. A. in Pennsylvania is deserving of high praise. Of course, it is possible that an agency which must gage the farmer's use of gasoline in accordance with justified usage will arouse resentment among those few who hope to go joy riding on tractor gasoline. It is quite natural, also, that a farmer or two who want to indulge in luxury farming will resent the authority of machinery-rationing committees when they are refused a second tractor because some other farmer has a greater need for it. Or perhaps some farmer with a small war-production program will resent the fact that his son's appeal for a deferment is rejected by the same agency which reports favorably on a similar appeal by the son of a large war-food producer. Yes, criticism is bound to result in such cases. The A. A. A. committees of Pennsylvania have had a tough job, but they have performed their work admirably in spite of the gripers and the prophets of gloom.

It has been no small job for A. A. A. committees to review 16,000 cases of draft deferment in Pennsylvania and to render just and fair decisions as a result of their considered study and investigation. It has been no small job for these committees to pass judgment upon 100,000 applications for farm equipment and to spot these pieces of machinery on the farms which will give us maximum food production. It has been no small task for Pennsylvania A. A. A. committees to study the production records of 83,000 farms and to allocate gasoline so as to conserve the Nation's supply without curtailing our national food-production program. These have been major accomplishments and they have been performed in the simple manner and the conscientious style of the unassuming farmers who constitute these A. A. A. committees.

I would no more desecrate the memory of Israel Putnam and the farmers of Concord Bridge because of the apparent flaws in their colonial uniforms than I would condemn the A. A. A. elected county and community committeemen of Pennsylvania because of the minor criticisms which emanate from disgruntled partisans who base conclusions on isolated complaints. No one condemns the Army because of the peculiar antics of some soldier home on leave. No one condemns the Navy because of the impropriety of some sailor on shore leave. And no patriotic citizen will condemn any A. A. A. committee in Pennsylvania if he first reviews the remarkable record of achievement among Pennsylvania's farmers in 1942 and 1943.

To the farmers of my native State, I pay my respects, and to the A. A. A. committees who mobilized agriculture I give my salute. Petty details are insignificant, but the record of farm production and the reserves of fertility and grains provided by our conservation practices will never be forgotten.

The county and community committeemen so organized production that our allies received the food which their armies so desperately needed while at the same time we at home supported the best fed fighters and Nation on earth.

Because of the democratic and nonpartisan framework of the A. A. A. organization, I presume that I may be extolling and commending in large part members of the Republican Party. A study of the registration figures of rural Pennsylvania counties would so indicate. Therefore, this statement, Mr. Speaker, can have no political significance. But these committees are agencies of the Government and in the eyes of some people they immediately are objects for attack. To these persons, any Governmental agency, regardless of its record, its accomplishments or its achievements, should always be abused and condemned. They recognize only the war against the President and they wage it every day regardless of the effect it may have on the war which the President is waging against our Axis foes.

Partisan attempts to embarrass and destroy our Commander in Chief by smearing agencies of Government such as the A. A. A. committees which are contributing so much toward the winning of the war give comfort and aid to our enemies. And all of us are more likely to be hurt by these barrages than the President.

Simplified Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Washington Post of April 26 and the Washington Daily News of April 25:

[From the Washington Post of April 26, 1944]

SIMPLIFIED TAXES

The Ways and Means Committee has done an excellent job in the plan to relieve the great majority of income-tax payers of most of the vexatious paper work that has been required of them under the withholding-tax system. In place of the existing Victory tax of 3 percent on gross income over $624 per year, a new normal tax of 3 percent is levied on net incomes over $500. The present normal tax of 6 percent and the surtax beginning at 13 percent are to be combined into a single surtax, with rates beginning at 20 percent. The bill also substitutes uniform personal exemptions of $500 per person for surtax purposes in place of the existing system of exemptions. For example, a husband will be allowed an exemption of $500 for himself, $500 for his wife, and $500 for each dependent. The definition of dependents is also simplified. Instead of the present requirement that a dependent must be under 18 or mentally or physically incapable of self-support, the bill defines a dependent as any close relation for whom the taxpayer furnishes over half the support and who is not himself required to file a return. This definition has the advantage of being precise, and seems much more equitable and practicable.

These changes, made for the purpose of simplification, will necessarily cause some shift in tax burdens, but the general effect will be to decrease the payments of individuals with large families and somewhat increase the payments of taxpayers with small families—a move in the right direction. According to committee estimates, the proposed changes would reduce the returns from the individual income tax for 1944 about $60,000,000, or about one-third of 1 percent of total estimated revenue yield. Also in the interest of simplification, taxpayers would be permitted to make standard deductions of 10 percent of gross income, in lieu of allowable specific deductions for charitable contributions, taxes, etc. For incomes above $5,000 a flat deduction of $500 would be permitted.

By such means it would become possible to determine the amount of taxes due with comparative ease, especially in the income brackets below $5,000. After the first year, the Ways and Means Committee asserts that approximately 30,000,000 taxpayers would be relieved of the necessity of computing their taxes. For the remaining 20,000,000, new and simpler declaration forms would be feasible.

As we have frequently pointed out, simplification inevitably sweeps away some of the refinements in the law that in theory make an income tax system more equitable. But the end in this case justifies the means, especially as many of the proposed changes seem to make for more reasonable treatment of the taxpayer with a large number of dependents. There is, however, some criticism of the flat deduction of 10 percent for charitable contributions, taxes, and interest Some critics object that flat deductions of that amount would make overliberal allowance for charitable contributions. Others would like to take more specific account of actual contributions to charity, in the hope of encouraging larger contributions. Of course, these standard allowances would in any case be optional. Taxpayers may, if they choose, determine their own taxes, rather than take advantage of the simplified procedure.

The tax bill would also increase the tax on capital gains by 3 percent, as the result of subjecting them to the proposed 3 percent normal tax, in addition to the new increased surtax rates. Capital gains are not subject to the Victory tax, which would be replaced by the proposed 3 percent normal tax. Another change that is open to challenge is the additional taxes that would be imposed on income from partially tax-exempt bonds by combining the former normal and surtax rates, and introducing a new and lower so-called normal tax. As we have stated previously, this would be a kind of nibbling away at tax-exemption privileges that would create justified resentment against the Government, and certainly could not be defended as an essential feature of the simplification program. Apart from these controversial features of the bill, however, the program as a whole is a reform measure of which the Ways and Means Committee and all the experts who assisted its labors may well be proud.

[From the Washington Daily News of April 25, 1944]

BOON FROM MR. DOUGHTON

This newspaper has pounded the drums for income-tax simplification so often and so long that its readers may have come to regard us single-tracked. But we will risk immodesty to remark today that this continued drum-beating, in which many others have joined, is at last producing results.

The bill just introduced by Chairman DOUGHTON of the House Ways and Means Committee, after weeks of study by himself and his colleagues in collaboration with their own experts and the Treasury's, looks like a magnificent contribution to the peace of mind of the American taxpayer, who still cannot look back on March 15 without shuddering.

If this bill is passed—and certainly Congress is now fully aware of the public sentiment for simplification—30,000,000 of the 50,000,000 taxpayers won't have to file any return at all next March 15, aside from a withholding-tax receipt and the answers to four simple questions. Where the withholding tax has taken too much or too little, the Government will figure this out itself and mail either a bill or a rebate. So, for those 30,000,000 people, the bookkeeping nightmare of last March will be exorcised.

Some 10,000,000 others, namely, those receiving more than $5,000 from an employer or more than $100 from sources where withholding does not apply, will fill out a return—but a much simpler one than they have been accustomed (though not reconciled) to.

The final 10,000,000, principally people in the middle and upper brackets, will file on a "long form," but here again a simpler one than in the past.

Other changes are involved, notably the disappearance of the pesky victory tax and the adoption of a flat surtax exemption of $500 a person, whether the person be the head of the house, his spouse, or his dependent. (And the myth that dependency ends as a son or daughter turns 18—when in many cases the expense is just hitting a peak—is abandoned; hereafter the word dependent is to mean what it says.)

All in all, the Doughton bill represents a victory for sense and sanity.

Proper Utilization of Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, now that the Military Affairs Committee has rejected the idea of forcing men in the IV–F draft classification into essential war jobs and Secretary Stimson has tried to reduce some of the regrettable confusion about the Army's needs and administration of selective service, it might be well to ask again whether the Army has made the maximum possible use of men with minor physical defects and been as energetic as it could in helping solve this Nation's manpower problems.

Secretary Stimson's statement emphasized previous explanations that the greatest present Army need is for younger men capable of enduring the rigors of combat. Yet, the War Department still vigorously objects to steps which would release men in their twenties, in top physical condition, for front-line service and other duty in advanced areas where stamina, vigor, aggressiveness, and capacity to take it are indispensable.

Instead, the Army has insisted on mobilizing women for numerous assignments that many IV–F's, men obviously not fitted for industrial jobs, could handle satisfactorily.

It still is difficult to understand why the Army resists so stubbornly every suggestion that IV–F's with only slight disqualifications should be used in greater numbers on the home front.

Every Member of the House has observed young soldiers apparently in the finest physical condition, performing jobs which IV–F's, who are basically sound physically and mentally, can perform adequately. They are guarding our Government buildings, bridges, public utilities, and other strategic objectives. They are manning antiaircraft batteries, seacoast defenses, observation posts, detector stations, and military installations in this country where combat requirements do not apply. They are performing military police duty on the streets of Washington, other metropolitan centers, and cities and towns adjacent to Army camps.

Thousands of young men now in IV–F were sorely disappointed when they were rejected by the Army as unfit for military service. Large numbers not only would like to wear the uniform of their country but feel they could do much more in helping the war effort than by transferring to civilian jobs for which they are not trained and may not be physically or psychologically fit. These men should have an opportunity to become members of the Army and after the war be eligible for the consideration given holders of an honorable discharge.

I should like to direct attention to the vigorous drives of the Army and the O. W. I. to recruit more women for the WAC's. In printed advertisements and over the radio we are told that every woman who joins up releases a man for combat duty or some other strenuous service. Since the Army has been unable to obtain as many WAC's as it desires, why cannot many IV–F's be used in clerical work, as automobile drivers, couriers, and messengers, as instructors, and in a host of other jobs which do not require perfect physical condition. The training of IV–F's would not be any greater strain on the Army than training of women.

I should like to suggest that the Military Affairs Committee properly could urge the War Department to reconsider its attitude toward men for limited service and I hope the committee will use its influence to see that IV–F's are reviewed with the thought of finding in this huge group replacement for thousands of men trained and physically fit for combat duty who now are being used on the home front.

Pennsylvania Public Utility Commissioner Declares Opposition of National Association of Railroads and Utilities Commissioners to Lea Aviation Bill Not Representative of Membership

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to take this opportunity to place in the RECORD a letter written by the Honorable Thomas C. Buchanan, public utilities commissioner for the State of Pennsylvania, regarding the Lea aviation bill which I believe the Members will find interesting and illuminating:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
PENNSYLVANIA PUBLIC UTILITY COMMISSION,
November 23, 1943.

HON. CLARENCE F. LEA,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN LEA: My attention has been called to a very definite propaganda campaign in effect among State public service and utility commissioners and State governments in opposition to the Lea aviation bill, H. R. 3420, and its predecessor, H. R. 1012.

To make certain that it is not accepted as a unanimous opposition to the bills, I want to advise you that at the recent convention of the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners in Chicago, the action of that association opposing the bills was not unanimous.

State commissioners have practically no control over rates and service of railroads in intrastate traffic nor of trucks and busses in combined intra and interstate traffic. Actual jurisdiction is vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, although lip service is paid to State commissions and so-called States' rights. I cannot understand opposition to similar jurisdiction over airplanes. If the attack was to be made upon the Interstate Commerce Commission and its responsibility for the railroad mess, that would be a different thing, but the I. C. C. seems to get approval in spite of its acknowledged fumbling inefficiency.

I think if you men in Congress would decide the thing from a national viewpoint rather than trying to guess the influences back of political State administrations, Federal actions would be more respected and better in the public interest.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS C. BUCHANAN,
Commissioner.

A Maverick Is Fed Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of Saturday, April 1, 1944:

A MAVERICK IS FED UP

Mr. Maury Maverick (a maverick, by definition, wears no man's brand) was once a Member of Congress, once Mayor of San Antonio, and for some time has had his headquarters in Washington, where he is Chairman of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. He is a man of distinction, great forthrightness, enormous zip—in short, a man to reckon with. He has just performed a service which entitles him to the thanks and the grateful remembrance of his countrymen. In an eloquent memorandum denouncing what he calls "gobbledygook talk," he has something to say about the distressing language which adorns the red tape of bureaucracy. He would put an end to "finalizing" contracts; he frowns upon "patterns," "effectuating," and "dynamics," and he threatens to shoot anyone using the words "activation" and "implementation." May good luck attend him. He can make his ideas stick unless some superior, if he has a superior, comes along and (we believe this is the phrase) "dis-O. K.'s" them.

Railroad Misrepresentations Concerning Future Air Transport Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, there has recently been considerable agitation by some of our surface carrier interests in favor of changes in the law which will permit them to invade and dominate the air transportation field. Much of this agitation is synthetic and is presented under the imposing facade of a so-called neutral agency, the Transportation Association of America. Behind that facade there will be found the ambitions of certain individual surface interests to repeat in the air age the drive for great regional monopolies of transportation which they undertook some years ago and which very nearly succeeded.

Fortunately, this agitation does not meet with the unanimous approval either of the different forms of surface transportation or of all the important companies in any single form. For example, among our railroads there are many thoughtful men who realize the danger which this agitation would lead to. And our motortrucking industry has definitely and vigorously taken an official stand opposed to any changes in the Civil Aeronautics Act which would permit surface carriers to invade the air-transportation field.

One of the principal advocates of opening up to the railroads this new avenue toward transportation monopoly is Mr. Howard S. Palmer, president of the New Haven Railroad. In my extension of remarks on page A5068 in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and again on page A5512 in the Appendix of the RECORD, I attempted to point out to this gentleman and to the Members of the House the many fallacies and misstatements contained in his arguments. However, in radio speeches and in expensive full-page advertisements in national newspapers, Mr. Palmer is still beguiling the public with a fanciful picture of his railroad engaged in rail, air, and highway service in the future, thus clutching within the New Haven's fist two new forms of transportation which, if permitted to develop independently, would continue to furnish the New Haven with vigorous and salutary competition.

There recently appeared in the Harrisburg Patriot of March 1, 1944, an editorial which contained some very sound advice to Mr. Palmer, and which merits the thoughtful attention of the Congress. That editorial reads as follows:

RAIL MONOPOLY HEADS FOR TROUBLE

Railroad executives, able as they are in many fields, seem unable to rid themselves of the delusion that if they could only monopolize all types of transportation, the solution would be perfect.

Thus comes the word from New York that the head of the New Haven is all set to put planes in the air if the barriers against the railroads doing that sort of thing are lifted. Then, says the notice, railroad men could thump their chests and proclaim they have a perfectly coordinated rail-air-highway system.

Of all railroads to indulge in such folly, the New Haven should be the last and most ashamed. This is the road that one day controlled the transportation system of much of New England. Not only did they run trains, but they controlled interurban streetcar systems and then they bought up the boats and then sometime later they went broke and have been crippled ever since. The monopoly and the crash could scarcely be called coincidental.

But like other railroads they apparently are shooting at the same targets. What they ought to be doing is making rail service so attractive and economic for the public that the volume of business would rise to profitable levels. As has been said time and again it costs no more fuel, light, or overhead to haul a full coach than a half coach of passengers.

Not everybody wants to ride the planes, the busses, the trains, the ships. Persons have their choices subject to funds, time, and other factors. What the rail and other transportation systems should do is to keep out of each other's way, cultivate competition and resourcefulness, install economies, improve service, reduce rates to increase patronage. These points are advocated for the railroads' benefit and because they must be healthy to do the transportation job.

Such a system is infinitely better than the trend toward monopoly which after all is a step toward socialization. It is going to be much easier for a government so inclined to take over a monopoly of transportation or anything else than widely scattered independent, individually owned enterprises. When railroads or others head for transportation monopoly, they actually are heading for trouble.

G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and resolution:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
DEPARTMENT OF MARYLAND, INC.,
Baltimore, Md., April 25, 1944.

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN D'ALESANDRO: I am enclosing you herewith a motion that was unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Department of Maryland and annual membership round-up held at the War Memorial Building, Sunday, April 23, 1944, and we will thank you to have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Sincerely,

J. NELSON TRIBBY,
Department Adjutant.

The department commander, the grande chef de gare, 5 department vice commanders and the commanders, adjutants, and membership chairmen of 101 posts of the Department of Maryland, assembled at the War Memorial Building, Baltimore, Md., on Sunday, April 23, 1944, for the annual membership round-up, respectfully request Congressman JOHN E. RANKIN, chairman of the Veterans' Legislation Committee, to immediately report the G. I. bill of rights—Senate 1767—to the House floor and any controversial sections be submitted to the Members of the House so that this bill may be enacted into law before May 30, 1944, as a tribute to the memory of all the men and women who have given their lives for the preservation of our country and further that a copy be sent to the senior Senator from Maryland the Honorable MILLARD E. TYDINGS and the senior Representative of the Maryland delegation, the Honorable THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Flood-Free Johnstown, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a release from the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C., relative to flood-free Johnstown, Pa.

JOHNSTOWN, PREY TO FLOODS, HAILS NEW CONTROL WORKS

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Johnstown, Pa., is telling the world that it is no longer at the mercy of its rivers.

Reason for the celebration is the completion of an $8,000,000 flood-control project, says the National Geographic Society. As they near the half-way mark in the annual flood season—January to May—the citizens look confidently on the Stony Creek, the Little Conemaugh, and the Conemaugh Rivers now channeled between high retaining walls.

Project includes 9 miles of work on stretches of the three streams—deepening and widening of channels, realinement of courses, and the facing of banks with concrete up to 12 inches thick. Retaining walls range from 37 feet to 67 feet in height.

CITIZENS DECLARE FREEDOM

Pens and typewriters are spreading the news as the city's 67,000 residents and its 41,000 suburbanites declare their new independence to friends in other cities. Watermarks on old buildings will be blotted out. Only reminders of flood stages will be official brass markers recording changes in water levels.

Johnstowners have long been conscious of their water peril. First flood recorded in the city's history occurred in 1808. From that year to the present, about 23 have been big enough for mention in the city's annals.

Flood history took a new turn in 1836 with the building of the South Fork Reservoir, 16 miles northeast of the city, to supply water for the Johnstown-Pittsburgh Canal. The reservoir, fed by the Little Conemaugh and known later as Lake Conemaugh, was 3 miles long, ¼ to 1 mile wide, and 72 feet deep at the dam.

When the canal gave way to a railroad, the reservoir was used as a fish preserve, was neglected as a storage basin. Leaks developed, the dam broke several times, was rebuilt. State of the dam from time to time made local talk, caused little anxiety.

FIRE TAKES HEAVY TOLL

At the beginning of May 1889 the future looked bright to Johnstown's 30,000 people. Toward the last of the month, skies darkened, rain fell heavily for days, the rivers overflowed their banks.

On the 31st mills and stores closed. People in the lower areas began to move furniture to the upper floors. As the rain continued, the swollen rivers made canals of the city's streets, carried away bridges.

The lake was full to the brim, sloshed over the narrow spillways, began to wash over the whole crest of the dam, burst the earthwork in midafternoon. More than 4,000,000,000 gallons of water rushed down the mountain gorge, a deadly and destructive force moving at 24 miles an hour.

Alarm was balked by disruption of telephone and telegraph service. Flight from the doomed city was prevented by the water in the streets. Filled with wreckage from the upper valley, the raging waters hit Johnstown like a battering ram. Fire broke out and 300 persons were burned to death.

When the flood subsided the toll stood at more than 2,000 lives, and property damage estimated up to $10,000,000. Johnstown buried more than 700 victims as unidentified dead.

One of the first major disasters to occur after the establishment of telegraphic wire service to newspapers, the tragedy quickly made front-page news throughout the country. Clara Barton and the Red Cross plunged into the job of relief.

A TRIUMPH OF FAITH

The flood yielded a strange crop of mementoes. Books were written, tales of heroism became legends, exhibits of flood scenes appeared at fairs, even motion pictures were contrived to show what happened.

St. Patrick's Day, 1936, brought Johnstown another ordeal by flood. High waters again ravaged the business district, wiped out Easter stocks, ruined stores, quadrupled the damage of the flood of 1889, took few lives.

Johnstowners are made of durable stuff. Citizens pitched into the litter in the streets, merchants put their stores in order, stretched their credit for new merchandise, reopened for business.

The people resolved to put Nature in a strait jacket, stirred Federal officials to inquiry, got Army engineers to investigate, heard with dismay that building of additional reservoirs would not solve the problem.

It took a flood in May 1937 and an act of Congress to get action on channel improvement, real key to control. Work was begun in August 1938, completed in November 1943.

Johnstown, founded in 1800, is an iron and steel center, and figures importantly in the mining and movement of soft coal. Peacetime factory products included mining equipment, motortrucks, electrical supplies, radiators, furniture, glass, cement, and soap. Clay pits in the vicinity are a valuable resource.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, it is "Monkey Ward" now. Think what a fourth term would produce.

Who in the world ever told "Old Blood and Guts" that we with the British wanted to rule the world?

When corn is frozen, hogs and cattle will take to market, and soon food for war will require a revamping and the set-up a change of name.

Pray tell us, Colonel Pick, of the Army engineers, where you could build enough dams to hold back this water—guess it is nature's way of replenishing the oceans.

The devastation wrought the small towns here, by the "Nudeal" policies and the war, differs only from some in the Old World in that our buildings have their roofs yet.

The O. W. I. is dropping seeds in neutral and subdued nations with the hope of creating gratitude. Congressmen used to do that in their districts years ago for the same purpose.

Dr. Robert Lovett, one of the four purged by the Appropriations and Dies Committees last year, has been put in the university in Puerto Rico by Tugwell. Congress cannot head off a bureaucrat even in the islands of the sea.

The Interior Department last year spent $160,000 for long-distance telephone calls, and they asked to have 2,200 of their number deferred from military service, in spite of the fact that their Secretary has the reputation of being a fighting cock.

Josephus Daniels pled to the editors that "one-third of the Senate plus one" could defeat a treaty ratification and that the rule should be overhauled. That one-third plus one you complain about, Mr. Daniels, sustained consumer subsidies and threatens to keep the emergency on indefinitely, if the fourth term succeeds.

Uncle Sam Cracks Down on Avery's Chicago Mutiny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of April 27, 1944:

UNCLE SAM CRACKS DOWN ON AVERY'S CHICAGO MUTINY

Sewell Avery's defiance of the United States Government has gone so far that President Roosevelt has been obliged to call upon the Army to take over the Montgomery Ward Chicago plants.

The explanation for Avery's attitude is quite simple:

He always has been used to having his way and he wants it now. He is a die-hard who refuses to permit the fact that his country is at war to interfere with his belief that he has a right to do as he blamed well pleases where his employees are concerned.

Avery is a die-hard in litttle things as well as big ones. Just 20 years ago this month he was arrested in Chicago for ignoring a "Stop sign." Most millionaires would have waived trial, paid a small fine and saved time. Not Avery. He went to court, insisted he was innocent, fought it out, and finally paid up—having no other choice.

Today he behaves in the same manner. Called upon by the President to obey the ruling of the War Labor Board and continue his union contract pending negotiation, including maintenance of membership—he has forced his Government to the extreme of calling out the Army.

Does it matter that his President is leading a war for this Nation's survival? Does it matter to Avery that the United States Army is fighting that war, and that his obstinacy simply piles upon it added burden and annoyance?

His frame of mind is best expressed in his own words in a recent interview:

"I am against the New Deal and I'm proud of nothing more than that."

He should tell that to the boys fighting at Anzio, at Cassino, at Hollandia, over "Fortress Europe"—the boys who are making America safe, even for Averys.

We are glad President Roosevelt has acted swiftly to bring this petulant misrepresentative of American business to book.

We say misrepresentative because Sewell Avery does not represent the wartime attitude of business, which has been overwhelmingly cooperative and patriotic. It is to be borne in mind that the industry members of the War Labor Board concurred in the order to Montgomery Ward to extend its contract. And as we pointed out the other day, Business Week magazine chided Ward's for its churlish obstruction in wartime.

The contract in question ran out last December 8. Avery then refused to renew it, claiming the union no longer represented a majority of the employees. The first W. L. B. order was issued January 13—

So that Uncle Sam has been patient with this man for 3 long months.

The issue now is simply whether Avery can defy the United States Government and get away with it.

The answer—given yesterday—is that he can't.

Let that answer now be clear to all others—including John L. Lewis—who permit their prejudices and pet hates to stand in the way of their wartime duty to this nation.

Ninety-nine percent of business and 99 percent of labor have teamed up in the most magnificent war production job of history.

To a man like Avery, of course, that merely means the Army and home front are all out of step but him.

Parachutes for Government Use

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. LANE POWERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include at the request of Stanley Switlik, president of the Switlik Parachute Co., of Trenton, N. J., a letter to me from him dated April 18, 1944, and copy of a wire he sent to Drew Pearson:

SWITLIK PARACHUTE CO.,
Trenton, N. J., April 18, 1944.

Hon. D. LANE POWERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: No doubt you have read in the press or heard over the radio frequent statements made by the columnist Drew Pearson during the past month, casting aspersions on parachutes which have been in use by our Government. It is hardly necessary here to repeat those news releases, each one being practically a repetition of each other, and an apparent continuous effort by their author to bask in the limelight; and without securing the supporting facts which are warranted by such allegations, to honestly prove or disprove the contentions which have been made.

I am, however, enclosing copy of a telegram which I sent to Mr. Pearson on the day following his first article which appeared on March 8, 1944, as I strongly object to such procedures on his part. They do not tend to help win the war, but rather break down morale of the boys at the front and instill unnecessary fears into the hearts of their loved ones at home.

You will note that we extended to Mr. Pearson an invitation to visit our factory for the purpose of explaining to him every angle of development, manufacture, and testing of all types of parachutes. We also offered to him the opportunity of reviewing hundreds of testimonial letters, written by men in the armed forces whose lives were saved by parachutes. Many of those letters testify that the men landed in water, and yet found it easily possible to detach their parachutes and return to land in perfect safety, in several instances remaining in the water for several hours before being rescued.

It is also of interest to note that the A. A. F. Matériel Command at Wright Field, Ohio, also invited Mr. Pearson to visit their experimental laboratories, to thoroughly acquaint him with all phases of the parachute situation. He, however, refused to accept that invitation, although news editors and their staffs were only too glad to avail themselves of a similar opportunity to check the items which had been initiated in their columns by Mr. Pearson.

At that time it was pointed out that while the deaths of eight paratroopers were regrettable, they jumped by mistake into water at night. The Air Safety Division reported that, loaded with combat equipment, as they were, and plunged unexpectedly into water, the men would have drowned no matter what parachute they wore.

It is true, no life should be needlessly jeopardized at any time; but since an accident did occur, conclusions should not have been formed by any commentator without a conscientious and thorough study of all factors contributing toward the cause. Neither should he project unjust accusation against the type of parachute as the sole contributing agency for the resulting deaths unless responsibility for its failure had been definitely established.

Since it is apparent that Mr. Pearson is being furnished with reports which are so definitely one-sided, with utter disregard of all phases of the subject at issue, it is recommended that investigation be made to ascertain the source of such misleading information. Further, that the investigation determine the purpose in broadcasting such unfounded releases without their being thoroughly confirmed and sanctioned through proper channels.

All articles published by Mr. Pearson have been full of misstatements. He has been offered opportunities to confirm or correct his impressions. He has, however, made no effort to thoroughly secure first-hand information as to the relative merits of either the parachutes which he has sought to condemn or those which he is apparently attempting to exploit.

We have no selfish motives in bringing this matter to your attention, as we, like other manufacturers, have been called upon to bid on parachutes equipped with the quick-release feature. Regardless of the type that is to be produced, those individuals engaged in both the procurement and manufacture of parachutes can always be depended upon to furnish the best possible type of equipment. Our company, one of the pioneers in the industry, has always demonstrated its willingness to assist the Government at all times in such developments—with one purpose in mind, the saving of human lives. We, therefore, take exception to any misstatements intended to cast a doubt on the efficiency of equipment which has been furnished to our armed forces and the incidental effect on public morale.

Inasmuch as Mr. Pearson has brought before the public such disquieting and unnecessary fears concerning the parachute, we feel that the time has now arrived when they should be acquainted with the true conditions. In line therewith we most earnestly request that full investigation be made by the national defense program and that all facts be made known to the public, in order that our boys and their relatives may rest at ease and realize that those boys are not being sent out into indiscriminate murder, as claimed by Mr. Pearson.

This company, and the writer personally, are at your service; and we are offering our cooperation at anytime we may be called upon, in order that the true facts may be brought to light.

Respectfully,

STANLEY SWITLIK.

MARCH 9, 1944.

DREW PEARSON,
Washington Merry-Go-Round,
Washington, D. C.:

Your article on parachutes very regretful. You were grossly misinformed. Every argument in the article is in reverse. You have done great injustice to the American parachute and the military forces. The military parachute is unrestricted by patents as to manufacture. By trying to perform a good deed you were made an unwitting party and medium to sponsor an article of doubtful value. The Army, Navy, and parachute industry have for years and are at present experimenting and developing improved way of releasing harnesses. Your article puts a fear and worry into the hearts of mothers, wives, sweethearts, and friends of hundreds of thousands of men in air service who use parachutes. You owe it to yourself and your public to get true facts and complete history and story of parachutes. You are cordially invited to visit us in Trenton. Everything will be open to you. You will see how the parachutes are manufactured, developed, and tested. You will also be able to see for yourself hundreds of letters written to the Caterpillar Club for membership from men whose lives were saved by parachute. After this visit with us we believe that Drew Pearson is big enough to recognize the facts as they are and correct his statements. Please advise when we may have the pleasure of expecting you in Trenton.

SWITLIK PARACHUTE CO.,
STANLEY SWITLIK.

The Tax Simplification Bill Does Many Things Besides Simplify

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed in the recent bill reported out by the Ways and Means Committee, whose alleged purpose is to simplify the income tax law. This bill is the product of the so-called experts in the Treasury Department. I have reason to believe that it is not satisfactory to many members on the Ways and Means Committee, particularly those on the minority side. The majority leadership on the Ways and Means Committee has stood with the Treasury Department in reporting out this bill.

One of the biggest disappointments of this bill is that it makes no provision for a credit for deductions, such as contributions to religious, educational, and charitable institutions. I realize it would be argued that there is a blanket deduction granted to all taxpayers.

Let us consider for a moment the proposition as contained in this bill of granting to every taxpayer whose income was less than $5,000 a 10 percent credit for deductions and a $500 credit for all those taxpayers over $5,000. This really is not any credit for deductions at all. The taxpayers of the United States are just one large family or club, which must raise all the money necessary for the Government to carry on. Suppose in a given club, there are 100 members and it is agreed that they will assess their members whatever dues are necessary to pay their bills and they start out by giving each club member a credit for $1. Of what value is that credit?

There is another angle to look upon in reference to a blanket credit for deductions. It gives to some taxpayers credits for which they are not entitled. Thus, the Treasury of the United States is cheated. The credit is given whether they make the contribution or not. Therefore, there is no inducement to make the contribution and the institutions interested will suffer.

Let us consider a few possibilities that might easily arise under this tax bill. We will take the case of two ladies, who each earn $1,000 a year, which is subject to the withholding tax. One of the ladies is buying a home and she pays $50 a year interest. She also pays State taxes in the sum of $50. She contributes to her local church, to missionaries, to orphanages, to the Red Cross, the U. S. O., and other like concerns $150. Her total deductions should be $250. The other lady who receives $1,000 pays no taxes and interests and contributes nothing. Under the bill that we are asked to pass they are both taxed exactly alike. This virtually abolishes the basic principle that 15 percent of an individual's income is exempt from taxation, if contributed to religion and charity. I realize it will be said that the lady who made the actual contributions and paid the other deductions can file a claim for a refund. The Treasury Department itself admits that it will take months and months and months to get this refund and, as taxpayers, we know the handling of those refunds will be exceedingly costly and cumbersome for the Treasury Department.

Let us take another case of two workers in a defense plant, who each earn $4,500 a year, which is subject to the withholding tax. One of these men pays no interest, no State taxes, and contributes nothing to religion and charity. The other individual, we will suppose, pays $300 interest, local taxes of $150, and he gives away or contributes $450. Under our basic law there is $900 which should be exempt from taxation. Yet both of these men are taxed the same. Both have the same amount of taxes taken from their envelopes. Again, it is argued that the one man who is a community builder can ask a bureaucratic and top-heavy Treasury Department for a refund. That is not practical.

A leading tax expert in the city of Washington stated to me this week that he thought these refunds would take 2 or 2½ years. Is that justice?

Let us take another hypothetical case. We will consider the war contract broker, whose sole assets are his suitcase. He pays no State taxes. He pays no interest; yet his income is $25,000 a year. He contributes nothing to religion and charity, but under the bill reported out by the Ways and Means Committee he is entitled to a blanket deduction of $500. In other words, at the rates applied to an individual of his income, his taxes are reduced $310 by not giving $500 to religion and charity.

Mr. Speaker, it is very evident that what has happened here is that taxes have not been simplified. Individuals have been ignored and trampled upon, and slyly and subtly without public hearings, the Treasury Department and the majority of the Ways and Means Committee are offering to the Congress a new form of taxation, to wit, a gross income tax. They have for all practical purposes abolished deductions for that great mass of people earning less than $5,000. This same tax bill raises the tax in several instances, all of which was done without any public hearings or a chance for the taxpayers to be heard.

Mr. Speaker, there was a reason why a provision was made when the income tax was first adopted more than 30 years ago that that portion up to 15 percent of a man's income, if given away to help others, was exempt from taxation. The reason is that such a procedure is for the public good. It is for the lasting good of America that men give of their substance to provide orphanages, the great Red Cross organization, community chests, hospitals for crippled children, colleges and universities, and the churches themselves.

I wish to reiterate what I stated before in this Congress concerning the matter of giving to our worth-while institutions:

It is not a preacher's problem or a problem that belongs to those charged with raising money. Because men give a few dollars to support the Boy Scout movement a community may be saved the expense of a costly trial and a prison term. Because men give of their substance to support a church that inspires people to high living and restrains their bent for evil, homes are saved, and children are not sent to public institutions supported by taxation. Because men give of their substance to provide charity and philanthropy the taxpayers of America are saved millions of dollars. Because devout individuals prayerfully give to missionary programs the causes of war were removed in the far corners of the earth. There is no other antidote for the causes of war. Again I say the question of taxing exempt income given to religion and charity is a public question and means much to our country.

Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department is making a deliberate attempt to impose upon the country a gross income tax. They are virtually abolishing the established principle that contributions are exempt from taxation. This is not accidental. It is intentional. This problem has been called to the attention of the Treasury on many different occasions. Delegations of churchmen, educators, and others have called upon the Treasury Department officials and their technicians. On one occasion a conference was held with the Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., and his then chief counsel, Randolph Paul. This conference was attended by Bishop Edwin H. Hughes, of the Methodist Church, Dr. Charles Vickrey, president of the Golden Rule Foundation, Dr. Gould Wickey, head of the Church Related Colleges of America, and Dr. Guy E. Snavely, chairman of the Council on Taxes and Philanthropy, and also executive secretary of the Association of American Colleges, and myself.

Thoughtful letters and telegrams have been sent to the Treasury in regard to this problem. All of these requests have been for naught. The Treasury has decided against these institutions and the majority of the Ways and Means Committee has followed them.

It is now up to the Congress to decide whether or not we shall continue to exempt from taxation that portion of an individual's income up to 15 percent which he contributes to religion and charity, or whether we shall abandon that principle. It is also up to the Congress to decide whether or not we shall, under the guise of simplification, impose a gross income tax.

For the Congress to insist that all taxpayers be taxed the same, regardless of their contributions, is un-American, and it destroys the rights of the individual for the alleged purpose of simplification. A tax structure which destroys and nullifies the desire to support worthwhile institutions for character building, education, service, and mercy, is a step toward totalitarianism. If these splendid institutions which have heretofore depended upon contributions are materially hurt by this tax program, and I believe they will be, the next step is a Government subsidy for every hospital, orphanage, college, and church. Such a thing is unthinkable. It violates every principle of separation of church and state, and intellectual and religious liberty. It cannot be denied that there are those in the Treasury Department who adhere to this totalitarian faith and accept the principle that the Government should do everything and subsidize all institutions. The Congress should reject this theory.

Government by Checks and Balances in Peril

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the wise men who penned the Declaration of Independence and who conceived the Constitution, knew that the only possible way in which a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, as it was characterized by Abraham Lincoln, could stand, was by a separation of powers. They visualized such a government as government by consent of the governed. They knew human nature. They knew history. They knew that power corrupts and, as someone recently said, "absolute power corrupts absolutely."

The founding fathers knew that power feeds on itself. They knew that the whole tendency of government is to expand, to encroach upon, and finally to engulf the liberties of the people in tyranny.

Because they so well knew these age-old facts, they provided a scheme of government which has been pronounced by the keenest students of human society as the finest and most stable form of free government that was ever devised by the mind of man. That was our constitutional government of checks and balances. The statesmen of other nations at the time our Government was devised derided it and said that it would never work successfully. They insisted that the people—meaning the masses—were not capable of self-government. They declared that there would be such complete disagreement between the three independent, coequal, and coordinate branches of the Government as to thwart all action and result literally in a deadlock. They insisted that, if this did not occur, two of the branches would combine at some time to destroy the third, and that then the stronger of the two would override the weaker, and tyranny would result. They were mistaken.

The founders of our American system of government were wiser than were the Old World statesmen of that other day.

Under this government of checks and balances, we have developed the greatest people, the highest living levels, the highest wages, the best working conditions, the widest distribution of wealth, the finest educational system, the most wonderful religious institutions, the greatest degree of individual liberty, and the richest economy ever developed by any people in this world. We did all that in less than 160 years.

The last and the greatest test we have met has been the preparation for this war in which we are now engaged. The whole German Nation under Hitler for 12 years has been driven in the most intensive preparation for war ever witnessed in the history of man. Italy, under Mussolini, was so driven for 20 years. Japan, under the war lords, has been so driven for 40 years. Russia, under Stalin, has been so driven for 20 years. Yet, under our American system of government and economy, we have in 3 years overtaken and surpassed the results of all those intensified war efforts under the dictators. Free industry, free enterprise, and free labor cooperated to produce a modern-day miracle—the machines and matériel of war with which we have not only equipped our own armed forces, but to a very great extent those of all our allies, including Russia.

So successful have we been that liberties which the American people of this and previous generations accepted as a matter of course are regarded by peoples of other countries as privileges so wonderful as to be beyond their reach.

American citizens have always been free to earn; they have always been free to buy; they have always been free to hire; they have always been free to be hired: that is the America our fighting forces are struggling on the battle fronts to protect and maintain.

Under our great governmental system of checks and balances, democracy became more than merely a word; it became a way of life and a system of production. Someone has well stated the very essence of our whole governmental and social system in America is direct, voluntary employment of the individual, by the individual and for the individual.

Under this great governmental system, having always before it the Bill of Rights guaranteeing freedom of the individual citizen, the son of the humblest laborer in the land can turn his gaze to the White House and know that a residence therein is open to him. Our men and women could choose their own course of life, their own religion, their own political doctrine, their education, their own business; all this without interference from any source. The founding fathers knew as most of our people have always known, that liberty is orderly freedom under the law. That a man's right to do whatever he wanted to do was limited only by the rights of his neighbors. We have all lived by the creed in America that every man's liberty stops where the other man's rights begin.

It was not until the last decade that the men and women of America began to realize that it was possible for their liberties under the Bill of Rights to be taken from them, and that all the freedom and the privileges which they enjoyed each day were not actually born with them. We had forgotten that "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." For the first time and within the last 12 years, the American people began to taste the bitterness of bureaucratic arrogance and official despotism. They began to realize their liberties were slipping away from them.

The American people have heard much in the last 10 years about a New Deal. What they actually have received is the oldest and most dangerous deal known to history—a cunning and continued attempt by a designing clique to concentrate in the executive department at Washington the Government of the Nation, and to transform the rights of the people under the Bill of Rights into favors to be handed out at the whim of bureaucrats and to be bartered for partisan advantage.

No clear-minded citizen can question the fact that for 10 years there has been a constant, never-ending, and exceedingly aggressive attempt to center all power and control in the hands of the executive department, and to weaken both the legislative and the judicial branches of the Government in the estimation of the people. The Chief Executive himself has been the leader in these attempts to besmirch, besmear, and belittle both the legislative and the judicial branches of the Government. He has plainly and openly resented and defied the powers vested in them by the Constitution. He attempted to coerce the Congress to empower him to pack the Supreme Court. In the process of that effort, he heaped more slurs and insults upon our Federal judiciary than all other Presidents combined had ever thought of doing. When he failed in these attempts, he bided his time and managed by appointment through three terms in office to achieve what he failed to coerce the Congress to do—permit him to name six additional judges who would construe the Constitution as he, the Chief Executive, wanted it construed. He has appointed a majority of not only the members of the Supreme Bench, but of the lower Federal courts as well.

The Chief Executive, himself, has been the leader in a long-continued campaign of vilification, recrimination, ridicule, abuse, and insult against the legislative branch of the Government. No person can look back over the record of the attempts of the Chief Executive to usurp the legislative powers of the Congress and to operate the Nation by administrative directives instead of by statutory law, without plainly discerning that the whole pattern was to destroy the checks and balances set up by the founding fathers, to destroy the confidence of the people in the Congress—their special instrument of control over their Government and their public administrators.

I again warn you that the government of, by, and for the people in the United States of America is very rapidly being transformed into a government of, by, and for the bureaucrats.

I warn you that unless your Congress, supported and sustained by you, can recover the vast powers which have been delegated to the Chief Executive and which have been used by him to enable him and his subordinate bureaucrats to assume powers never given them by the Congress, your constitutional representative system of government, the liberties you have enjoyed, will become but a hollow form.

This New Deal administration has with incredible cunning built up a vested interest in political patronage which will directly affect millions of voters in the next election. Thomas Jefferson knew exactly what he was talking about when he said:

> Dependence begets subservience and venality, suffocates the germ of virtue, and prepares fit tools for the designs of ambition.

Daniel Webster stated clearly the case of the benevolent autocrat nearly a century ago when he declared:

> It is hardly too strong to say that the Constitution was made to guard the people against the dangers of good intentions, real or pretended. * * * There are men in all ages who mean to exercise power usefully—but who mean to exercise it. They mean to govern well—but they mean to govern; they promise to be kind masters, but they mean to be masters. They think they need but little restraint upon themselves. Their notion of the public interest is apt to be quite closely connected with their own exercise of authority. They may not, indeed, always understand their own motives. The love of power may sink too deep in their own hearts even for their own security and may pass with themselves for more patriotism and benevolence.

It behooves us to protect and maintain our Government of checks and balances. Public opinion is still the most powerful force in America. It behooves all the people of this country, if they wish to save their free, constitutional, representative Republic, and, of course, they do, to make known to their present representatives in the Congress in the most positive and emphatic terms their determination that their Government of checks and balances shall be protected and maintained.

It would be a tragedy to civilization if the American experiment in free government should fail. It must not fail. It cannot fail and it will not fail if the people will that it shall not fail and express their will to their representatives in the Congress. It makes no difference in final results whether our free government of checks and balances is lost and destroyed by sincere men who are mistaken or by cunning men who are designing—the final ultimate would be tyranny. It would be governmental tyranny. It would be unspeakable. It would be intolerable. It would be such that the American people simply could not stand it.

May God give us all the wisdom and the strength to preserve untarnished and unimpaired the great rich heritage of our wonderful Nation, our wonderful Government, our wonderful liberties, to hand down to our posterity as our forefathers handed this heritage down to us.

G. I. Joe Understands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an article appearing in the News, Washington, D. C., on April 26, 1944, written by the columnist, William Philip Simms, who is in Europe mingling daily with our service people in that theater. The article is most interesting, coming as it does from the front, and is as follows:

G. I. JOE UNDERSTANDS

(By William Philip Simms)

LONDON, April 26.—Surrounded by soldiers who will soon risk their lives in the most portentous battle in history, I am convinced that certain sections of American opinion have a mistaken notion of what makes our soldiers tick.

Some writers, commentators, and politicians are saying that G. I. Joe is puzzled by our foreign policy; that he would put more heart into his soldiering if he understood our policy better; that he would fight harder if we did not bungle things so badly politically—for example in north Africa, Italy, and France.

Personal investigation has led to no such conclusion. I have talked with a good many of our boys in Britain and with some of the world's best war correspondents who have just arrived here from the Mediterranean theater. The consensus is that the one great big thought in the minds of our soldiers is to win the war and go home as quickly as possible.

Of course the American Joe is for democracy. He thinks his own country is mighty grand. In fact he thinks so now more than ever. And broadly speaking, he would like to see poor old Europe enjoy some of the same sort of blessings. But that is not why he crossed the Atlantic. He came to fight for Uncle Sam. Hitler and Hirohito attacked his country and he intends to lick them both to a frazzle and then go home.

Sumner Welles, former Under Secretary of State, is quoted in a London newspaper as saying that the effectiveness of our military forces would be enhanced if our men better understood our political as well as our military strategy and saw more plainly how they were not only helping to defeat the Axis tyranny but also helping to construct the kind of world of which the President has spoken. But observation here leads to the conclusion that however right he may be theoretically, he is not being realistic. Our Joe is not greatly perturbed by such factors. He doesn't vibrate to the words of American politicians the way those gentlemen think he should, let alone to the isms of Europe.

In Italy, according to those who have occupied fox holes with them, our boys don't care a rap whether Badoglio, Signor Croce, Count Sforza, Tagliatti, or A. M. G. O. T. runs things, just so somebody maintains order long enough for the Allies to win this war and get to hell out.

The same, I am convinced, will apply to France and the rest of Europe so far as the American forces are concerned. If the 40,000,000 Frenchmen want General De Gaulle it is all right with our Joes. If not that is all right, too. In any event it is France's business. As our soldiers see it, they didn't come over here to shed their blood in a French, Italian, or Yugoslav civil war. The less they become involved in Europe's family quarrels the better they will like it, and the quicker they start home. That latter thought holds No. 1 priority with practically all of them.

Historical Documents in Seligman Memorial Library

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I have been interested in learning that a very rare collection of historical documents gathered over a half century by the late Edwin Robert Anderson, who held the McVickar professorship of political economy at Columbia University, New York City, is to be permanently available as the Seligman Memorial Library. Sponsoring the library is a committee composed of some of the country's foremost business leaders. As the Seligman collection has tremendous national significance for those engaged in research linking past events with those of today and tomorrow, I ask unanimous consent that a brief statement regarding this important library be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Evidence that history repeats is found in a storehouse of rare historical documents known as the Seligman collection, at Columbia University, established in memory of the late Robert Anderson Seligman, who held the McVickar professorship of political economy.

For example, a century before the American Revolution, the King of England set up a system of price ceilings as a basis for protecting the royal household against profiteering. Today wartime price ceilings are imposed for protection of the people.

For a half century Dr. Seligman searched the earth for the best, the most momentous, and the rarest writings that men had produced. As a result the Seligman collection at Columbia embraces the whole field of economics as it was analyzed and described by the best minds from the thirteenth century on.

To make the Seligman collection a valuable addition to the research material available and to assure its full use as a guide to historical documents that have a bearing on the future, a committee of sponsors has been set up for the Seligman Memorial Library. Sponsors include Thomas I. Parkinson, president, Equitable Life Assurance Society, chairman; Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board, Chase National Bank; Henry Bruere, president, Bowery Savings Bank; Frederick H. Ecker, chairman of the board, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; Leon Fraser, president, First National Bank of New York City; Henry Ittleson, vice president, Commercial Investment Trust; Thomas W. Lamont, chairman of the executive committee, J. P. Morgan & Co.; and Thomas J. Watson, president, International Business Machines Corporation.

The value of this priceless collection of rare documents for research purposes is enormous. To find a precedent for governmental price control of such tangibles as foodstuffs and such intangibles as rent, the Seligman collection goes back to the proclamation of the James of England who concerned his royal self with the highest price that might be charged for a quarter of wheat and with the maximum that might be collected by the "weeke" for a "roume," either in an inn or in the stable.

Foreshadowing the condition that, in this day and age, has impelled established merchants to ask the law to protect them against fly-by-night competition, the Seligman papers go back to a yellowed manuscript that bears the date 1786 and read the words of retail merchants, petitioning Parliament to pass an act restricting "hawkers and pedlars."

One learns that: "The Freeman Retail Traders in the principal towns in Scotland have for years labored under considerable hardships arising from a number of hawkers or itinerant dealers opening temporary sale rooms in town and carrying a very considerable share of trade, while they contribute nothing to the public taxes."

To trace back the changes that have been wrought over the centuries in the policies and methods with which the law deals with labor, the Seligman collection goes back to the original imprinting of an order in council that, under date of November 7, 1761, took cognizance of the fact that a great number of journeymen cabinet makers had struck for shorter hours and higher piecework rates. Furthermore, the order set forth that the striking journeymen were meeting here and there to raise subscriptions for strike benefits and had even gone so far as to deter and hinder others from working as usual and to threaten them with death or maiming if they did not come into and assist them in their demands.

Reviewing the language with which a businessman, in a freer and less formal day of international relationships, wrote to a foreign government, the Seligman Collection has the manuscript of a petition that, in 1796, our own Robert Fulton, steamboat builder, addressed to the revolutionary Government of France, calling for free trade and an end to the holding of colonies.

Checking against the past, our current thinking on such current or recurring matters of public concern as public debt and the relief of the poor, the Seligman Collection goes back to the printed originals of the reports of our own Alexander Hamilton.

To learn from original sources what the minds of the past's most eminent thinkers have thought about usury, tithes, fishing and fisheries, agriculture, colonization, navigation, science, and communism, follow the story of the Company of Scotland, which, trading to Africa and the East Indies, undertook in 1698 and 1699 to settle what now is Darien, Conn. Would you examine the economic conclusions of Adam Smith and Gerrard Winstanley and Sir James Stewart and Josiah Tucker and Malachy Postlewayt and Arthur Young, and the novelist-economists Defoe and Swift?

In the Seligman Collection there is preserved the original form—in manuscript, broadside, pamphlet, or bound first edition—in which their thoughts were set down.

Thus the Seligman collection, as it is seen by the scholar, by the seeker after truth. To others it presents other aspects.

In brief, the collection is an unusual and significant guide from the past as related to events of today and tomorrow; and for those who will shoulder the responsibility of planning our post-war economy, it well may serve as a treasure house of precedent and experience.

Commonwealth Club of California Ballot on International Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, recently members of the Truman committee were in the State of California. While there we were entertained one day at a luncheon given by the Commonwealth Club of California in San Francisco. On that occasion I met the president of the club, who is also head of the section of the club dealing with international relations. I received a letter from him this morning in which he enclosed the result of a ballot taken by that club on some 16 questions dealing with international relations, all of which are vital in connection with discussions of present conditions and the future welfare of the country. I have found this ballot to be most interesting, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the ballot was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESULTS OF COMMONWEALTH CLUB OF CALIFORNIA BALLOT ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

1. (a) Should the United States join the United Nations in giving immediate post-war food, shelter, and medical care to the people of enemy-conquered lands and to our other allies? (Yes 954, no 103.)

(b) Should the United States join the United Nations in giving immediate post-war food, shelter, and medical care to the people of Japan and Germany? (Yes 561, no 458.)

2. (a) Should the United States join the United Nations in industrial and agricultural rehabilitation of the enemy-conquered lands and those of our other allies. (Yes 883, no 168.)

(b) Should the United States join the United Nations in such rehabilitation for the people of Japan and Germany? (Yes 437, no 563.)

3. Should the United States favor making nations holding mandates responsible to the United Nations agency which shall have complete authority to regulate those mandates? (Yes 912, no 80.)

4. Should all nations have equal access to: (a) markets of all colonial possessions? (Yes 757, no 238.)

(b) Raw materials of all colonial possessions? (Yes 743, no 249.)

5. Should the United States—

(a) Increase tariff cooperation with Latin America? (Yes 950, no 93.)

(b) Increase cultural exchanges with Latin America? (Yes 1,020, no 39.)

6. Should the United States both propose and promote an international permanent economic council with a secretariat and permanent office similar to the International Labor Office? (Yes 841, no 162.)

7. Should the United States promote and participate in international conferences aiming to eliminate race prejudice? (Yes 866, no 170).

8. Should the United States in some degree limit her own sovereignty in order to contribute to world organization? (Yes 623, no 406.)

9. Should the United States participate in world machinery to prevent aggression and enforce peace:

(a) With power to indict a nation or nations as aggressors and enforce peace by use of arms if necessary? (Yes 964, no 85.)

(b) With above power plus power of recommendation in all other matters ? (Yes 775, no 204.)

10. Should the United States participate in world machinery to prevent aggression and enforce peace with full powers—

(a) To control world police? (Yes 881, no 149.)

(b) To protect rights of minorities? (Yes 818, no 185.)

(c) To declare a given act constitutes an act of aggression and determine what world police force shall be directed against it? (Yes 908, no 121.)

(d) To establish a world bank? (Yes 606, no 341.)

(e) To invalidate tariffs and trade barriers? (Yes 481, no 451)

(f) To regulate aerial transportation? (Yes 896, no 120.)

(g) To control imigration? (Yes 680, no 330.)

11. Should the United States join the Permanent Court of International Justice, otherwise known as the World Court? (Yes 973, no 70.)

12. Should the United States limit its sovereignty by participating in an international police force? (Yes 547, no 222.)

(a) Provided we ourselves do not reduce our armament until assured of the efficacy of the world police? (Yes 474, no 21.)

(b) Provided we reduce our armament along with an immediate general world disarmament? (Yes 217, no 186.)

13. Should the United States continue its membership in the International Labor Office? (Yes 826, no 137.)

14. Should the United States advocate formation of a permanent council of the United Nations? (Yes 925, no 102.)

15. Should the United States at this time seek a more definite declaration or amplification by the United Nations of the principles of the Atlantic Charter? (Yes 680, no 309.)

16. Should the United States extend liberal economic and financial aid—

(a) To China in the post-war period? (Yes 923, no 115.)

(b) To Russia in the post-war period? (Yes 562, no 442.)

(c) To Great Britain in the post-war period? (Yes 555, no 444.)

Inter-American Highway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article relating to the Inter-American Highway Co., written by Pico Cortes and published in the Naples (Ontario County, N. Y.) Record of April 19, 1944. It is in the nature of a review of an article submitted for the RECORD on April 1, 1944, by my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] and appearing on page A1706 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL GLEANINGS—NAPLES BOY SEES DREAM GO AWRY

(By Pico Cortes)

I desire to discuss, this Wednesday, a subject which should be of something more than passing interest to the good people of Naples, N. Y., remote though the matter of that subject may be. The subject is a project. It was conceived in the mind of a Naples boy, sponsored by President Harding as far back as 1921, thoroughly promoted through Latin America by the same Naples boy under the Coolidge administration, construction thereof was initiated in the administration of President Hoover, brought to a halt under the New Deal shortly before the outbreak of the Second World War, and resumed a year or so ago by the present administration which sent Army engineers into Central America for that purpose. It is the Inter-American highway, which really began in Naples, and is ending nowhere except in disgrace for the American engineer and contempt for the good-neighbor policy. I depend on Senor Don Alfaro Facio for the facts in the case. I know Senor Alfaro personally, and his family in Costa Rica as well, and they represent the highest type citizens to be found in any of the twenty Latin-American republics.

"Up to June 1942," declares Senor Alfaro, "most of the people of Costa Rica had a warm regard for the democratic principles of the good neighbor to the north, and a high respect for the legendary efficiency of the North Americanos. Since that date, when the United States Army engineers took up the task of rushing completion of the Inter-American Highway, from the Panama Canal to southern Mexico, my countrymen's faith in the good-neighbor policy has gone steadily downhill. General respect and admiration for the North Americanos, based on hearsay, has been changed by first-hand contact to bewilderment, to contempt, and in some cases to hatred."

Senor Facio ascribes this state of affairs to two reasons, both simple: first, the kind of men who were brought from the United States to work on the project; and, second, to the colossal waste which was part of every operation, every cost sheet that he saw and every report that he heard during his employment by the United States Army, for Facio is a civil engineer schooled in the United States. He says the waste of money, time, and materials is none of his business, since the Army engineers were spending North American money; he does claim, however, that the waste was so fearful that it adversely influenced Central American opinion of Americans. In this connection let me add that the Latin Americans as a whole have greatly admired the gringo in the past for his honesty in handling public moneys. For that reason they have been desirous at all times to let contracts to North Americans rather than to let them be performed by other foreigners because they trusted the gringo. Facio says he was taught that an ethical engineer does the best possible job with the least possible waste, and he protests against any operation reflecting discredit on his profession. That's a hot one to hand a New Deal Army engineer.

"Each contractor," says Facio, "was given a cost-plus contract, which would enable him to spend any amount of money on his section of the road and still make a profit." He was also given a high priority to buy any equipment he wanted to build a road through country he had never seen. Every piece of equipment was to draw a high rental from the Army (that's the American Army, my friends, which you pay to support). Naturally, the contractors bought every conceivable type of machinery, since they didn't know what they might need. The Army engineers let them go ahead without advice. Some of the contractors sent down from the States equipment that was worn out and unusable, and it laid idle drawing rentals from the American taxpayers. For example, tractors which cost $4,500 were stored for months without using, the storage charges running up to $9,700 rental each, and cost $2,000 for an overhaul, probably on account of the rainy season disintegration. In one highway division, north Panama and Costa Rica, equipment rental came to about $22,000 a week.

Twenty-odd truck and tractor drivers, electricians, mechanics—a full maintenance and operating force—arrived at San Isidor, Costa Rica, during the latter half of 1942. No equipment was sent them until the middle of May 1943. And these men hung around all that time drawing $1.55 to $1.80 an hour. Señor Facio tells the story of southern Costa Rico, one of the most difficult terrains in Central America—ravines, gulches, peaks. Inland from Golfito the contractor was trying to use a great 18-cubic-yard 6-wheel dump truck. Rental was $1,200 a month on the 40-foot monster, which could no more maneuver in that region that a horse could turn around in a filing cabinet.

There were 175 men kept in the San Jose (capital of Costa Rica) office, most of them idle or getting drunk and raising trouble around town. (And this was going on while little Nelson Rockefeller was hosing off taxpayers' money for the purpose of taking "culchaw" to the Latin-Americans in Costa Rica and elsewhere.) Facio declares the Army surveyors "followed the Public Roads (bureau of roads) line only when it pleased them. They tried to take the road over mountains when it would have been cheaper, easier, and quicker to take it around. They got little stretches of road partly finished, only to have the rains wash them away. Approximately 100 men working out of Golfita built in 1 year 5 miles of all-weather road. This road was to connect with the main highway from the United Fruit railhead, but it ends abruptly in the jungle and within a year the jungle will have repossessed it.

The Army engineers spent about $40,000,000 on the project and ran a perfectly outlandish cost per mile. Much of it will be washed away. I have before me the estimate of the Public Roads engineers, made in 1934, and contained in the Peck report transmitted by President Roosevelt to Congress March 6 of that year. It was printed as Senate document 224. The estimate for type 2 road, which they had in mind and which would do the job, constructed of local materials with an oil treatment, was $37,645,822 from Panama to the Guatemala-Mexico border. A concrete highway called for $101,361,208.

The cost is bad enough, and the waste of time. But by far the worst factor has been the changed relationship that has been created and the downright hatred of Costa Rica for the "Colossus of the North." Up to the war, Costa was our closest friend, and she was the first, the very first, to declare war against the Hun when we threw down the gauntlet. But I shall let Senor Facio tell this part of the story. Any man who has devoted his life to creating better relationships between the Latins and the Nordics sees red when he hears it:

When military necessity demands speed, it is not possible to find a diplomat to drive every tractor. Yet it would not have taken much time to impress on each man that he was being hired for work in someone else's country, and that he would do well to observe at least the fundamental customs of the land. That simple step would have speeded up the job tremendously by insuring good morale among the Costa Rican laborers, who are not unique in working better under reasonable and humane conditions than under rough treatment. Instead, most of the United States contractors for various stretches of the road hired anybody who would walk into their offices in the United States and say he was a truck or tractor driver, mechanic, welder, etc. One man hired had been a soda water jerker and never had been on a tractor in his life. He got $1.80 an hour with time and a half overtime of 30 hours a week. (Figure that one out, Mr. Naples taxpayer—$167 a week!) and food and lodging.

This type of incompetence caused bewilderment and first doubts of "yanqui" efficiency among my countrymen. But the contempt and hatred grew from the attitude of the North Americanos toward the Costa Ricans. The laborers were generally treated as a low species of animal. If an order in English was not understood, it was shouted, presumably, on the theory that any man can understand English if the speaker yells loud enough. When the yells failed, the laborer was sometimes shoved roughly toward the task. ('Spose they had tried that on a Yankee union man?) Though there were many experienced Costa Rican truck and tractor drivers out of work, the contractors on the highway would not hire them except as common labor. The reason? The good neighbors from the north refused to work with the inferior native. Though all of us had college educations and thought ourselves fully the social equal of the average United States truck driver, we were forced to eat at separate mess tables, to use different bunkhouses and washrooms. It was not uncommon for one of the truck-driving aristocracy to yell at us in the mess hall to "Stop talking that damn spic and talk English."

Well, let's drop it right there. Had the New Deal, which paid lip service to the Inter-American Highway but did little with it except to use it as a job pool for its "truck-driver aristocrisy," completed the Inter-American Highway, we would never have had that coffee famine when the submarines were making it interesting for us, and we would have been getting a lot of other critical materials up by highway. But the worst thing about it all is that news of that treatment of Costa Ricans is 'way down to Uruguay by this time, and all the Rockefellerian culture in the known world—which isn't much anyway but costs our taxpayers a horrible sum of money—will never make up for the harm done to American rapprochement. Nope, folks, we've fumbled it again. We did it after Clay's time, after Blaine's time, after Cleveland's time, and now, after Hoover's time. But I'll wager that Peck feller from Naples, N. Y., is pretty sore about all this, wherever he may be. And was Senator BUTLER right? Boy.

Travel Guide

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore granted, I am including an editorial from today's Washington Post, entitled "Travel Guide":

TRAVEL GUIDE

The new Director of Defense Transportation, Col. J. M. Johnson, seems to have adopted as his motto one segment of a celebrated Lincoln observation: "You can fool some of the people all of the time." He's quite right, of course. The trouble is he seems to think it a good idea to try. He was reported in a news story of Wednesday morning as having announced that civilians seeking to purchase train, plane, or bus tickets would be required to sign a slip with some such declaration as this: "This trip for which I am now purchasing tickets is a necessary one."

Colonel Johnson explained the purposes behind this interesting little scheme with a cynicism which makes Barnum seem naive. "Of course," he was quoted as saying, "a ticket buyer could sign anybody's name to these slips. We have no way of insuring against that, but we believe that many people will refrain from making unnecessary trips when they have this reminder that all unnecessary travel must be avoided. The plan, if adopted, should save us 10 percent on passenger travel and give us a margin to work with." Ten percent strikes us as a conservative estimate. The percentage of suckers is probably higher than this. What troubles us, however, is the O. D. T. Chief's apparent willingness to sacrifice the suckers for the benefit of the 90 percent who, he expects, will chisel their way onto trains and planes and busses regardless.

What this boils down to, as nearly as we can figure it out, is a plan to invite 9 out of 10 Americans to commit some degree of perjury, or, at any rate, to falsify their declarations through the ingenious device so thoughtfully suggested by Colonel Johnson. It would be hard to contrive a system less calculated to enhance respect for governmental authority. Under what circumstances is a trip necessary anyhow, we wonder? The criteria are elastic. No civilian, we fancy, could travel anywhere with an entirely clear conscience. Colonel Johnson had better give this brainstorm a sober second thought. He would do well to consider the precepts of his distinguished predecessor, the late Joseph B. Eastman, who knew that regulation, like government, must be by as well as for the people.

Iowa Rural Electric Cooperatives Oppose Amendment to War Utilities Order U-1-C

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, the Office of War Utilities on April 6, 1944, promulgated an amendment to its order U-1-C which so materially restricted construction of rural electrification lines by reason of the limitations therein contained that such construction will practically be stopped. The Iowa Rural Electric Cooperatives Association at a special meeting held at Des Moines, Iowa, on April 19, 1944, adopted resolutions with reference to this matter, and I am setting forth said resolutions for the information of the Members of the House, as follows:

Whereas Office of War Utilities has heretofore promulgated orders denominated U-1-C, under which the cooperatives of Iowa have completed applications for construction of electric lines and services to farms and farmsteads in this State; and

Whereas the Office of War Utilities promulgated an amendment to said order U-1-C on April 6, 1944, supplemented by administrative letter, which so materially restrict construction by reason of the limitations therein contained, that such construction will practically be stopped; and

Whereas such restrictions materially hamper and reduce the production of food, and the efficient operation of farms ready to be served; and

Whereas the Office of War Utilities based its amendment to order U-1-C, and the administrative letter, upon a shortage of transformers caused by the alleged conversion of manufacturing plants manufacturing electric transformers of capacity of 5 kilovoltamperes or less to the manufacture of radio or radar equipment for the armed forces; and

Whereas investigation reveals that such conversion has not taken place, and that such shortage does not exist; and

Whereas said transformer manufacturers have available stocks of transformers on hand and available capacity and material to manufacture same; and

Whereas many of the cooperatives in Iowa have transformers on hand and available for construction of electric lines and services, permitted by and developed under the provisions of the original U-1-C order; and

Whereas many farmers, relying upon said original order of the Office of War Utilities, have wired their premises in anticipation of receiving electric service; and

Whereas numerous applications for permission to construct extensions in excess of 5,000 feet under said original orders were forwarded to said Office of War Utilities by said cooperatives long before April 6, 1944, and should have been approved; and

Whereas the recertification by the local agricultural conservation committee required by said amendment to the U-1-C order and by the administrative letter would require excessive waste of man-hours and miles of automotive travel and waste of gasoline and tires; and

Whereas Iowa is the center of food production in the United States of America; and

Whereas the farmers of Iowa are 3 weeks behind with farm work due to weather conditions and the shortage of farm labor and farm machinery; and

Whereas electric motors and other electric equipment are reasonably available and will materially increase the efficiency of farm labor and farm production; and

Whereas the allocation of transformers by the Office of War Utilities to the Corn Belt area has been inequitable and disproportionate to the number allocated to other areas, and therefore detrimental to the war effort: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Iowa Rural Electric Cooperatives' Association, in special meeting assembled—

(a) That the War Production Board revoke the order of the Office of War Utilities of April 6, 1944, amending its order U-1-C, and withdraw the administrative letter of the same date and permit the construction of electric and service lines under the orders of the Office of War Utilities as they existed immediately prior to April 6, 1944;

(b) That the Congress of the United States, through appropriate committee or committees, investigate the matters and facts with regard to the supply of small transformers, the conversion of transformer manufacturing plants to radio or radar work for the armed forces of the United States of America, and the allocation of transformers to the various inventory control offices of the United States; and

(c) That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, and the Vice President, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to Members of Congress, to the War Food Administrator, to the Chairman of the War Production Board, and to such others as may be interested in the advancement of the war effort through the increase of food production.

Respectfully submitted.

I. E. TROTTNOW,
Chairman.
O. J. GRAU,
EDGAR D. BEACH,
GEO. A. RICE,
EARL F. WISDOM, Committee.

Morale

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Cambria Dispatch, Portage, Pa.:

MORALE

Much is heard from Washington about the morale on the home front in this war. But that which comes from Washington is not of a morale-building nature, but is more like scolding, berating, and criticism, based upon a premise that the people are not doing all they must do to fight the war. That criticism in many instances is well-founded, as there are many who experience not the heartaches, the terrible fears, the deep sorrows of war, nor even material reverses, but only the selfish satisfaction of more profit and high wages.

But on the over-all basis what do we find? It cannot conceivably be denied that morale is at a low ebb today and that is a serious situation. For this there must be a reason and that reason centers in Washington. Morale cannot be on a high plane when the people lose faith, when they become bewildered and confused. Morale of necessity goes down as objectives become blurred and seemingly blotted out. Morale suffers badly when all that is seen is lack of purpose. And those are the things that come out of Washington.

Confusion and bungling in Washington pertaining to the operation of domestic affairs has been and continues to be shameful and the people are not able to conceive that domestic and military operations can be so widely separated as to not have confusion and bungling rampant in military affairs as well, particularly since they are so closely interwoven and directed from the same sources.

An instance is the football tactics which have and which continue to be employed in handling of the most vital problem of manpower and the military draft. Who dare suggest that either of these matters have been or are being handled fairly and efficiently? Lack of coordination, refusal to adopt a workable policy, permitting first consideration to be given the political angle, governs the course, with the result that the public is confused beyond the point of tolerance. A decision today is reversed tomorrow, accompanied by a constant yapping about the possibilities of doing the things which are already being done.

Politics is the only reason for this and how can morale be high when there is a realization that politics holds first place in the conduct of a war?

Can morale be high when the people are brought to a belief that information to which they are entitled is withheld? Can they be expected to be enthusiastic about anything when they entertain a feeling that all things are done with a lack of frankness on the part of those who direct the destinies of war? Can they have confidence when they see that there is a division in understanding and widely held views of the manner of obtaining objectives among those who conduct the war?

It cannot possibly contribute to morale for the public to learn that major military decisions are overruled by politicians. And that seems to be the case in the course which was first established when this country was put to war. It is charged that the military insisted upon putting all the strength of this country against Japan at once while England and Russia would hold Germany, and having then settled the score in the Pacific, for this country then to help in bringing the conflict to a close in Europe. It was probably on this course which the military should have had good reason to expect would be followed that Admiral Nimitz based his original prediction that the war with Japan would end within a year of its beginning. But the military was overruled by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, not militarists but politicians. Mr. Churchill evidently wanted the pressure taken from his homeland and Mr. Roosevelt agreed. In the meantime what has happened? Japan has been given the cherished opportunity of building up her defenses and by reason of the long delays in Europe Germany has had the same opportunity.

It cannot be inspiring to be told in glowing terms about the great strength which the United Nations, or should it be said the United Nation has attained and that we are now on the offensive and then to witness such situations as in Italy and in India, in both cases being confronted with the same deplorable conditions which England so sadly bemoaned in the beginning when she fled from Europe and when she lost her possessions to Japan, too little and too late.

It does not contribute to hope and faith when the people are led to expect action of a telling nature and weeks and months roll by and nothing happens. It is not the way to build confidence and morale to have the Government contribute to a belief that big things were in the making in Burma upon the selection of Lord Mountbatten as the military leader in that area and that they would be enacted before the opening of the monsoon season, which will start now in a few weeks, only to find that the Japanese are the ones who make things happen by pushing into India. And morale necessarily takes another nose dive when it is seen that the situation becomes critical only a few days after the military headquarters in that area more or less minimize the operation and tell the people that the Japanese will not be able to take what they have now taken.

These things have a depressing effect upon the people. They see the possibility of the ending of the war fading away. They see little having been accomplished in the defeat of the enemies in spite of the tremendous building of arms and armies. They see the enemies being given longer and still longer time to build and to keep building their defenses. We were told that quick action and surprises will be the influencing factors and yet after the landing on the Anzio beachhead the Allies apparently took time out to permit the Germans to corral their forces and in sufficient strength to hold the line for months.

Instead of events bringing confidence, they actually bring fear to the public when Hanson Baldwin of the New York Times, considered the foremost civilian military expert in this country, asks whether or not an invasion should be undertaken without a major Army reorganization.

If these things have a depressing effect on the people of this country, they have a disastrous effect upon the peoples in Europe who believed that once the Allies would strike the force would be so great that they at last would be in a position to turn their own wrath upon Germany. This situation must cause them to fear to make a move and to wonder if their hopes have not been misplaced.

How about the morale of those boys on the fighting fronts? The one heart-burning desire among those men and boys is to get home and that's where they should be. High fervor in doing a job is not present where that is an ever-present wish—and morale is not aided when these men and boys are prompted to ask, "What are we fighting for?"

Washington would do well to take an accounting of itself and to give an honest and fair accounting to the people.

Governmental Red Tape

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, there is so much duplication of effort, so many overlapping bureaus, so many conflicting reports, and so many contradictory orders issued by innumerable New Deal agencies that the American public is bewildered. The farmer, the businessman, the factory worker, the miner, in fact, nearly every citizen, whether old or young, whether employer or employee, is lost today in a fog of confusion caused by governmental red tape. Nothing is more illustrative of this assertion than the sorrowful plight in which the American farmer finds himself at this critical time.

Under leave heretofore granted to extend my remarks and to corroborate what I have just said, I include a copy of a letter addressed to the President of the United States by Mr. R. W. Brown, president of the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation, along with a statement on food supply by the executive committee of the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation. These communications contain undeniable truths and it would be well if the War Manpower Commission, the Selective Service Administration, the Department of Agriculture, and the War Food Administration would get their heads together and decide on some clear-cut, definite policy which would remove the uncertainty that now hangs like a pall over the heads of our citizens and that would bring some semblance of order out of the present tragic chaos:

APRIL 24, 1944.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The enclosed statement adopted last week by the executive committee of the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation is respectfully submitted for your consideration.

The statement was prompted by news stories appearing in the country press which seem to have the official sanction of Selective Service. From one of these releases the following is quoted:

"All men who are between the ages of 18 and 26 must be inducted into the armed forces to meet the critical need for younger men. This includes those men who are now in deferred classifications, either farming or industry. * * * At this time and for the immediate future the country is amply supplied with both food and munitions and the men of the above-mentioned age will be of more good to their country in the service than in the factory or on the farm. The local board states that men within the ages of 18 to 26 will be immediately reclassified and will in all probability be inducted into the armed services within the next 60 days."

The appearance of such releases at this time is causing much confusion, as the young men now holding agricultural deferments have already started with their farming operations for this year. Reports coming to this office indicate that many of them are now planning to sell their livestock and equipment. That is the only adjustment they can make under the circumstances.

The enclosed statement is not to be construed as a remonstrance against the induction of young men into the Army. If farmers had been told last fall or winter that food supplies were ample and that the Army would need all young men in the age group involved, the present confusion would have been avoided.

Yours very respectfully,
MISSOURI FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
R. W. BROWN, President.

STATEMENT ON FOOD SUPPLY BY THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, MISSOURI FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

We protest the confusing and conflicting statements on the food situation which emanate from various governmental agencies in Washington. In order that farm people may be in position to make their most effective contribution to the war effort we ask for a clear-cut, authoritative statement of policy on food production and manpower.

The current optimism on the food situation, fostered by statements emanating from Washington and Selective Service, are unwarranted by the facts in the case. The facts are that reserves of feed determine next year's food supplies.

Calculations based on livestock and slaughter figures released by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics indicate that for the first 8 months of 1944 we may expect larger meat supplies than for the corresponding period of 1943. That, however, is due to the fact that the feed situation is forcing liquidation of flocks and herds. After this liquidation is accomplished there will be drastic curtailment of meat, dairy, and poultry products.

Already serious feed shortages have developed locally, forcing liquidation which will become Nation-wide. On the basis of livestock and feed now available and in prospect, there will be enough feed for 11½ months, with no feed reserves whatever.

The above statements assume that we have a normal crop year and sufficient manpower and machinery to operate farms according to the farm plan sign-up of the triple A—which is a goal, with no guaranty that it can be reached. Drought, flood, unfavorable planting or harvesting weather, disease or insect damage, lack of sufficient manpower and machinery, can readily cut food supplies to the point of disaster.

As one instance, we may point to the fact that unseasonable weather has already cut oat acreage in Missouri 40 percent. Any one of half a dozen factors can have the same effect on other crops and on livestock production.

Statements from Washington to the effect that we are "well equipped with food and munitions" and that food supplies are ample, are misleading and confusing. They have revealed in misinterpretations by local draft boards that are having serious effects on the production program.

Farmers do not want deferment at the expense of the war effort, but it is, to say the least, inconsistent and confusing to have the War Food Administration calling for even greater exertion in food production than last year when farmers did their utmost to meet the quotas asked for, while on the other hand another agency of Government says "food supplies are ample."

Like all other good citizens, farmers want to do their full share toward the winning of the war. To do so they need to know the plain facts in the case, and they should be given in clear and straightforward manner from an authoritative source.

Mr. Dewey on Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER E. MERROW

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of April 28, 1944:

MR. DEWEY ON FOREIGN POLICY

Governor Dewey's address last night before the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association will give new and strong encouragement to all those who hope that on the great issues of the war and the peace there will be an essential unity of American opinion. We stand now at the very climax of the most fateful struggle in our history, with our armies poised for their invasion of the fortress of an evil and still powerful enemy. In this moment Nazi Germany looks searchingly at us to discover whether there is any evidence of division in our ranks, any half-heartedness in our purpose, any disposition on the part of the party of opposition to dissociate itself from the objectives of a complete and crushing victory and a peace with enough force behind it to put an end to international aggression. There will be no comfort for our enemies, and there will be reassurance for our allies, in the speech made last night by the most likely leader of that opposition in this year's national election. It affirms both the complete and crushing victory and the organization of peace backed by adequate force as purposes on which there is overwhelming agreement on the part of all groups and all sections of the American people.

Mr. Dewey spoke last night as a man who is eager to hurry his party into a position of leadership on international issues—so eager, in fact, that in some respects he claimed too much. Describing the development in this country of sentiment for prompt measures to establish a system of general international cooperation, he said: "First came the Republican Mackinac charter, then the Moscow Declaration and the Fulbright and Connally resolutions." But this account omits much history, the remembrance of which is critically important if we are not to make the same mistakes a second time.

First, and long before the Republican Mackinac meeting, came repeal of the arms embargo, without which there would be no hope today of any kind of international cooperation whatever, for our present allies would long since have been overwhelmed and conquered. Second, after the crucial but negative act of repeal of the arms embargo, came lend-lease, the great affirmative act by which the resources of this Nation, still technically at peace, were put at the disposal of those countries which were fighting for their freedom—and our own. Third came the Atlantic Charter, in which the broad purposes of the anti-Axis Powers were for the first time stated officially by the heads of government of the two great English-speaking nations. Fourth came the act of January 2, 1942, by which 26 countries bound themselves together formally in their war aims and their peace aims with the declaration of United Nations. And fifth came the many conferences, all the way from Washington to Ottawa and Casablanca, by means of which the members of this grand alliance experimented, with increasing success, in the most fundamental of all types of international cooperation, namely, the way to win a common war and to survive as independent nations. Mackinac came later in the day than Governor Dewey puts it.

But that it came, that it ranged the Republican Party on the side of international cooperation as against isolation, and that Mr. Dewey showed himself prepared last night to lead his party farther and faster along the path which it has chosen are all present facts which are reassuring and important.

A newspaper which continued throughout the whole cynical period of the twenties and the thirties to believe in the imperative necessity of international cooperation must find itself wholeheartedly in agreement with all of the major conclusions and purposes which Mr. Dewey described last night; that "the experience of two world wars has taught us that we cannot remain unaffected by what happens elsewhere in the world"; that "unprovoked aggression against a freedom-loving people anywhere is an attack upon the peace of the whole world"; that in the light of what has happened, we now know that "Germany and Japan must not only be utterly defeated and completely disarmed—they must not be left in a post-war environment which might enable them to maneuver as a balance of power"; that this time the "lethargy, jealousy, and power politics" which dashed the hopes of a lasting peace in the years after 1918 must not be permitted again to waste a costly victory when it is won; that the immense problems of the first days following the end of the present fighting will require, above all else, "solid relations among the United States and Great Britain, Soviet Russia, and China"; that on the basis of this indispensable cooperation must be built a more enduring "structure of peace backed by adequate force to prevent future wars" and a continuing effort "to establish and maintain in our relations with other nations conditions calculated to promote world-wide economic stability not only for the sake of the world but also to the end that our own people may enjoy a high level of employment in an increasingly prosperous world."

This is a good speech, made at a good moment.

Mr. Clark and the O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. KERR

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Food Field Reporter of April 3, 1944:

MR. CLARK AND THE O. P. A.

It is not difficult to think up some profound reasons why the emergency price control act should be extended "substantially without change" as Administrator Chester Bowles has recommended. In fact, we had intended to spread some of them on this page until we came across this letter written to the Tarboro (N. C.) Daily Southerner by Sam Clark, of W. S. Clark & Sons, retail grocers, which tells the story as well as anything we have seen. Mr. Clark has gotten the idea much better than some of his food trade confreres who are trying to think up slick schemes to sabotage O. P. A. while outwardly professing their love for price control. From here on the language is Sam Clark's:

"We are writing to express our approval of the O. P. A. in their effort to hold down prices. For some of us who were doing business in the last war, we can easily recall when sugar sold for 40 cents a pound and flour for approximately $20 a barrel. Soon after the war nearly every merchant not only lost the profit he made but many of them were put out of business.

POLICE WAS NEEDED

"The consumer, though he feels that rationing of merchandise is hard, will recall standing in line and often doing without merchandise. When we received a shipment of sugar, during the last war, we had to ask police protection in distributing it.

"Of course, it is not easy on the merchant to handle ration points, as it has put a good deal more work on each merchant. However, this in no way equals the sacrifice that our men and women are making in service. We are sure that every patriotic merchant is doing his utmost to comply with the O. P. A. rulings, and appreciate the cooperation and consideration that the O. P. A. board has given his problems."

Get the City Back on the Air Map

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH M. PRATT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 27, 1944

Mr. JOSEPH M. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer, Philadelphia, Pa., April 21, 1944:

For nearly 4 months Philadelphia, third largest city in the United States, vast arsenal of America at war, has been deprived of commercial air service.

It is grounded; off the Nation's air map; not even a whistle stop on the transport lines. A great war production area, perhaps without an equal in the world, is without a working airport.

Here is an absurd and an outrageous situation. It is one that no city in the country would take lying down.

There is no reason for Philadelphia to take it lying down.

What is back of the persistent delay in restoring to this city its indispensable access to commercial air routes?

Is political discrimination against our Republican city administration to blame? Or is it "brass hat" fear in the War Department of losing face by the rescindment of orders that should not have been issued in the first place? Or is it just monumental stupidity, inefficiency, and neglect?

Whatever it is, it can be tolerated no longer.

No reasonable person, surely, could find any justice in the treatment accorded Philadelphia in this matter. The closing order at the municipal airport shortly before Christmas came without advance notice, giving the city no chance to get a substitute field in shape.

It was believed at first that the unfinished northeast airport might be put to use. But the Government, after long-drawn-out dickering, refused to put up any money to complete it.

Philadelphia then found itself faced by these alternatives. Either it must finish the work at the northeast field, with funds put up by itself or by the Government through special congressional appropriation, or it must prevail upon the Government to restore the municipal airport to limited use. Because it would take many weeks to make the substitute field usable, and because the airport in southwest Philadelphia could be placed in service at once, the second course was naturally preferred.

The various Washington agencies concerned have, from time to time, held out some hope that the closing order might be eased. But the weeks speed by, fresh obstacles and objections are encountered, new surveys and conferences are considered necessary—and Philadelphia is still off the air map.

It is difficult to picture New York or Chicago receiving this raw deal or enduring it for long. We can picture Mayor LaGuardia or Mayor Kelly lifting their telephones, bellowing indignant orders into compliant ears at Washington and getting immediate results.

Philadelphia's Mayor Samuel has unceasingly sought favorable action from Government agencies, but whether or not Republican pleas always encounter deaf ears, his efforts have not met with success.

Victim of discrimination or bonehead bungling, Philadelphia suffers today from a grave injustice.

The ban on the municipal airport should be lifted at once, or definite announcement made that such a step is not now possible, permitting the city to concentrate on substitute facilities.

The present disgraceful state of affairs cannot be endured any longer.

Report on the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily News of April 24, 1944:

REPORT ON THE NAVY

In a report that reveals many heretofore suppressed details of our naval warfare to date, Admiral Ernest J. King, Commander in Chief United States Fleet, and Chief of Naval Operations, stresses one point that will be the key to our eventual victory:

"Our Army and Navy forces have learned how to fight as one team."

In a war that is being fought in almost all parts of the world except within our own borders, no Army campaign would be possible without naval cooperation. In early stages of the war teamwork was untried, and many mistakes were made. But Admiral King can now say:

"Through experience, we have mastered and improved the technique of amphibious operations, in which the Japanese were so proficient in the early days of the war." Furthermore, he is now able to say, "We have learned how to make the most of what we have, but it is no longer necessary to ask our commanders to get along as best they can on inadequate means."

While pointing out that "the encirclement of Germany is in sight," he warns that "Japan will not be directly under attack as Germany is now until the citadel area of that empire island and continental, is under our threat or control."

The Japanese have been driven back from their posts of maximum advance in the Pacific, yet "important as our advances toward Japan are, they do not fully represent the improvement in our position. Japanese capacity to maintain the war at sea and in her advanced areas has suffered increasingly, due to the loss of vital shipping."

At the same time, "the German submarine fleet has been reduced from a menace to a problem."

It is encouraging that we can beat the Axis at its own game in so many directions—that we can defeat the Japanese with submarines in the Pacific while defeating German submarines in the Atlantic; that we can learn amphibious operations from the Japs and so improve on their methods as to wrest from them their gains; that we have not only caught up with the many years of Axis preparation for war, but actually are exceeding them in almost every weapon of war.

And when we get too complacent about these things, we can reflect on how long we have been before Cassino and how far we still are from Tokyo.

Just 150 years ago today, Admiral King points out, Congress passed our first Navy bill, providing for those famous frigates—Constitution, United States, President, Chesapeake, Constellation, and Congress. Those ships made naval history, but we have come a long way since then. We have had "more warships and auxiliaries on the ways than had ever been under construction anywhere in the world at any one time." We have increased naval personnel from 325,095 when we entered the war to 2,252,606.

Victory may be a long while away. But we have the tools and the teamwork.

Address of Hon. Olin D. Johnston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Gov. Olin D. Johnston at B'rith Shalom Synagogue, Charleston, S. C., March 31, 1944:

Mr. Chairman and friends, we have met here tonight on a solemn occasion. It is an occasion that calls for thought and action. While the Jewish people of the United States are dwelling in security in this our beloved land of plenty, because of our democratic institutions and just laws, yet in other parts of the world, the Jewish people are victims of bigotry and persecution.

During this great conflict which is now raging throughout the civilized world, no people have undergone more suffering and made more sacrifices than have the people of Jewish descent.

Some years ago the civilized nations sought a solution of the Jewish problem by a resettlement of the Hebrews in ancient Palestine. It was the hope of these persecuted people to re-create its ancient homeland into a haven of refuge where they could live together, maintain their civilization, and solve their problems. But today this hope is fastly fading. Palestine, which seemed a harbor of safety for these persecuted people, is tonight threatened with a closed door.

The rights which were guaranteed to the Jewish people in regards to Palestine have been whittled down on the ground of political or military expediency. The white paper of May 1939 nullifies the last hope of millions of homeless Jews.

The Jewish people have marched in the ranks of all the armies of the Allied Nations. They have fought side by side with the forces of decency and righteousness. Through the Balfour Declaration in 1917 and the League of Nations and the unanimous approval of Congress of the United States in 1922, they were solemnly promised this land of Palestine where they could settle and maintain a Jewish commonwealth. But Mr. Chamberlain, in 1939, following his policy of appeasement, issued a white paper which denied the Jewish people complete admission of settlement in Palestine. At that time, Mr. Winston Churchill, in the House of Commons, called this paper a breach and a repudiation of the Balfour Declaration.

We have met here tonight for the purpose of demanding that the gates of Palestine be opened to Jewish immigration and that the Jewish agency of Palestine be recognized as the authorized representative of the Jewish people. If given this opportunity, the Jewish people would develop to a maximum the agricultural and industrial possibilities and the natural resources of Palestine.

I understand that the Jewish people have pledged themselves to the highest regard for the preservation of the religious and cultural rights of the Arab population of Palestine, and to the civil and religious equality of all of its inhabitants before the law. They have affirmed their readiness and desire for full cooperation with their Arab neighbors in Palestine.

After the war hundreds of thousands of destitute European Jews, who have been victims of the Nazi war on civilization, will desperately need a place in which to begin a new life. Their native lands of Germany, Poland, Rumania, and Hungary will seethe with hatred for them and will render the prospect of a happy future almost impossible.

Palestine, the ancient and never forgotten land of the Jewish people, offers a haven for the misery stricken, persecuted refugee. Over half a million Jews have settled and prospered in Palestine during the past 25 years. The country can shelter and give life to millions more. American experts claim that Palestine can absorb from two to four million additional settlers and this can be done without depriving a single Arab of his job or his land.

Great Britain, the United States, and the League of Nations have recognized Palestine as the national homeland of the Jewish people. During the present war for world freedom, even the Jews of Palestine are volunteers for the armed forces. They are working in war industries behind the lines; they have declared themselves on the side of the Allies.

This white paper which I have been speaking of and issued by Mr. Chamberlain in 1939, forbids any Jew to settle in Palestine once the present quota of 31,000 immigrants is filled.

It limits Jewish land purchase to a tiny area—a discrimination unparalleled in any democratic country. If allowed to stand, this white paper will freeze Palestinian Jewry into a permanent minority. It will mean the death warrant to the one major hope for a renewed and normal life—a hope which now sustains thousands of homeless and hounded Jews. It will inflict upon the post-war world a bitter, cancerous, and insoluble Jewish problem. It will flout the claims of justice, the demands of reason, and every appeal of the human heart.

I can understand many things that have occurred in the course of this war, but there is no explanation of why the Jews should not be allowed to return to their homeland to rehabilitate themselves and to preserve their religious and historic traditions. I want to say right at this time that the world is conscious of contributions that the Jews have made to world civilization. They have preserved the religious ideal of the one true God. They have made contributions in the fields of art, science, and literature. It is nothing but just that they should be afforded a homeland and a flag under which they might march forward to great heights of achievement.

I understand that in Palestine you have turned over your entire hospital of the Hadassah and all of its facilities to the use of the United Nations in this great war. When I heard of this I remembered that it was the Jewish race that long generations ago codified the first health laws and started a movement which has led today to our modern health program and hospitalization.

Throughout the world the Jews have undergone persecution, but they have borne it with fortitude and faith in a just God. Surely the day will come soon when the persecutors and aggressors shall be destroyed and the Jewish race shall again be free in every land to carry further their many contributions that have been worth while to human society.

Today my heart goes out to all your persecuted brothers and sisters in all the lands of Europe and Asia. To say that I despise this man Hitler is also to say that I despise the persecution that he has made against the Jewish people, and I long for the day when all of his kind shall receive their just deserts at the hands of the victorious Allied Nations and the just retributions of a just God.

Palestine has always been looked upon as the land of the Hebrews. It was there that Jacob found water to feed his flocks; it was there that Moses received the commandments of God; it was there that David wrote his Psalms; it was there that Solomon built God's Temple; and I am looking forward to the day when the Jewish homeland shall again be Palestine and when the Jews will have an opportunity of having their own nation and their own flag.

Today I am looking forward to the era of peace and when that day comes I feel that the Jewish people will make their contribution in solving the problems of tomorrow and of making this a lasting peace.

I look forward to the great day which your prophet Isaiah spoke about, saying: "And He shall judge among the nations and rebuke many people and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

I know that your aim in this hour of war is to win victory; I know that you will do your part, and that in every phase of war effort you will find the Jewish people from firing line to factory on guard against the evils of the human race.

I hope that soon victory will come and that you will have the opportunity of finding homes for these refugees, that Palestine shall be returned to the Jews, and that the world will once more be freed of the monsters of oppression.

There should not and there must not be any deadline against Jewish immigration to Palestine.

Importance of the Infantry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by Brig. Gen. William H. Wilbur at the annual meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, held at the Statler Hotel on Saturday evening, April 22, 1944. The address was the finest tribute to our infantry soldiers to which I have ever had the pleasure of listening.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As the war progresses I am greatly impressed by the marvelous job that American industry has done. Certainly its achievements have never been equaled in history. But, let us make no mistake, essential as it is, production cannot win a war. It is true that lack of production can lose a war, but production cannot win one. I wish that it could.

The products of industry are used by fighting soldiers. The period when they are used on the battlefield is the critical, decisive, phase of war. Sometimes our soldiers smash that equipment. More times the enemy does.

I remember working my way to a vantage point on the front line—within sight of the famous monastery above Cassino. I saw what appeared to be an empty foxhole; for as I got close to it I noticed a Garand rifle, thoroughly chewed by shell fragments. The wooden stock was in slivers—the mechanism worthless. To my surprise a soldier stuck his head from the hole. I asked him if that was his rifle. "Yes, it is," he said, and reached over and placed his hand on the wreckage. "It is pretty well smashed," he said, "I should have taken better care of it. It was that shell that just lit here a minute ago. I was just able to duck myself." Then he brightened up a bit. "But," he said, "I've still got six hand grenades."

Equipment of all kinds is used up, smashed, and worn out—from Garand rifles to the most complicated machines of war. Industry must continue to feed in its products, in great quantity, and of the highest quality.

I wish that every American would see just what our men have gone through, and are going through in Italy. For the fighting soldier at Anzio and Cassino it means day after day of struggle; struggle against rain, sleet, and ice—struggle against fatigue, heavy sodden overempowering fatigue—yet his job requires him to go up another 1,000 feet, struggle against the stupefying blow that strikes when one of his comrades is killed.

I wish every American could have been with me when I have asked one of these men, "How are you getting along?" Covered with mud, bleary-eyed from lack of rest, the infantry soldiers have looked up, squared their jaws, and without exception have replied, "Fine, sir." They were not fine. They knew that I knew they were anything but fine. But they would not admit anything else.

All Americans can be deeply proud of them.

You will be interested to know of the joy and appreciation of the Italian people when liberated from the German yoke.

Typical of every town is the situation which we found when we went into the ruins of the village of San Pietro. Out of their caves and cellars came the pitiful villagers, dirty, fearful, dressed in worn or tattered clothing—a sorry sight.

An old man rushed up to me, threw his arms around me, and before I could get my guard up, kissed me. Others crowded around expressing their joy and appreciation to the Americans.

TOWN LOOTED BY NAZIS

I gave a gaunt old man a 5-cent package of Lifesavers. "Molto grazia, molto grazia," he said, and then dove back into his shelter and shortly came up with a bag of dried figs. With real graciousness he tried to get me to accept some of them, although I am sure that he badly needed every one of them.

These pitiful villagers told us that the Germans had systematically looted the town before leaving, that they had taken not only the grain and other food but had collected all woolen clothing, women's as well as men's, for dispatch to Germany. Being slaves of Germany is hard.

Just as we were about to leave the village we encountered an Italian who spoke some English. I asked him how it happened that he spoke English. "Me, me live in Boston for 14 year. Oh! If me only there now."

Remembering the safety and comfort of our homes in America, we went on with a better understanding of just what we are fighting for in this war.

Contact with home is most important. The soldiers crave letters—they thirst for information of the little things that are going on at home. Anything that typifies your world means a lot to them. Red Cross girls handing out doughnuts are a breath of America. It is interesting to watch the reaction of the soldiers as they receive their doughnuts—each one handed out with a smile. Some, of course, make wisecracks. Others stand with open mouths—happy just to get a look at a fine American girl.

Blood plasma and its miraculous action is another strong tie to the people at home.

The combat soldier has great difficulty in understanding statements indicating that the war will be over very soon. He cannot understand any letdown of effort. Every day he sees his comrades wounded and killed. He sees no weakening on the part of the enemy in front of him. I have talked to a considerable number of German prisoners recently. They were mostly German infantry soldiers. They are solid in their belief that Germany will win the war. It is striking, and very disconcerting, too, to hear them say, with calm conviction, "Germany will win because we will never quit." Their faith in the final outcome appears to be absolutely unshaken.

The attitude of those German prisoners explains, in part, why bombs and artillery fire cannot do the decisive part of the job of winning this war.

We had hoped that airplanes, tanks, artillery, and machines could carry the major part of the load of battle. We had hoped that in this war infantry could be charged with a minor role. It does not appear to be so. The infantry soldier still carries almost the entire load. On those fronts such as in Italy, where all elements of our fighting forces are in daily action against the enemy, this is most apparent. There, for each individual private soldier of the artillery, air corps, engineers, or other arms that is killed, there are 30, 50, even 100 privates of Infantry who make the supreme sacrifice for their country.

Tanks, airplanes, rocket guns, and mines, in the hands of the enemy, have all combined to make the task of the infantryman a heavier one than in any war of the past. Our infantry realizes this. We, too, must realize that this war can be won when, and only when, the German infantry is defeated. The struggle of infantry against infantry, the physical domination of every German by a superior, free soldier, must be accomplished. In this struggle the human element is the vital one.

This is a war of survival.

In such a war every citizen should feel that he exists to help those men who are fighting the battle. Every worker, every factory, the War Department from top to bottom, every military agency between here and the battle front exists to help the combat soldier do his tough job.

Wars are won by fighting men, individuals who have the courage to overcome danger, the stamina to withstand hardships of the toughest kind, the individual will to keep going forward, regardless of murderous hostile fire, regardless of overpowering, sodden fatigue, regardless of the fact that their comrades have been killed and wounded.

Those are the men who protect our freedoms.

Dewey's Address to Publishers on United States Role After the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, at the dinner of the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, N. Y.:

I am very happy to speak before this wartime gathering of American newspaper publishers. Yours is an essential industry, because in America the press is a vital part of our war effort; it is a vital part of our whole free system; it is an indispensable element of everything for which we fight.

The tragic history of recent years has shown us vividly that freedom of the press cannot exist where there is no political freedom; but the corollary to this basic truth is perhaps even more important—political freedom cannot exist without a free press.

An electorate fully informed on issues is as fundamental to representative government as the election itself. And full information through the press is the bulwark of the people's power to check up on their representatives between elections.

We saw it demonstrated in Germany that tyranny can rise to power by the elective process. But in order to stay in power the Nazis immediately set about destroying the freedom of the German press. In all countries men have been elected to office who proved unworthy of the trust. The strength of a free system is that such mistakes need never be fatal. They can be corrected at the polls. But these corrections can be made only if the people are informed.

GUARANTY PROTECTS PEOPLE

The precious guaranty in our Constitution of freedom of the press is not a mere guaranty to the press. It is a guaranty to the people that their press shall be free. It imposes an obligation on Government to permit free dissemination of news and a duty on the press to print honest news. The right resides in the people because it is basic to their liberties.

Freedom of the press today means more than freedom to print what information can be obtained. It means access to the news. It involves the right of information and a corresponding duty to print it.

All of us recognize the need for military censorship. But there is a dividing line between military news and political news, or, if you will, diplomatic news. It is a dividing line which can never be left without scrutiny, which throughout the war calls for vigilance. Once the fighting has ceased we must insist that all censorship of every description cease with it. We shall need then the uncorrupted word of truth.

I am confident of our future because we have, in fact, a great, free press. I believe our publishers generally are today more conscious of their tremendous responsibility than ever before. They will have much to do with the steadfastness with which we fight through this war. They will have much to do with the intelligence and determination with which we face the even more complicated problems of the peace.

The power of the written word lies in shaping the mind and spirit of man toward high achievement. There is, of course, a wide gulf between a statement of fact or of principles, on the one hand, and epithets or empty promises on the other. In recent years we have had good reason to learn that difference in our domestic affairs. It is not enough to talk about a more abundant life if the actions that follow the words leaves millions unemployed and dependent upon Government for a bare existence. It is not enough to talk about economic security and then pursue policies which promote insecurity. It is not enough to talk about the enterprise system and then pursue a course of action that stifles enterprise.

CONCERN OVER FOREIGN POLICY

These experiences with domestic policies cannot be forgotten when we think of foreign policies. All of us are aware that there is great concern and uncertainty among our people of our Nation's foreign policy. Yet I think it is no more than fair to say that we have had some excellent expressions on that subject lately from the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull. In his address of April 9 Mr. Hull certainly offered a statement of basic principles which deserves respect. His pledge to seek the advice and help of Members of Congress from both parties is especially welcome. Nevertheless, these statements have done little to relieve the concern and uncertainty our people feel. That is not primarily because of dissatisfaction with the words Mr. Hull has used. It is because we see reported daily in your papers developments from abroad and other statements from high Government officials at home which do not seem to fit in altogether with the words Mr. Hull has used. It is because we cannot be sure to what extent our foreign policy is actually being handled by the Secretary of State and to what extent it is being handled privately by the President.

What troubles us is not the main objectives of our foreign policy, but whether that policy will be effectively carried out in accordance with constitutional methods. One way it will succeed. The other way it will surely fail. Foreign policy is not a mere matter of negotiations, of diplomatic maneuvering, or even of treaties and alliances. Foreign policy is the expression of the ideals, traditions, and aspirations of a people in their relations with the people of other countries.

In a free republic there can be no such thing as an administration having an effective foreign policy unless that policy reflects the will of the people. Here we are fighting, hoping, praying for a world in which we can have a lasting peace, but in almost every discussion one simple fact is forgotten. No foreign policy that fails to represent the will of the people will ever last as long as 2 years. It will not last beyond the next congressional election.

AGREEMENT ON OBJECTIVES

Among our people there are differences of opinion with respect to details and methods; but, I insist, there is overwhelming agreement upon the main objectives. Those major objectives are:

To carry on the war to total crushing victory, and in so doing drive home to the aggressor nations a lesson that will never be forgotten;

To organize in cooperation with other nations a structure of peace backed by adequate force to prevent future wars;

To establish and maintain in our relations with other nations conditions calculated to promote world-wide economic stability not only for the sake of the world, but also to the end that our own people may enjoy a high level of employment in an increasingly prosperous world.

There is, I am confident, no real dissent from those major objectives on the part of any substantial portion of our people. They have been proclaimed by men of all parties and subscribed to by men of all walks of life in all parts of our country. They constitute the fundamental principles of our foreign policy because they represent the will of our people. But once again let it be said that these objectives cannot be attained by mere words.

As to the winning of the war the point needs no argument. We shall win the war only by the work and sacrifice of all our people. We shall win it by the courage, strength, and suffering of our fighting men and by the unremitting effort of our war-production forces at home. To win the peace will require equally great determination, and over a longer period of time. It will not be sufficient when the fighting ceases merely to draw up a treaty and then forget about it. We must not repeat the tragic error of 25 years ago.

The central error of our course in 1919 was the false assumption that words could create peace. Then, as now, there was much wishful thinking. Men everywhere wanted to feel that a treaty which proclaimed peace would suffice to assure it and that from there on they could relax. The war leaders of the world wanted to feel that by signing their names to a treaty they had brought their task to an end. The very idea that fine words made a peace bore within it the seeds of its own failure.

Within a few years the reality of Germany bore no relation whatever to the word picture of Versailles. This was because those who drafted the treaty were tired war leaders. They could not find within themselves the physical and mental strength to make the peace a living reality.

We have learned much since 1919. The experience of two world wars has taught us that we cannot remain unaffected by what happens elsewhere in the world. It has shown us that unprovoked aggression against a freedom-loving people anywhere is an attack upon the peace of the whole world. We may again be tempted to feel that, with the defeat of our enemies and a proclamation of peace, we can afford to rest on our oars. But the truth is, those years that follow will be decisive. The maintenance of peace will require continuing labor and forbearance. When we have ceased to wage war we shall have to wage peace.

POST-WAR UNITY NEEDED

Germany and Japan must not only be utterly defeated and completely disarmed—they must not be left in a post-war environment which might enable them to maneuver as a balance of power. After 1919 lethargy, jealousy, and power politics resumed sway among the Allies. In that environment Germany quickly eluded the controls of the Treaty of Versailles. If after this war we reproduce that same political climate, we will get the same results. No initial measures against Germany and Japan, however drastic, will have permanent value unless they fall within the setting of a durable cohesion between Great Britain and ourselves together, I hope, with Russia and China. To deal effectively with our enemies and also to solve many other post-war problems will, as I have said, require solid relations among the United States and Great Britain, Soviet Russia, and China.

We have a long background of friendly working relations with Great Britain and China, which will make easy their continuation. As regards Russia, it would be stupid to ignore the fact that during the 24 years between the Soviet revolution and the German attack on Russia our relations were not of the best. There were faults on both sides. If after this war we relapse into the old suspicions, the future is indeed dark. But there has been genuine improvement growing out of our partnership in this war. The American people have sympathy and admiration for the peoples of the Soviet Union.

UNITED STATES CAN WORK WITH RUSSIA

There are and will be fundamental internal differences between our countries. Our economic and social systems will not be the same. But our political dissimilarities from Russia need not be the source of friction if we seek and find the many practical ways in which we can work to a common end.

Russian affairs are in the hands of hard-headed, realistic leaders. That is nothing we should be afraid of, provided we are equally realistic and devoted to our country. If we are, the United States and Russia can deal with each other with candor, while building firm mutual respect and friendship.

Inevitably a major responsibility to work together will fall upon the United States, Britain, Russia, and China in the first few years following the war. They will be the strongest nations. They will be the nations with the greatest power to preserve peace or to undermine it.

In some countries we may for a time face confusion. We must wisely, and without intrusion into their domestic affairs, seek to make that period as brief as possible. We shall need the participation of these nations. The peace of the world will require the support of all peoples. We are all agreed that there must be prompt measures to establish a system of general international cooperation. First came the Republican Mackinac charter, then the Moscow Declaration, and the Fulbright and Connally resolutions. All agree in proposing an arrangement which will regularly bring together the representatives of the nations to discuss, to plan, and to seek agreement about matters of common concern. This will not be accomplished to perfection overnight, or in a few months. It must be a matter of growth and experience and everlasting hard work.

It will not be possible to solve immediately the economic problems of the world. It will take time and patience to restore currency stability and trade relationships and to promote the general economic well-being.

AMERICAN ROLE DECISIVE

Here it cannot be too greatly emphasized that the role of the United States will be decisive. We will be truly effective in helping with the economic rehabilitation of the world only if we first restore at home a healthy, a vigorous, and a growing economy.

There are false prophets who for years have been telling us that America has ceased to grow; that its period of vigor is over. They would have us believe that our economy has become mature. They say it is static, that it can continue to function only by constantly taking ever more expensive patent medicines. Yet these same people now talk glibly of a W. P. A. for all the rest of the world.

To hear them talk, Uncle Sam must play the role of a benevolent but slightly senile gentleman, who seeks to purchase the good will of his poor relations by distributing among them the dwindling remains of his youthful earnings.

I utterly reject that proposition, America is still young, still vigorous, still capable of growth. Certainly we shall play the part of a good citizen in the community of nations. We shall deal fairly and generously with our neighbor nations throughout the world. This we shall do because it represents the practical idealism for which America has always stood and because it is good, hard common sense. Good will cannot be bought with gold. Good will flows irresistibly to the man who successfully manages his own affairs, who is self-reliant and independent, yet who is considerate always of the rights and needs of others.

Traditionally, America has occupied this role for 150 years. This country won the admiration of the world because we had here something to which the people of all nations aspired. We had a society of free men who believed in themselves and in the future of their country. We were in sober truth the land of opportunity. Here beyond everywhere else in the world there was a field of economic enterprise and human progress.

For the sake of the men and women who are working and fighting and dying to win this war, for the sake of their children, and for the sake of the world we must work to make America once more the land of opportunity.

It is particularly incumbent on us solemnly to view our obligations tonight. As we meet here, hundreds of thousands of the youth of America stand poised on the shores of Great Britain for the mightiest invasion of a defended coast line in history. Everyone of those young men knows that the future of his country and of freedom itself may hang on the success of this terrible venture. Every man knows the price he may have to pay.

Nothing any of us has said here tonight will be of import unless the invasion is crowned by ultimate success. The infinite patience, preparation, and training behind this gigantic effort may well serve us as a standard for our own acceptance of our future responsibilities. Surely it is a minimum standard for the infinite patience, preparation, and toil we should be willing to give for peace. No sacrifice for peace will ever equal the ultimate sacrifice we expect of our young men in war.

The very least we can do, therefore, as we look ahead tonight to hopes of a peaceful world, is to pledge to ourselves and to those who die for our country that we shall accept the challenge they lay before us. We can resolve to accept the responsibility which our own greatness and importance as a Nation place upon us—a responsibility which two World Wars have shown is utterly inescapable.

Let us recognize that this peace we pray for and our young men die for will have to be worked for over many years. Let us be flexible, earnest and devoted enough to make it a reality.

If the newspapers of America will accept the challenge of peace as they have of war, we shall have made a great beginning. The years of labor ahead will be successful only if an informed people support the effort—only if they know the size of the task. We shall need in these years, as never before, a courageous and a free press in the United States of America.

Termination of War Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Henry E. Bodman, counsel for Automotive Council for War Production, delivered before Academy of Political Science, semiannual meeting, New York City, April 12, 1944:

It has been well said that there are two principal things which menace human happiness. One of these is war and the other is unemployment. We live in the hope that we are approaching the termination of the war. Whenever this comes we will be immediately confronted with a war against unemployment. Unemployment may be a cause of war. But for the period of prolonged unemployment in Germany we might never have heard of Hitler.

If the war should come to a sudden end, what we would actually do would be to tell half of our entire industry to shut down. This is a dangerous thing to do and plans for doing it should be made now. How well and how quickly reconversion is accomplished will affect the welfare and perhaps the safety of us all. This task is a challenge to America—to government and to industry alike. Unless reconversion is accomplished speedily we will have the longest bread line in our history.

NATURE OF CONTRACT SETTLEMENT

I should like to discuss briefly the nature of the termination problem and suggest a few of the things which, in my opinion, should be done by Congress and the executive branches for its solution.

There will be literally millions of contracts, subcontracts, and purchase orders to be terminated and settled. In many cases one prime contractor will have entered into several thousand subcontracts (including purchase orders) and these subcontractors, in turn, will have entered into other purchase orders. On a general termination all of these millions of war contractors will have to be settled with and it is important to understand what settlement involves. It is not merely a bookkeeping or auditing job. It involves the negotiation of a new or modified agreement as to what should fairly be paid for a partial performance, instead of a complete performance, of a contract.

It must provide for payment for work in process, materials on hand, and commitments and obligations in connection with the uncompleted part of the contract. The settlement must deal with the disposition of materials on hand; whether they should be sold, and if so at what price; whether some of these materials are to be retained by the contractor and credited on his claim, and if so at what price; whether they are to be scrapped and the salvage value credited to the Government; or whether the Government is to take these materials over for such disposition as it may see fit to make; and also what amounts are to be paid to subcontractors and suppliers.

Settlement is not merely a bookkeeping or auditing job. It is much more than that.

CLEARANCE OF PLANTS

I want now to refer to the physical side of the problem.

The first step to be taken is to clear the plants of Government machinery and war materials. This problem is more serious in some plants than in others. But in the automotive industry it is a serious problem. When one considers the vast part of our population dependent upon motor-car and truck production; that only about one-half of this production takes place in motor-car and truck plants themselves, and that the remaining one-half takes place in thousands of other plants that supply steel, glass, leather, wheels, tires, bodies, upholstery, etc., one can realize the importance of speedy clearance of these plants.

The automotive industry is one of the greatest employment potentials in America today. The public will be waiting for motor cars and trucks. If the motor industry, on the termination of the war, can speedily resume peacetime production, it will provide employment for millions of war workers and millions of returning servicemen.

What are the obstacles to be overcome? Automotive plants in general require extensive reconversion. Machinery and equipment not adaptable to war business have been ripped out—machinery foundations torn up, conveyor lines pulled out. Plants are filled with Government-owned machinery and equipment. In one plant in Detroit, and by no means the largest, 100 acres of floor space, 96 percent of the entire plant, covering an area greater than the bomber plant at Willow Run, is filled with Government-owned machinery, war materials, and work in process.

Why not move them right out? Let me tell you why not. Because this material and work in process will be the basis of the settlement claim. Before this claim can be paid, these items must be listed and accounted for. The Government will not pay for all this until it has satisfied itself that the material and work in process is actually there. No one knows where it can or where it will be stored when it is removed. If when the claim for payment is examined and the Government asks the contractor (as it certainly will): "Where is all this material and work in process for which you have asked payment?" The contractor will be called upon to answer that question and his only safety lies in having this material in his own hands where it can be counted and identified.

Their inventories are extremely complicated. They include thousands upon thousands of different parts. When they leave the contractor's plant they may be stored at great distances or mixed with inventories of other contractors. Some of them may be lost or stolen or damaged by the elements.

So that I think I am safe in saying that ordinary prudence will require that before this material is removed it must be checked by the Government not only as to quantity and number of articles, but as to their state of completion, so that once it has left the contractor's possession his inventory cannot thereafter be questioned.

FINALITY OF SETTLEMENTS—DISPOSITION OF MATERIALS

Having prepared an inventory of the property on hand, these various contractors will want to know what the Government wishes to have done with this property. Some of it the contractor may be willing to retain and make no charge for; some of it he may be willing to retain at some mutually agreeable price; some of it he may be able to sell to others at prices which the Government finds satisfactory, and some of it should be immediately scrapped. The fact is that a very large percentage of this material is special to the war and will have no value at all except for scrap. All of these questions will come up for settlement. This requires agreement between Government and the various contractors and instructions from the Government as to what disposition is to be made. These decisions must be made promptly and when made the parties concerned must be able to act upon them with finality.

If these matters are governed by a settlement agreement which is tentative only and which cannot be acted upon until reviewed by another agency, the process of settlement will be slowed down until this review is completed. It has been suggested, and a provision to this effect is incorporated in a bill now before the House of Representatives, that no settlement with any war contractor shall be anything but tentative; that no such settlement shall be effective until it has been reviewed and approved by a Contract Settlement Board to be chosen by the Comptroller General of the United States. This Board will be allowed 6 months within which to act.

In arriving at the amount to be paid in settlement, one of the most important matters to determine is whether the materials and work in process for which payment is asked have actually been procured and their stage of completion. The review board may not be satisfied with the tentative settlement made by the contracting agency but may wish to examine and check this inventory a second time. How can the contractor afford, in view of this possibility, to remove the inventory and allow it to be dispersed? To be safe, he must retain it under his control until he knows that the review board is not going to check it a second time.

Furthermore, under the form of Government prime contract, no prime contractor can settle with a subcontractor or supplier without the consent of the contracting officer. If this consent is only tentative and subject to review and approval by some other Government agency, the prime contractor cannot settle with and pay off his subcontractors or suppliers except at his own risk. He will simply have to wait until the review is completed. Neither can he take over or sell to others or scrap materials on hand until the tentative settlement is reviewed and approved.

The proposal that no agreement of settlement shall be final until approved by the General Accounting Office is at variance with the purposes for which that Office was created. The General Accounting Office has never had the power or authority to create obligations against the United States. Its function has always been essentially an audit or checking function. Its power to "settle and adjust" contractual claims against the Government has been to determine whether the amounts paid or proposed to be paid are called for by a contract which some other agency has entered into. The Comptroller General can decide whether he will recognize a contract calling for payment as legal and whether there are available funds appropriated to carry it out. But he has never had the power to approve or disapprove a contract or bind the Government by making one himself. He has recently said that he has nothing to do with the wisdom or fairness or equity of contract provisions and has no power to negotiate.

Contracts have been entered into by the procurement agencies committing the Government to the extent of approximately $200,000,000,000 to prosecute this war. To terminate and settle the uncompleted war contracts will involve a small percentage of that sum. If the procurement agencies who were authorized to incur the obligations involved in the complete performance of these contracts are not competent to terminate these contracts by negotiating agreements to reduce these obligations, how can it be assumed that an organization which has never had the power to negotiate a contract or incur an obligation and has had no experience or training for that purpose and which was never selected for that purpose could do the job any better or as well?

In negotiating settlements business judgment of a high order will be required. For example: The terms upon which materials should be disposed of or scrapped must be decided. What allowance shall be made to the contractor for the cost of special machinery, special tooling, etc., procured for the purpose of completing a war contract in view of the fact that he has been cut off in the midst of his work—whether these items will be usable in the contractor's regular business and to what extent—whether leases of property entered into for the purpose of the contract should be canceled, and on what terms, or allowed to run out—whether materials ordered were in excess of the reasonable needs of the contract (and in this connection the difficulty of obtaining delivery on time must be given weight)—what should be done about the division of overhead.

This is a field in which the staff of the General Accounting Office has had no training and for which it never was selected.

Many of these contracts are very complicated. I know of one which has been amended and supplemented more than 80 times and another more than 200 times. To expect an organization of auditors to intelligently negotiate a settlement of the millions of terminated contracts, and especially to do this within a period of 6 months, is to expect an impossibility. My fear would be that as the time limit approaches, settlements would be disapproved merely because of lack of time to properly examine and approve them.

To transfer the power to negotiate contracts of settlement from the armed services to the General Accounting Office during the war period will of necessity interfere with the conduct of the war. Contracts are being terminated almost daily and replaced by other war contracts. If these terminated contracts cannot be settled by the armed services, particularly with respect to the disposition of materials which may be required for other war contracts or which should be scrapped and removed to make way for other war work and with respect to the amounts payable to subcontractors and suppliers until the General Accounting Office has had 6 months to review these matters, the war effort will be seriously impeded.

What is really proposed is to take away one of the functions of the procuring agencies of the military departments and transfer that function to an agency that never was intended or organized to perform it. The armed services would be left with the power to enter into contracts for war materials, but they could not enter into contracts to reduce the materials ordered. They could make contracts, but they could not unmake them.

It is my firm conviction that nothing that Congress could do would be more effective to slow down the process of termination settlements than to hold up settlements until they are reviewed by another agency, and that if any such provision is enacted into law, it will seriously retard post-war employment. Settlements must be final when once made and not subject to be reopened except for collusion or fraud. One agency, whatever it may be, should be set up with full power to deal with the subject under proper safeguards for the protection of the Government and the contractor as well. Full and careful examination of termination claims must be made. All the time necessary should be taken before settlements are made. But we should not have a series of settlements. Some mistakes will be made; mistakes will be made no matter what agency has the responsibility for settlement. But the performance of the settlement function must be looked at as a whole, and it would be unfortunate if an occasional mistake should lead to a procedure so intricate and time-consuming that we fail of our real objective, which is to get back to peacetime production and economy in the shortest practicable time.

INTERIM FINANCING

Pending the final settlements of terminated contracts, the war contractor must receive payments in anticipation of the amount to which he will be found ultimately entitled. This subject of interim financing is one of great importance, but the impression is too widespread that it affords a full solution of the problem. Advance payments are in effect mere loans and must be shown on financial statements as liabilities. They are a mere stop-gap. There can be no substitute for a prompt final settlement.

There are some industries, including the strongest ones, which could survive and proceed based on interim financing; but there are many weaker ones whose credit would be seriously impaired; and it is these smaller, weaker concerns which are entitled to the utmost consideration. To have concerns in this category sitting on the anxious seat while settlement agreements are being reviewed and sent back for renegotiation my well prove to be their undoing.

INSOLVENT VENDEES

In the heat of war production, many subcontractors and suppliers have been called upon to perform work and furnish articles to other war contractors with little or no credit standing. In many cases, war contractors have been directed to enter into subcontracts and accept purchase orders from concerns with very small capital and which may very easily become insolvent.

When a war contractor has furnished goods or services to companies (many of which have been improvised simply for war work), and is unable to obtain payment of his claim, he should be assured of payment by the Government. This is only common and ordinary fairness and equity. Procedures should be set up so as to assure such payment, and where necessary the Government should pay these claims directly instead of allowing them to follow down the chain of subcontractors to the war contractor involved. Any break in this chain may make it impossible for the contractor entitled to be paid to receive his money.

Suggestions have been made to Congress to accomplish this result, and it is to be hoped that some procedure will be worked out to properly care for situations of this character.

Legislative and administrative settlement procedures should be established without delay. These should include: (1) Provision for the prompt clearance of industrial plants; (2) for the prompt settlement of war contracts which will be final and conclusive except for collusion or fraud; (3) sufficient advance payments to free the working capital of war contractors so that civilian production can be resumed; (4) partial final settlements without waiting for approval of the entire claim; and (5) the protection of war contractors against insolvency of other war contractors to or for whom goods or services have been furnished in furtherance of the war effort.

In conclusion let me say that serious and commendable efforts have been and are being made by the executive and legislative branches to assure prompt reconversion to a peacetime economy. Many bills have been introduced and hearings have been in progress from time to time since June last. I agree entirely with the suggestion made in the Baruch-Hancock report that a joint committee of the Senate and House, in cooperation with the executive departments, should decide on some one termination bill and urge its passage.

There should be no partisan controversy, no conflict between different branches of the Government. There must be a combined, unified, cooperative effort to bring about this reconversion at the earliest possible time and in the soundest and most practicable way.

St. Lawrence Seaway Power Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting herewith an address delivered by a fellow townsman and one of America's leading citizens, Julius H. Barnes. This address was made by Mr. Barnes, at Ogdensburg, N. Y., on April 25, 1944, before a large gathering of public spirited citizens, who met to discuss one of the greatest post-war planning projects now before Congress.

The river and harbor bill recently passed by the House of Representatives is now pending before the Senate committee. Every project in that bill is a worth-while post-war planning project. Efforts will be made to have the Senate give consideration to the St. Lawrence seaway project which was considered by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives in the Seventy-seventh Congress. I am a member of that committee and the pending legislation is identical with the legislation favorably reported by that committee after months of hearings by a 2 to 1 vote.

As Mr. Barnes indicates, a great mistake was made in 1934 when this project was defeated in the Senate of the United States. I commend his address to every one of you. It is as follows:

This city is the gateway to the St. Lawrence, a region rich in historical tradition and in commercial achievement. Fortunate in its neighbors, its early phase as a potential battlefield between rival nations has been succeeded by the greater significance of a jointly-used highway for the vast commerce of a new continent. It has great possibilities to be further developed to the public benefit. You, here in northern New York, have a part to play.

The great war has quickened national appreciation. The vision of a single world, attaining new standards and new advances, served as never before by expanded production and a swelling commerce—relying as it must on the water highways of the oceans, gives new impetus to the improvement of this seaway.

Fifteen hundred miles west of here, my home town of Duluth—farthest inland port of this continent, still confidently presses for national appreciation of the seaway's significance. The chamber of commerce, through an ably led committee, continues the long fight for recognition. Chicago and Milwaukee stir afresh. The State of Minnesota officially supports these efforts.

There is a philosophy of world peace to follow this World War, and a vista of world commerce to come, that I wish to present to you tonight—rather than any statistical formulas.

We Americans desire no gains from victorious wars. We wish earnestly the gains of peaceful industry and commerce on a world-wide scale to follow.

A great land, this America, and a great new race, these Americans, forged from the ambitious of all peoples. This world-wide war is proving the worth of this land and this people. Incredible as it is, this land of peace and this free people, devoid of military history and tradition, set today the high marks in achievement of victory. Almost beyond belief, today's free labor and the amazing management genius of America, in 2 years conversion from peace to war, forges the weapons that arm our citizen army and equip as well the older armies of our allies. America's output of ships and tanks and guns and munitions exceeds all the rest of the world together. And the quality of our boys from our farms and homes, inspiring the imitative aspiration of all other lands, is proved to be of the highest manly courage and fighting qualities. The free inventive genius of America equips our fighting lads with amazing superiority over the military castes whose profession was supposed to give them ruthless leadership. We have a thrill of pride in the courage, the endurance, the war adaptation of a whole youth, misjudged by Hitler, Mussolini, and Tojo as softened by luxury and outgrown from the hardy virtues of early America. Far from it!

This miracle attainment flowers from the peacetime achievement and for the same reasons. In less than two centuries of national life this new race attained world leadership, held it, and deserved it. In this land free of the hampering restrictions of age-old caste, stimulated by the freedom of opportunity to carve each his own niche in life, under a national ideal of common-school education making effort more effective, and under a Government that held the scales, even in protection of each man's attainment, we have written a page of history, inspiring indeed. It is no accident that here in America 6 percent of the world's population learned to convert into living use half the annual world's gifts of nature—coal, iron, steel, cotton, timber, copper, oil. Against our short 3 centuries, today older lands and older peoples realize now, that they also have possessed these same bounties of natural wealth for 5 centuries, or 10, or 20, and had not yet learned that human life, and health, and happiness were directly advanced by their conversion to use through the processes of peaceful industry. This striking difference of achievement rests on the stimulating American ideals of educating the mind, training the hand, and inspiring the spirit.

Nature was kind to America. This land is favored of all the world. But we have valued these advantages, and with them have inspired individual and national effort and achievement. This land in its early days with so much to do and so few to do it, set the early measure of value largely on the dollar sign of attainment. Today we are developing a truer estimate of individual worth. Character and service, the demonstrated spirit of justice, fair play, and the industries, and even of communities and fair chance, rates the true worth of men, of States. That spirit today spans the seas in an awakening sense of obligation toward less-favored peoples.

It is in this spirit that I wish to discuss tonight the inevitable, though long-delayed development of one of the original resources of this vast new continent. Nature gave America the precious advantages of three great coasts, the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific. Nature also gave the heart of America the greater boon of the deep-water inland highway of the Great Lakes. Nature clothed its shores with great forests from which a myriad of homes were built. Nature deposited along the western lakes, limitless treasures of copper and iron for steel from which the industries of America were created. Nature made that waterway reach to the very gateway of the fertile prairies with their vast production. Then Nature seemed to challenge the new men of this new land to measure the value of these great advantages, and seem to challenge the foresight, skill, and energy to convert them into human service. Across that great water highway it threw three challenging barriers; the falls at Sault Ste. Marie, the shallows of Lake St. Clair, and the stupendous falls of Niagara.

America accepted those challenges. The early portage around Ste. Marie into Lake Superior, first in a single horse and cart, was displaced by early shallow canals which grew larger and deeper with the swelling volume of Lake Superior's commerce, until today five great locks pass the Lake's yearly commerce of 100,000,000 tons. The flats of St. Clair were steadily deepened as increasing commerce pressed. They can easily be deepened further as needs develop. The great drop of Niagara has been bypassed by the successive water stairways which the enterprise of our northern neighbors, one tenth our size in numbers and wealth, built unaided, one after another until today's great Welland waits with its 30 feet of readiness for ocean ships.

It is fair to say that, except for that thousand mile deep-water economy in the heart of this continent, the building of America, its homes, its industries, the magic growth of the eastern seaboard would have been impossible. That growth would have been checked by the high costs of development and delivery; and that growth would have been defeated by the impossibility of moving those enormous tonnages on any kind of land transportation. No system of railroads could have moved, in our time, the vast tonnage of ore, coal, lumber, and grain supporting our great cities and industries. As a lifelong grain exporter, I assert that only because of the economy of that great waterway could the grain fields of the Central West have sold their high-labor harvest, 1,500 miles from the seaboard, in competition with the cheap-labor coastal areas of Argentina, Russia, and India. But our West did meet that world-market competition and by cheap water transportation and the resourcefulness of American traders sold its product at such net to our farms that the Middle West today lines its roads and streets with farmer-owned automobiles.

On our three seaboard coasts, a wise Government provided deeper and deeper channels and harbors for the privately owned waterside docks and industries, and the country grew with increasing power and resources. On the Great Lakes highway, the same enlightened public policy successively deepened the channels and harbors with the growth of trade, and successively deepened the locks around the three barriers between the Lakes.

Only on the St. Lawrence, has the national policy, the ideal of improving facilities to meet increasing commerce, been partially paralyzed. The early 4-foot channel of the fur traders around the St. Lawrence rapids, built first for canoes and bateaux, was soon deepened to 8 feet. Then an enlightened Canada of 50 years ago deepened that waterway again to 14 feet, and installed locks, then stupendous, of 260 feet in length. But in this 50 years, while ships on the improved Lakes inland have grown to 600 feet and 20,000 tons of cargo, the waterway access to the sea remains the outmoded facilities of half a century ago, 260 feet for small ships only. Their 2,000 tons of cargo does not build great ports nor serve today's vast commerce.

I have some sentiment about Ogdensburg, the fruit of my experience in developing 40 years ago from Duluth perhaps the largest export grain business in America. In those early years today's great carriers of the upper Lakes were still a dream only. We still had many ships fitted to the now out-dated facilities of the St. Lawrence and of the early limited 14 foot Welland. At Ogdensburg, and at its sister Canadian port of Kingston, our grain was transferred to river barges for towing, then to Montreal. At Montreal ocean ships that had sailed 800 miles from the coast up the deep lower St. Lawrence furnished the cheapest route to the teeming Old World.

The economies of developing markets and customers through cheap water transportation were deeply imprinted in my early business training. Every year of the 40 since, every experience in the various business activities which I have shared, every contact with businessmen of many lands in which I have been fortunate, every study of commercial history confirms in me the deep conviction that history will condemn unsparingly the men or the influences that have for 30 years defeated the modernization which would put a fourth seacoast in the very heart of America. There its service as ports of entry and of shipment would be doubled above the ordinary. Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Duluth have grown into vast industrial production. I hesitate to disparage the honest judgment of men who oppose this modernization of this existing outmoded access to the sea, but theirs is a great responsibility in denying the 40,000,000 people of our American Middle West the benefits nature can so easily extend. And some of the opposition in these years has been, I think, obviously influenced by a presumedly selfish aim.

It has been stated that Congress refused the Canadian treaty negotiated by President Hoover in 1932, favored by President Roosevelt in 1933, and voted for in 1934 by a majority of the Senate—but not the necessary two-thirds. Today we hear serious discussion of changing our Constitution so that even world peace treaties may be made effective by a simple majority of Congress instead of continuing a veto power in a minority of the Senate. That 1934 minority defeating vote bears a great responsibility. If the treaty had been confirmed, the seaway would have been completed before the invasion of Poland, and before the treachery of Pearl Harbor. America's mighty resources, moving through a new outlet of limitless capacity, might have shortened this war. To shorten this war a year, a month could be measured in precious human lives. Those men should review in sober earnestness their responsibility as a minority in opposition. The great events of this world struggle are passing judgment.

It was argued then that the 2,000,000 new horsepower provided by the seaway was not needed. The 90,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of 1934 have grown today to 190,000,000,000. And more yet is needed. It condemns either the judgment that so greatly erred, or shows a strange lack of faith in the continuing progress of America. Who can really doubt the vast and growing power-driven genius of American industry?

It was argued that the seaway could be used for shipping only 8 months of the year. Rarely with that statement do we hear the associated fact that the great St. Lawrence flow would generate its might of power 12 months each year continuously. And the 8-months argument, while, of course, a limitation, has not prevented my home town of Duluth handling water-borne tonnage every 8-month season exceeded only by the great port of New York with its full 12 months. Credit goes to the restless energy and resourcefulness of hardy men.

It was argued that the increased ship facilities are not needed for the commerce of Midwest America and of the cities that would line the new route to the sea. An old, old story faced by every project of large potentiality. Always great engineering improvements have had to meet the arguments of doubters, both honest and sinister. A transportation genius, James J. Hill, who built the Great Northern Railway west from Duluth to the Pacific coast, said that the Panama Canal would be useful only as a lily pond. Instead, the Panama, which passed 5,000,000 tons in its first year of 1915, passed in 1940 30,000,000 tons. The war years' figures since 1940 are suppressed, but it requires no active imagination to appraise what it means to us today that our vast newly created Navy may pass freely and swiftly between the two hemisphere wars in which we are engaged. The old, long route around the Horn would indeed imperil our striking power. What would Jim Hill say today?

The Suez doubled its tonnage service in the last quarter century. The Welland quadrupled its tonnage in the last quarter century even though it is, by this St. Lawrence obstruction largely a deadend highway. Every chapter of the growth of world commerce shows that trade increases, cities grow, individual welfare is strengthened, when new economies in transportation and distribution costs come into play—and a deep-water highway is the king of economies.

It was argued against the seaway that increased tonnage for that channel must represent diversion from the established railroads. I do not believe it. I think it can be shown that improved access and reduced costs create new tonnage by their very economy, and that the stimulant of production thus attained confers increased tonnage benefits on the whole country. Here we should remember that 40 percent of American railway mileage rests on the Great Lakes terminals.

The American Railway Association opposes this development and has for years. They oppose it today even when they are at their wit's end to handle their vital traffic. We can challenge their judgment on this great seaway even as we pay tribute justly to the operating skill and energy of wartime railway service.

Railway judgment was not always expressed in opposition as it is today through this national association. It is kinder to think that the anxieties as to railroad earnings apparent 10 years ago has unduly influenced a sound judgment on this national waterway service. The railway giants of the development era of the 1920's most affected by its possibilities generally endorsed the plan. Listen to the list in favor: President Pennington, of the Soo Lines, and his successor, President Jaffray, approved it. President Ralph Budd, of the Great Northern Railway, expressed approval in 1920. Budd is still a great railway figure, and I have not heard that he changed his mind. Howard Elliot, chairman of the Northern Pacific Railway, before his death expressed approval, and his successor, Charles Donnelly, president of the Northern Pacific, endorsed his judgment. President Byram, of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, and his successor, President Scandrett, anticipated benefits to their road and their territory. President Felton, of the Chicago Great Western, wished it developed, and to a full 30 feet. President Fred W. Sargent, of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., a close friend of mine and whom I greatly miss, said the waterway would be of "inestimable value to the entire country." President Hale Holden, of the Burlington Railroad, another friend gone on, endorsed the seaway "as a matter of the highest interest and importance to the development of the Middle West." President Downs, of the Illinois Central, looked on the waterway as an extension rather than a competitor of his system. These men were constructive railroad leaders. There is even more reason for their faith in the enlarged opportunities of today.

The Transportation Association of America opposes this development. In 1941 it emphasized that with a national debt of $123,000,000,000 this expenditure should not be made. That association likewise opposed the expenditure when our national debt was only 30 billions. It opposes this improvement today when our national debt will soon be 250 billions. Its opposition on the narrow basis of expenditures may be fairly disregarded. It would have opposed the Panama. Both costs are much the same.

It was argued that American money should not aid in this development because "70 percent would be in a foreign country." Give that only the weight it deserves, if any, in the light of the long association with Canada in so many forms of joint use and mutual interest. Measure it also in the new spirit of the Atlantic Charter.

The Atlantic Charter with its thirty-four subscribing nations typifies a profound change in world relations. America of all peoples must understand and adapt itself to that change.

Since the last war the Russian people—then 70 percent illiterate—have been trained to read and write. They have learned that this capitalistic country can arm its own American forces and besides help equip the heroic armies of its Russian allies. And that dependence of Russian courage on the superior production of industrial America, carries vast significance in our relations across two oceans. In China, since the last war, 400,000,000 brave and hardy people—naturally industrious—are fighting for their national life and the right to develop on their own. Millions are imbued with a new spirit plainly to be seen.

In this new day most of the world—2,000,000,000 people—learn now through the radio, the movies, the airplane, and the printed page what peoples may aspire to own and use and enjoy. They need so much—shoes and clothes, home and furnishings—so much, indeed. Earning power will grow with ambition, and its effectiveness increase with knowledge and training. Invention suggests today as never before a thousand things of use and value. Science extends life, reduces illness, makes living more precious and more effective. Enterprising industry and the urge for more employment and for better pay will seek out these potential markets and customers, stimulate their desires, show them ways to earn and to buy. The elimination of trade barriers between peoples, excessive tariffs, quotas, currency controls, and embargoes, all promise a great swelling tide of commerce in the interchange of goods serving new hundreds of millions of buyers and users.

Obviously, that great flow of goods must move on the water highways of the great oceans. Railroads cannot be built across five-sixths of the earth's surface which is water. Airways will always be limited in the tonnage of commerce. Waterways assume an importance as never before. Every extension of water highways that reach new markets, create new ports, expand employment, and strengthen industry must be developed with an urgency never before so pressing. The St. Lawrence seaway is the greatest engineering project for national decision today. It stands as never before of first rank importance in required service to our national welfare. It must be built. After 30 years support of this proposal, and 30 years of hope deferred, I still have faith in the good judgment of the American public and in the submergence of any selfish interest in opposition. We have a right to believe the day is near. The New York Legislature this winter again unanimously approved it. The power authority has long diligently furthered it. A Great Lakes ship operator of importance last week told me that, hitherto in opposition, he was now converted. Six successive Presidents, of both parties, have favored this work. A majority of the United States Senate favored this national improvement in the only vote recorded thereon. All the portents carry promise. The story needs only to be told completely and fairly to sweep away the opposition which has so long delayed it, whether that opposition is sinister, selfish, trivial, or only misinformed and misinterpreted.

Those of us who have believed that the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway, creating the fourth American seacoast in the heart of this continent will rank with the early significant crusades of America, owe it to the pioneers of the St. Lawrence seaway to press it with renewed courage and energy. It took in our early days crusaders with vision to cross the Alleghenies, as Washington did at Fort Duquesne, as the early settlers who ventured into the "Western reserve," as the gold rush pioneers in covered wagons across the plains and in ships around the horn, as the men who traced the Oregon trail to the Pacific. These men, and others believed in America and in its future. The brilliant attainment of America today justifies their vision and faith beyond their fellows. So also some day in an expanded America, in an era of more secure and wider employment, in the vast commerce from America to far flung peoples, based on the economy of reaching them across the seas, there will be a new national roll of patriotic Americans who saw clearly with accurate vision, the importance of this great new facility. I wish I could call the roll here of partisans as I have known them. They are a long list of able men: Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce; Franklin Roosevelt, then Governor of New York; the Governors of 23 States some years ago; Charles R. Craig of my home town, Duluth, active for years between Canada and Washington; Governor Goodrich of Indiana; Governor Allen of Kansas; James Davidson of Michigan, devoutly supporting the Seaway against his brother lakes shipbuilders and ship operators; a score and more of earnest men devoid of any personal selfish interest, active in their lives for this project, and convinced in death that the nation neeeded this great contribution to its security and earning power. All honor to them and to the later generation of devoted men who have today picked up their uncompleted mission. New strength, new power, new confidence, new faith. The day is near.

Compulsory Sickness Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Sauce for the Goose—", dealing with the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill calling for compulsory sickness insurance, which was published in the Christian Science Monitor of April 14, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE—

Propaganda made by the Social Security Board for the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill calling for compulsory sickness insurance has led to substantial questioning. There is a Federal law which bars Federal agencies from using their funds to promote legislation. The Social Security Board is so well aware of this that recently it disallowed an expenditure of $95.40 by the Unemployment Compensation Commission of Montana because it had spent that sum for 10,000 pamphlets opposing the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

While the Social Security Board may have been entirely justified in this ruling, its prohibition of adverse propaganda contrasts with its own energetic policy of promoting the disputed legislation. The Board has, in fact, become probably the most influential sponsor of socialized medicine. Its efforts to influence opinion have become so great as to create critics within the system.

In particular, the Board has addressed itself to organized labor. It has sent speakers to labor conventions who have advocated the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, and has broadcast to the labor press literature favoring its legislative proposals. Throughout it has urged "action now." The Social Security Board should unmistakably confine itself to the nonpropaganda policy it imposes upon its own branches.

America Can Do Better

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. BURTON

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address entitled "America Can Do Better," which I delivered before the Ohio Federation of Republican Women, at Columbus, Ohio, on April 21, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The question is: Can America do better under a Republican administration than under the present administration to win the war and the peace?

The answers are: Yes; America can do much better and do much more under a Republican administration than she is doing under the present administration to help her fighting men win the war as quickly and completely as possible in both hemispheres. We owe it to them to do so.

And: Yes; America can do much better and do much more under a Republican administration than she is doing under the present administration to build a straight road to post-war recovery and to a just and lasting peace worthy of the price paid for it. We owe it to ourselves, our children, and our children's children to do so.

We are in the critical year of the war and of our generation. We are in a critical year in the history of America and of civilization. We can make it a year of great progress and success if, and only if, we meet now the issues of our time behind the battle lines as well as on them and do it boldly, intelligently, and courageously. We have gathered here so that we may agree on how best to do this.

I have unstinted praise for the armed forces. Their example lights our way like a pillar of fire. It is for us to do our share on the home front in a manner worthy of their inspiring service on the battle front. I have inexpressibly deep sympathy for all to whom this war has brought suffering at home or abroad.

In response to his welcome to Australia, Gen. Douglas MacArthur said: "I have come as a soldier in a great crusade for personal liberty as opposed to perpetual slavery. * * * There can be no compromise. We shall win or we shall die. To that end I pledge the full resources of all the mighty power of my country and all the blood of my countrymen." That is the high pledge which is being redeemed on the firing line. The test at home should be as high. We should say today without reservation, "We are fighting a great crusade, at home as well as abroad, for personal liberty as opposed to perpetual slavery. There can be no compromise. We shall win or we shall die and to that end we loyally pledge to our country all the mighty power of our party and all the efforts of our campaign. Let us win the war for freedom. Let us lead the way to a recovery worthy of the freedom so dearly won."

BETTER UNITY ON THE HOME FRONT

America can do better and more under a Republican administration than under the present administration because under such a new administration dedicated to constitutional government and progress she can more readily unite all classes and groups of Americans on the home front under a banner placing the interests of all the people of America above every special or lesser interest.

We then can gain greater unity among the rank and file of labor, industry, agriculture, government and all the rest of America without distinction of race, creed, or degree of prosperity.

In the early days of the war the Axis Powers were winning because the world was not united against them. Nation after nation fell before them and slavery was the penalty of defeat. At almost the last possible moment, the peace-loving nations of the world became the United Nations. The tide of battle turned, and today the United Nations are advancing on every front.

But the war is not yet won. The enemy has one last hope. He seeks to divide the United Nations from one another and to divide each of us within ourselves. He seeks to set race against race, and group against group. He encourages suspicion of each ally within the others. Thus America's home front becomes a critical battle front. The enemy's objective is disunity. Ours is unity.

What shall be the position of the Republican Party on our home front? The course is clear. Our rallying point is our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution. On that we stand, "one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." If we unite in the full faith in God and in man upon which our Nation is founded at home, the enemy will fail in his attack from within.

LINCOLN ON THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Let us then face the full meaning of our own Declaration of Independence and do battle for it in our home precincts. Abraham Lincoln interpreted this declaration, in 1858, in terms looking toward this very time. He found in it the faith we need today to establish our position not only within our Nation but in our relations with our fellow men everywhere. Speaking of his forefathers and ours, he said: "These by their representatives in old Independence Hall said to the whole race of men: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights: that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' This was their majestic interpretation of the economy of the universe. This was their lofty and wise and noble understanding of the justice of the Creator to His creatures—yes, gentlemen, to all His creatures, to the whole great family of man. In their enlightened belief, nothing stamped with the divine image and likeness was sent into the world to be trodden on and degraded and imbruted by its fellows: They grasped not only the whole race of man then living, but they reached forward and seized upon the farthest posterity. They erected a beacon to guide their children, and their children's children, and the countless myriads who should inhabit the earth in other ages. Wise statesmen as they were, they knew the tendency of prosperity to breed tyrants, and so they established these great self-evident truths, that when in the distant future some man, some faction, some interest, should set up the doctrine that none but rich men, none but white men, or none but Anglo-Saxon white men were entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, their posterity might look up again to the Declaration of Independence and take courage to renew the battle which their fathers began, so that truth and justice and mercy and all the humane and Christian virtues might not be extinguished from the land; so that no man would hereafter dare to limit and circumscribe the great principles on which the temple of liberty was being built."

America in these terms, is not so much a place as it is a people. Our people have come from everywhere. We are an expression of man's faith in God and man. The torch of liberty is in our hands—it is for us to hold it high.

This liberty which is the light of the world is founded upon equality of the individual before the law. In the days of Lincoln, the Republican Party was founded upon the principle of fairness of man to man. No class and no group, be it racial, religious, economic, industrial, or financial, should raise its special interests above the general interest. It is only on this basis that our Government can continue to be a Government for all the people all of the time. It is time to return to the doctrine of constitutional government for the protection of all.

FREEDOM UNDER THE CONSTITUTION

Unity in America calls also for faith in and observance of the Constitutional separation of powers between the Federal and State Governments and between the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial branches of the Federal Government itself. Again, it is only on such observance that freedom under the Constitution can survive. The absorption of State control by Federal domination and the absorption of Federal legislative and judicial functions by executive domination destroys the safeguards of the people. The Republican Party seeks to renew the doctrine that we can have faith in the ability and loyalty of the people of America to conduct their own affairs, direct their local and State governments, and enact and interpret their laws without the domination of the Chief Executive and of millions of his civilian employees. To strengthen America's position as the champion of freedom of opportunity, the time has come to make it clear to our soldiers and to the world that such freedom is secure in America.

A young soldier wrote home to his mother, "Please don't change the furniture in the living room, please don't change the pictures on the wall, please don't change a thing on the mantelpiece. When I get home I want to see home the way I think of it and dream of it." If that same soldier were writing to all America, he probably would not insist that there be no change of detail in all America, but he certainly would ask that the substance of his America be unchanged. He certainly would ask for an America of freedom and opportunity for himself, his children and his children's children, a united America of peace and stability with freedom and justice for all, an America worthy of the price that he and his comrades are paying for it—so that when he returns he shall find here the America of which he thinks, of which he dreams, and for which he fights.

When the light of such an America shines through the windows of the White House and the Capitol, this Nation will be united as never before. The war will then be the people's own war and victory will be the people's own victory. I believe, therefore, that a new administration can do much better than the present administration has done on the home front, with the draft, with manpower, with the equal protection of individual rights, with the development of opportunity for individual post-war advancement, with the preservation of the rights of the States and with the preservation of the strength of the Congress and the courts from Executive direction. To do better in these fields means helping to win the war everywhere and to build confidence in the future of governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

BETTER PROSPECTS FOR POST-WAR RECOVERY

Secondly, America can do much better and much more under a Republican administration than she is doing under the present administration to build a straight road to post-war recovery and to a just and lasting peace worthy of the price paid for it.

America will face her post-war internal recovery under the greatest handicap of her history. Her taxes will far exceed those before the war. Her debt will be at least 10 times what it was before the war. The bonds evidencing our national debt will be held by every bank, insurance company, church, trustee and practically every family in America. Default on them would mean a depth of unemployment and suffering greatly exceeding that of the last depression. The resulting scarcity would open the door to such totalitarian regimentation that it would make us wonder whether we had won or lost the war. To carry these taxes and this debt we must have a production of real wealth in America that will substantially exceed that before the war. We have the record of wartime performance, the plants, materials, tools, new inventions, skilled workmen, skilled supervision and an ample initial demand both at home and abroad for all the products that we can make, sell and distribute. We have, therefore, the opportunity for the enlargement of our existing fields of production, and we have limitless new fields upon which to enter. These include aviation, radio, Diesel power, automotive power, chemistry, plastics, glass, wood, electronics, electric welding, home building, air cooling, refrigeration, sulfa drugs and countless other new fields of activity.

Such a recovery calls for a flow of private capital into countless enterprises, large and small. It calls for constructive planning such as the Republican Party has been and is now urging. It calls for joint efforts on the part of industry, labor, agriculture and Government all recognizing their common interests and the need for fair treatment of one another.

The need for governmental action is primarily in providing an orderly means for the withdrawal of Government from its wartime business. This calls for governmental cooperation in the orderly termination of its contracts, the early making and publishing of inventories of surplus plants, tools, materials and supplies, the early disposal of such surpluses, the removal of Government machinery from private plants, the provision of temporary financing pending payment of Government obligations, and the general reestablishment of that dynamic initiative which springs from private enterprise. At the same time, there must be governmental support of fair practices and protection against economic dictatorships which can be as detrimental as political dictatorships. Above all there must be stability and reasonable assurance of stability for a substantial number of years ahead so that private funds may be invested intelligently in new enterprises.

A program is being launched in some places under the leadership of civic organizations whereby the public systematically will do their own budgeting and planning of purchases for the post-war period. Local civic bodies will collect these individual budgets listing in standard form the articles which the makers of the budget plan to buy with their wartime savings. This recorded demand will encourage production to meet those demands and will give confidence both to the returning soldiers and to the members of the public themselves that the market will exist and that employment be forthcoming to match the demand.

Dedicated as the Republican Party is to a recovery of private enterprise and to increased national production with fairness to industry, labor, and agriculture, it becomes the natural agency to develop the Nation's post-war program. It will welcome the opportunity to stop the wastage of public funds which has marked the life of the present spendthrift administration. Living on borrowed money, as the Federal Government has done in recent years, is easy while spending the borrowed capital. It threatens, however, the stability of generations to come and spells hardship for the future. Stopping governmental waste and finding a means of balancing the Federal Budget will be important so that taxation can be reduced to a minimum.

Coupled with the need for increased earnings to meet our existing debt must go a program to attract private capital into new enterprises. The best contribution the Government can make to a program of increasing private enterprise and employment will be the gradual reduction of governmental control of enterprise, of governmental allocation of materials, and of governmental taxes upon productive enterprise. This program might well look forward to the early reduction and later termination of the excess-profits tax and capital-stock tax. It will take some such policy to enable private industry to plow back into productive enterprise the funds upon which our recovery and stability will depend.

INTERNATIONAL STABILITY IS A DOMESTIC NECESSITY

The success of all of this, however, is clearly dependent upon the existence in the coming generation of international peace, international stability, and assurance of that international stability for many years to come. If such peace and assurance of stability do not exist it will be necessary to maintain armaments which will increase our taxes when we need to reduce them, and will create new deficits when we need a balanced budget. Furthermore, there will not be that reasonable certainty of the future that attracts private capital into the new enterprises upon which the structure of recovery must depend. Our international stability thus becomes a domestic necessity.

Into this situation the Republican program of dependable international relations advances 5 percent of the way at a time through the exercise of our sovereign power for the benefit of America in the same manner as the sovereign powers are exercised for the benefit of other nations for themselves. In support of such a program the Republican Party—in contrast to no action by the party now in office—approved at Mackinac Island on September 7, 1943, the following general policy: "Responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to retain permanent peace with organized justice in the free world."

A little later most of the Republicans in the Senate on November 5, 1943, joined in the 85 to 5 vote in favor of the following official statement of policy, incorporating word for word a paragraph from the Moscow Agreement between Great Britain, Russia, China, and the United States as announced on October 30, 1943: "The Senate recognizes the necessity of there being established at the earliest practicable date a general international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

WHEN THIS WAR IS WON IT MUST STAY WON

The first essential of these declarations and the first essential of the Republican post-war policy is that when victory is won it shall stay won. If there be one outstanding benefit which has come to the world and to America from fighting two world wars in the same generation, it is that this generation will and should be anxious to see to it that when the Second World War is won that the military gain thus made will be consolidated and that law and order thereafter shall be maintained. There is little doubt that the men serving in this war are determined to see to it that the war is won completely in both hemispheres and also that when that is done we shall have so planned the peace and so determined the policy of the United Nations that the war shall remain completely won in both hemispheres.

The United Nations today have the military power and resources which make it possible to win the war. On the day of the armistice there will be peace throughout the area of the armistice based upon that combined military power.

ESSENTIAL INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

Under these circumstances it is not necessary that something strange or new be organized. It will not be necessary to insist upon some particular form of organized post-war police force or unit, but it will be necessary, and this is a plain obligation to our soldiers who will have won a military championship of the world, that we shall retain that championship team, that unity of purpose, and that readiness to serve on some basis that will make sure that law and order shall be maintained in the world and that the United Nations, in the words of the Mackinac Conference and the declaration of the United States, shall participate in a post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to retain permanent peace and shall enter into a general international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states for the maintenance of international peace and security.

To permit any dissolution of the existing unity and strength of the United Nations so that any gangster nation might lay the foundation of another war would represent a tragic failure on our part to consolidate the gain of this war in the sector of international relations entrusted to us. As the Pilgrim Fathers met their emergency with the Mayflower Compact, and our revolutionary forefathers met their emergencies with the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, so we of our generation must consolidate the gain of the war won by the soldiers, sailors, and flyers of World Wars Nos. 1 and 2, and meet our emergency with an effective international organization that effectively will stop World War No. 3.

The present war can be won on the battlefields by our soldiers, sailors, and flyers, yet lost on the home front by ourselves if following the war we shall permit our governmental policies either to destroy that freedom of opportunity which has been the foundation of our progress or to lose that invincible military solidarity of the United Nations which is the world's best guaranty of retaining the peace we shall have helped to win.

Under a Republican administration, dedicated to frank constitutional cooperation with Congress, America can do much more than under the present administration to insure domestic recovery and to insure the establishment and maintenance of such a general international organization that our domestic recovery shall be secure and the danger of renewal of war shall be reduced to a minimum. Only thus will our victory be worthy of the price paid for it.

A CHALLENGE TO US

I close with a quotation from a letter that a young American flyer sent to his father and his father made available to me. His faith and his service is a challenge to us to be as true to our trust as he is to his.

"FEBRUARY 7, 1944.

"MY DEAR DAD: * * * The life that I'm leading now is not nearly so bad as one might imagine. Although our lives are risked on each mission the odds are pretty much in our favor. More and more I feel that it is all in the hands of the Lord. At every opportunity I attend mass, go to confession, and receive Holy Communion. On each mission I pray that my crew and I will make it, if it is His will.

"Since my first mission I have been more at peace with myself than ever before. * * * Now I know that they (my crew) will stick by me and I shall certainly do all in my power, with the help of God, to see them through all that lies ahead.

"Going over a target and seeing and feeling all of the flak that is thrown up is an experience which is indescribable. It really makes one feel awfully humble, because you realize that there is only a certain amount that you can do about it. The rest is entirely in the hands of the Lord. Some people call it luck, but I'm firmly convinced that to an element of luck and a certain amount of skill is added an awful lot which is answerable only to God. I know that every time I go over the target I'm scared to death—yet there is something about it that I wouldn't miss for all the world. At least we do know that we are contributing our share, little as it may be, towards winning this war which shall and must be won."

In the light of that sentiment let us not fail to contribute our shares, little as they may be, "toward winning this war which shall and must be won."

Statement by Vincente Lombardo Toledano on Aims of Latin Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article published in the Washington Times-Herald of April 25, 1944, containing a statement made by Vincente Lombardo Toledano to the International Labor Organization, at Philadelphia. The statement deals with the aims of Latin nations.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIMS OF LATIN NATIONS TOLD

PHILADELPHIA, April 25.—Vincente Lombardo Toledano, Mexico's worker delegate, told the twenty-sixth conference of the International Labor Organization today that Latin America asks "nothing more than to emerge from the historically backward period in which we live * * * to become a part of modern society."

Lombardo Toledano said Latin America feels that the structure of the economic evolution of Latin America has been deformed because the big international monopolies exploit the countries of Latin America through the following mechanisms:

1. Paying very low wages to native workers. 2. Paying very low taxes and tariffs to the national government. 3. Paying very low freight rates to transportation systems. 4. Buying raw materials at very low prices. 5. Selling their manufactured products at very high prices.

Polish Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared relating to Polish Constitution Day, May 3, which is Poland's national holiday and the anniversary of the signing of the Polish Constitution on May 3, 1791.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

May 3 is Poland's national holiday, commemorating the signing of the Polish Constitution on May 3, 1791.

The Polish Constitution emphatically affirmed the principle that all power in civil society is derived from the will of the people. The power of the executive, in the instance of Poland of 1791, the power of the King, was limited. The Polish Parliament, the Sejm, attained the rightful stature which it deserved: It became the sole lawmaking body of the Nation. It is no wonder, in the light of these significant advances, that the constitution of 1791 is for Poland what the Declaration of the Rights of Man was for France and the Declaration of Independence was for America.

The underlying passion of the Polish people for representative government has not changed in a century and a half of peril and persecution, of ruthless slaughter, of fire and sword. The sacred ideal of Polish liberty stands undimmed today, revered by all who love freedom, its place in history proud and unchallenged.

Do you want living proof of the eternal strength of the Polish spirit of liberty?

I read from the charter of Poland, a creation of the existing Polish Government on February 24, 1942: an advance showing of the type of government to which the people of Poland may well look forward after a complete United Nations victory.

The charter of Poland says, in part: "The Polish Republic * * * will be responsible to a true national assembly, fully representative of the common will of the people. * * * Poland will guarantee the rights and liberties of all citizens loyal to the Republic, regardless of national, religious, or racial differences. * * * Full freedom of conscience and expression, of association, and assembly will be guaranteed to all."

Here speaks the incisive wisdom of a Pulaski, the burning desire for freedom of a Kosciuszko.

America remembers these apostles of liberation. Kosciuszko gave his services to 13 loosely connected colonies on the eastern seaboard, struggling against unbearable tyranny. The America of those days could offer no opportunity for gain to a recognized military strategist. In fact, there was a strong probability that defeat would be the lot of the Continentals. But Kosciuszko the liberator had no thought for material gain. His only wish was to see men free. He gathered his ragged frontiersmen about him and carefully and diligently taught them the use of the unfamiliar cannon. When the beaten enemy marched through the silent ranks of Americans at Yorktown, when Cornwallis surrendered, the enemy knew well the deadly accuracy of American cannon fire.

It was for this achievement that Tadeusz Kosciusko is still known as the father of American artillery.

What did America give to this hero? He was recognized in his lifetime by a vote of gratitude from our Congress and by being granted the rank of brigadier general. But America gave him—and his beloved Poland through him—more than gratitude, more than military honors. America transmitted through Kosciuszko to Poland the letter and spirit of our own Declaration of Independence to be embodied in the Polish Constitution of 1791.

America remembers Casimir Pulaski on Polish Constitution Day. Pulaski, like Kosciuszko, fought for American independence. George Washington, in recommending Pulaski to the Continental Congress for a commission, wrote: "This gentleman has been, like us, engaged in defending the liberty and independence of his country, and has sacrificed his fortune to his zeal for those objects."

Pulaski sacrificed more than his fortune for the liberty of the 13 colonies on the eastern seaboard. He gave his life in the Battle of Savannah. Pulaski could not take the cheering message of American freedom back to his native Poland; but he will carry the undying love of all free Americans with him through all eternity.

Only last month, another Pole—and another Kasimir; this time, Gen. Kasimir Z. Sosnkowski, commander of the Second Polish Corps with the British Eighth Army in Italy declared that his men, fighting on the European Continent for the first time in 5 long years, are "eager to fight their way back home."

Yes. The organized Poles in the organized Polish Army units want to fight their way back home and they are doing a gallant job of it. But back "home" in Poland there are those who never left their country, who have never stopped fighting. I refer to the determined, courageous Polish underground.

Recently, Reichsminister Dr. Hans Frank made this remarkable statement: "There is no Polish National Movement of Resistance, despite the declarations from Britain."

The Nazi Governor General said there was no resistance. Who wrecked the eight trains in the Krakow area in January alone?

The Nazi Governor General said there was no resistance. If that were true, why did the Nazi High Command order all trains to proceed at the breath-taking speed of 72 miles per hour, while all forests have been cut down within hundreds of yards of rail-lines? Could it have been that those forests might have concealed Polish saboteurs?

The Nazi Governor General said that there was no resistance. "Several thousand" more Nazi police have been added to the already large force in Warsaw since the beginning of 1944. Could it have been that the Nazis were not short of manpower after all? Or did they need those policemen to try to hold resistance in check?

The Nazi Governor General said there was no resistance. Yet, in Warsaw during March, 1944, 20 Gestapo officers were condemned and executed by the Polish underground.

I think that the Nazi Governor General has now changed his mind about there being no organized Polish National Movement of Resistance for, quite recently, the train on which he was riding was blown up by Polish patriots. Dr. Frank escaped without injury. But, Dr. Frank's escape is only temporary. Eventually the Nazi Governor General will be tried for his crimes and receive the same just punishment meted out to all enemies of Polish freedom.

What has been accomplished against the enemy within Poland has been matched by the efforts of Free Poland on the offensive. In every phase of Allied military and naval activity Poles are fighting for liberation. The exploits of the Polish Army under General Anders have won the deserved praise of United Nations military leaders. Polish aerial squadrons, operating with the R. A. F. and the U. S. A. A. F., have dropped over 10,000 tons of bombs on vital enemy industrial and transportation targets. The Polish Navy, active in the invasions of Sicily and Italy, has ranged from the Mediterranean to the North Atlantic, seeking out and destroying enemy shipping.

The part played by Poland in the United Nations' war effort is strongly summarized in President Raczkiewicz's broadcast on New Year's Day 1944. This Polish statesman said: "On the 1st of September 1939, our nation took first place in the ranks of those who defend the freedom of nations and of men. Though overwhelmed by the armed might of the enemy, the Polish nation continues to fight on at the cost of casualties that at times are greater not only proportionately but in actual number than those of our allies on the field of battle. This fight is carried on at the cost of physical and moral suffering without a parallel in history. It is not fought in vain, but constitutes our great contribution to the present war."

It is obvious to all the world that the Poland of 1944 is determined to perpetuate the ideals embodied in the constitution of 1791, the anniversary of whose signing is commemorated by all freemen on May 3.

As Poland was a leader in constitutional government, so Poland has stepped to the front in the establishment of relationships that will help to make this a better world after the United Nations' victory.

The joint declaration of the Polish and Czechoslovak Governments, issued on November 11, 1940, says, in part: "Poland and Czechoslovakia, closing once and for all the period of past recriminations and disputes, and taking into consideration the community of their fundamental interests, are determined on the conclusion of this war to enter as independent and sovereign states into a closer political and economic association. Moreover, both governments express the hope that in this cooperation, based on respect for the freedom of nations, the principles of democracy, and the dignity of man, they will also be joined by other countries in that part of the European Continent."

In 1791 Poland was in the vanguard of the free and enlightened nations of the world. Today, a century and a half later, Poland occupies the same exalted position in a world that needs Polish courage and Polish independence of thought more than these qualities have ever been needed before in all history.

America at War on the Farm Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Selden Menefee, which was published recently in the Washington Post. The article which is entitled "America at War," deals with the situation on the farm front.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA AT WAR

(By Selden Menefee)

ON THE FARM FRONT

We city folks rarely stop to think what the farmer is up against in wartime. We are apt simply to accept the abundance of fresh vegetables, chickens, and eggs on the market this time of year as our due.

This remark is inspired not by the fine collection of blisters I acquired planting my Victory garden on Sunday but by a conversation I had a few days ago with a man who runs a 300-acre dairy farm out in Loudoun County, Va.

My friend, who is a real dirt farmer, gave me the latest war news from the rural front. "The late spring," he said, "is hitting us in the midriff. All the planting is coming on at once."

Planting, he pointed out, is the first and lesser of the farmer's two annual crises, the major one being the harvest season. Summer and fall will be when things will really get tough this year.

About a year ago the Gallup poll asked farmers what their biggest problem was. Three-fourths of them answered the labor shortage, one-fifth, lack of equipment.

Farmer's problems

The farmer's problems are the same today but more acute, with the draft taking more and more young men and farm machinery wearing out. Selective service regulations have been lenient enough on farm labor, but it should be noted that the great majority of farm lads under 26 have refused to accept deferment, so that the farm labor shortage grows constantly more troublesome.

My farm friend tells me that because he lacks men and machines he is cutting his corn production from 60 to 30 acres this year, despite the Government's request for more corn for making industrial alcohol. The reason? Just this:

Last year the drought got a third of his 60-acre corn crop. That couldn't be helped. What really hurt was that he lost half of the remainder for lack of labor or machinery to harvest it.

"If I could get the equipment, I'd plant 65 or 70 acres of corn this year," he said. "But I can't afford to have it rot in the field. All I need is a corn planter with a fertilizer attachment and a corn harvester, though I can do well enough with hand labor if I can get it. I've had my application in for a corn planter for 2 years, but no results."

In the forage crops things are almost as bad. Last year hay dried up or molded in the Virginia fields for lack of labor and equipment to cut it and bring it in. Yet before the winter was over most Loudoun County dairymen were buying baled hay from Wisconsin at fancy prices to feed their cows.

Haymaking machinery much nearer by stood idle at the time. Such inefficiency is criminal in wartime.

There are two ways to help the farmer get his crops in. First and most obvious is the pooling of farm equipment. Great Britain, Russia, and other warring countries have long been doing this. But many American farmers who own much-needed machinery have been reluctant to lend or rent it when it was not in use, largely out of fear that if breakage occurred, replacements would be hard to get.

The answer might be to have county agents everywhere register farm machinery, encourage the haves to rent it out at a fair price to the have-nots on an orderly, planned basis, and guarantee replacements if and when they are needed.

Rank communism

The Farm Bureau Federation, which would have us think that the farmers' main worry is getting farm price ceilings raised or scrapped altogether, would no doubt call this rank communism. But if the program were on a voluntary basis, with patriotism and the desire for public esteem the only motives for participation, few farmers would listen to such sniping—although some politicians might.

The second thing that should be done is for us sedentary workers to get out and help with our hands this summer. In Lawrenceville, Ga., or Carthage, Tex., the whole town turns out to help when there is a shortage of cotton pickers. But despite a determined drive by the United States Employment Service last summer, relatively few city people turned out to help.

From May to October there will be a continuous demand for seasonal farm workers, experienced or otherwise. And more than 700,000 men and women will be needed over the country for canning and processing foods, according to the War Manpower Commission.

Those who went to the farms for their vacations last year found the experience a satisfying one—and not without profit, for farm wages are good these days. In Maryland, young people on vacation harvested 80 percent of the bean crop.

The United States Employment Service sent 1,036 District of Columbia workers to Camp Timberville, Va., las. year. These vacationists alone picked 343,740 bushels of apples, 40,440 bushels of tomatoes, and 20,220 bushels of peaches.

This year, unless Selective Service intervenes, the peak of the haying season will find me wielding a pitchfork or driving a team of Percherons out in Loudoun County. So help me.

Presentation of Gold Medal Award to Mme. Chiang Kai-shek by the New York Southern Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 28 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from the record of the fifty-eighth annual dinner of the New York Southern Society, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City on December 3, 1943, and the annual meeting of the Society at the University Club, New York City, on April 16, 1943, in connection with the presentation of the Annual Gold Medal Award of Distinction and Honor to Mme. Chiang Kai-shek.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GEORGE A. SLOAN (president of the society). Mr. Governor, Mr. Minister, honored guests, ladies and gentlemen, each year since 1932 it has been the custom of the New York Southern Society to award a medal of distinction to some outstanding man or woman who has rendered the most unusual service in the perpetuation of the traditions and history of the South. While I say that it is the custom to make this award each year, the fact of the matter is that the award committee has been so insistent in its own deliberations as to the nature of the service rendered which would entitle the recipient to the award that there have been several years in which no award was made.

It will interest Governor Arnall and our other good friends from Georgia to know that the last award was made to Miss Margaret Mitchell for her great contribution which will rank for all time as one of the classics of American literature. I refer, of course, to Gone With the Wind.

Since the inception of the New York Southern Society in 1886 it has had for one of its principal objectives the perpetuation of the traditions of the South. And I know of no more appropriate manner in which the society has lived up to this objective than in the granting of this annual award.

This year the award will be presented by a distinguished son of old Kentucky, who has made for himself a great name in the business affairs of our community and Nation. As my predecessor during the past 2 years he rendered conspicuous service as president of the New York Southern Society. No president has done more for the society in perpetuating its ideals and in strengthening its membership. It is fitting, therefore, that your executive committee has honored him once more by asking him to present this year's award, which has great international significance in addition to its deep meaning to members of this society and to our beloved Southland—Mr. Floyd W. Jefferson.

Mr. FLOYD W. JEFFERSON. Mr. Sloan, ladies and gentlemen, members of the New York Southern Society, our friends and guests, in absentia is a term which in these troublous times awakens poignant memories of those dear to us who are far away.

In absentia is the term which Mme. Chiang Kai-shek used in graciously accepting the New York Southern Society's award of its medal of distinction, with regrets that she could not receive it from our hands in person.

Fortunate indeed are we that she designated as her personal representative to receive this award for transmission to her our honored guest Mr. Liu Chieh, Minister Plenipotentiary to Washington of the Chinese Republic, that great Government which is our stanch ally and steadfast friend.

Most of us recall that the distinguished Chinese gentleman, Charlie Soong, the father of Mai Ling Soong, our beloved Mme. Ch'ang Kai-shek, was for many years of his youth a welcome guest in the home of Gen. Julian Carr, of Durham, N. C.

There was instilled in him so great a love for our Southland that he chose to send his three lovely daughters to America and to the South for their education, and Mai Ling went to Fairmount School in North Carolina, spent 5 years at Wesleyan College, Macon, Ga., and attended Piedmont College in Demorest, Ga., before going to Wellesley.

No one from a foreign shore has, in our memory, so captivated our people and won the admiration of America as has Mme. Chiang Kai-shek.

It would be useless repetition to review her accomplishments and her contribution to the cause of the Allies. It is for these accomplishments that we honor her, but it is for her enduring charm that we love her.

The American people treasure the memory of Mme. Chiang Kai-shek's visit; we have not forgotten Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's remarkable document, "I bear my witness," nor his wife's beautiful, "I confess my faith."

It was Hugh Gordon Miller, himself a recipient of this medal, who at the annual meeting of the New York Southern Society, offered in beautiful language befitting the occasion a resolution from which I shall quote only a single phrase: "Whereas Mme. Chiang Kai-shek has, by her shining example, added new distinction to the history and traditions of our Southland, be it resolved that the New York Southern Society hereby award to her its gold medal of distinction and honor."

It was Judge William Harman Black, a past president of this society, who, in words equally appropriate, became the seconder of the motion, which was acclaimed with unanimous approval.

And now, our honored friend, Mr. Liu Chieh, will you accept on behalf of Mme. Chiang Kai-shek this small token of our love, admiration, and esteem.

Hon. LIU CHIEH (Minister Plenipotentiary of China). In her address before the United States Congress Her Excellency, Mme. Chiang, said that coming to the United States made her feel she was coming home.

Particularly had she this warmth and affection for the South because, as Mr. Jefferson has just said, madame received her early schooling in Georgia and North Carolina.

There she spent what is usually considered as the most impressionable years of a person's life. It is natural that she acquired not only a great love for the South, but a real knowledge and understanding of its people which she cherishes to this day. Through madame the Chinese people also learn much about the southland so that we have come to know you best for your friendship, your hospitality, and your generous spirit, even as you have come to look upon her as the embodiment of the wisdom and culture of China, and of the indomitable courage which has sustained the Chinese people in their long and bitter struggle for democracy and freedom.

It may be recalled that last summer she took special interest in returning to the South, visiting both Atlanta and Macon, before embarking on her homeward journey to China, and I believe the distinguished Governor of Georgia can bear me out when I say she enjoyed immensely renewing the acquaintance of old scenes and old friends in the South.

I know it will afford Her Excellency genuine pleasure to receive, from the Southern Society of New York, this award of distinction, which, in a larger sense, constitutes another manifestation of the great friendship which exists between the Chinese and American peoples. I, therefore, feel it a great honor to accept this gold medal on Her Excellency's behalf.

Hon. ELLIS ARNALL (Governor of Georgia). I am delighted tonight to be present when the New York Southern Society does honor to that eminent woman of the world, Mme. Chiang Kai-shek. We in Georgia claim her as our own. It was in the Empire State of the South that she began her educational experiences. It was here that she developed that pleasing English pronunciation and speech which have won the esteem and affection of the entire people of the whole civilized world.

We are pleased tonight that Mme. Chiang is the second Georgia woman who has been honored by the Society. The other, Margaret Mitchell, who glorified the old South, was the first.

We are proud of our southern women. I am glad to see so many lovely ladies here tonight. We southerners have ever idealized our womanhood.

Our women at times sparkle encouragement, inspiration and challenge to us. They sparkle as do the bubbles of champagne, at times so brilliantly. At times they comfort us like the deep red burgundy or the velvety cordial—mellow and soothing. Our women ever remain for us our inspiration, our ideals.

Woman's proper niche in Southern history is secure. She enshrines her sweetness in loving hearts. And so it is that a belief still currently popular in the South is the definite conclusion that God in His infinite wisdom made women but a little lower than the angels in the heavens above.

Mme. Chiang Kai-shek has exemplified the influence exerted in this modern world by women.

It is most fitting that in selecting the individual to whom your society makes this year's award, you should have chosen the very great woman whose courage and determination have become the symbol of the courage and the determination of her people. I take special pride in the choice, because she has been a part-time Georgian. So I know however the great heart of Mme. Chiang Kai-shek is exalted as China's sons march toward sure victory to the strains of their national anthem, the feet of Mei Ling dance and her eyes mist over when the band plays "Dixie".

A few months ago, just before her visit to America ended, Mme. Chiang came back to Georgia, to Wesleyan College, the venerable institution, oldest chartered college for women in America, which she attended as a girl. As she chatted with Mrs. Arnall and me across the breakfast table, I saw that all the world has shrunk to those dimensions: that all the world was one entity; that nowhere in all the world can some men be free until all men are free.

RESOLUTION PRESENTED BY HUGH GORDON MILLER AND SECONDED BY JUDGE WILLIAM HARMON BLACK, FORMER JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. MILLER. I desire to present a resolution. It has been hastily drawn but it has been approved by the president, Mr. Jefferson, and its purpose by the incoming president, Mr. Sloan. I shall be glad to hear any suggestions as to alterations or corrections.

"Whereas Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, one of the greatest—and be it remembered, we of this society measure greatness through a contemplation of the ideals, purposes and achievements of characters like Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Lee—whereas said Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, judged by that American measure of true greatness one of the world's greatest personages, and perhaps the very greatest woman of modern times, was reared during a large part of the formative period of her life, and actually received most of her elementary education and religious training (planting firmly in her youth the foundation of her remarkable and inspiring life of human service) in the State of Georgia, in the heart of southern culture and our best southern traditions.

"The perfect English she employs in speaking is real composite American, a happy combination of the smoothness of the mid-South and the snap of New England, where she finished her college education. She thus has a heritage which she recently described in words that recall scenes in so many typical southern homes, as follows: 'I believe that my childhood training influenced me greatly, even though I was more or less rebellious at the time. It must often have grieved my beloved mother that I found family prayers tiresome and frequently found myself conveniently thirsty at the moment, so that I had to slip out of the room.' (This scene at prayer, she thus describes, is certainly in accord with our best southern traditions. Most of us went through that ourselves.)

"It is apparent, not only from this quotation, but from the whole of her recently published 'profession of religious faith' that Mme. Chiang Kai-shek was grounded in the Christian religion and convinced of the unfailing power of prayer and communion with the Supreme Architect of this Universe, in her childhood home in Georgia in those southern religious institutions, Fairmount School, in North Carolina; Piedmont College; and Wesleyan College of Macon, Ga.—Mme. Chiang Kai-shek lived for 5 years at Wesleyan College. A special writer in yesterday's Evening Sun truly observed that 'In a confession of faith by Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, of China, we Americans get a more glowing testimonial to real Christian principles than we have heard from any American spiritual leader in years.' Madame Chiang's father long resided in a real southern home and attended Trinity College, later Duke University, in the South, and attended Vanderbilt University. It is apparent that the family had a religious and cultural background. Let us believe and expect that the fervent prayers of this great and good woman for her people and for all suffering humanity at this hour will be answered, and answered soon. As she so fervently prays for the redemption of her people and this distracted world during the Valley Forge of China, she reminds us of Washington, praying amid the cold, hunger, and desolation of our own Valley Forge. We know that her prayers, like those of Washington, will surely be answered; and,

"Whereas her noble life and her illustrious achievements in her own right, as well as incident to her exalted station as the wife and helpmate of her great husband, Gen. Chiang Kai-shek, leader of our ally, the Chinese Republic, and its invincible armies—which have been fighting for more than 5 long years amid almost insurmountable difficulties for China's freedom from foreign aggression, conquest and slavery, has inspired us all. We realize daily more and more that China has been holding back from similar trespass upon us the organized armed hordes of a lustful and barbarous invading enemy, an enemy having neither restraint nor humanity; thereby giving the rest of the world's democracies a chance to prepare to defend themselves from similar destruction and enslavement; and,

"Whereas the said Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, though physically ill and weary from those long years of effort in that great cause of the peace-loving people of one of the oldest and most historic civilizations, as well as all the other democracies, is visiting our country, inspiring our people, and appealing for a continuance and increase of aid to her people in the common struggle; and

"Whereas we wish this great lady to realize that she is still claimed and acclaimed as another great light of our Southland, a light, as it were, of the Orient, holding out the lamp of American liberty and culture in one hand, and in the other hand holding up the history and culture of the Orient. We wish her to know that her memory and record will never fade or grow dim in that Southland of her youth and that her example will never grow less inspiring for the hearts of all our American people everywhere, regardless of State or section. Mme. Chiang Kai-shek with her transcendent faith in our common God, and in liberty, progress, peace, and justice for all nations, and her words and prayers and her noble acts in support of her sublime faith in Almighty God, and the enduring principles which embody the hopes of all humanity everywhere for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, will always be a continuing inspiration to the people of America and to democratic peoples everywhere; and

"Whereas Mme. Chiang Kai-shek by her shining example along those lines has added new distinction to the history and traditions of our Southland, which this society was organized especially to perpetuate and record: It is hereby

"Resolved, That the New York Southern Society hereby awards its gold medal of distinction and honor to Mme. Chiang Kai-shek."

Mr. MILLER. We will but honor ourselves in thus honoring the member of a family which contained not only Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, but Madam Kung and Mme. Sun Yat Sen, all of whom once lived in our southland.

Mme. Chiang Kai-shek attended Piedmont College at Demarest, Ga., and Mme. Sun Yat Sen, the younger sister, attended Wesleyan College at Macon, Ga. The father, Mr. Charles Soong, as a boy lived as a member of the family of that distinguished Confederate veteran, Gen. Julian S. Carr, at Durham, N. C., whose son, Mr. Claiborne Carr is a prominent member of this society. Madam Chiang and a sister attended summer school at Fairmount, N. C. We mention these details to show how the whole family were identified with the South.

In a beautiful letter to the president of Piedmont College in 1938, she described those early days and those people in the following words:

"They had come from far in the hills, many having taught primary school for years to get the funds necessary to attend Piedmont. All these people were greatly interested in me, and, for my part, I began to get an insight into the lives of those who had to struggle for a living and for even the means to acquire an elementary education. I suppose my contact with these people as a girl influenced my interest in the lot of those who were not born with a silver spoon in their mouths, a contact which I may never have experienced otherwise. It made me see their sterling worth, because, after all, they and their kind constitute the backbone of any nation."

Little did the young people among those hills of Georgia dream that they were playing and plodding to school with a girl whose name one day would rank with Joan of Arc and Florence Nightingale. Perhaps it was no misfortune on the other hand that that little girl landed among the good Christian people who were descendants of the English colonists who followed Oglethorpe to Georgia, seeking and finding civil and religious liberty.

The inscription on the medal might read in abbreviated substance, as follows:

"Presented to Mme. Chiang Kai-shek in appreciation of her great achievements, which have added new distinction to the history and traditions of the Southern States of the United States of America."

For the first time the South has literally taken a foreign-born person to its heart as well as its homes. It has for the first time unofficially, but nonetheless actually, adopted such a foreign-born citizen of another country, though most of the original 13 States approved the award of citizenship to Lafayette. It is therefore appropriate that the first person (certainly the first woman) to be even unofficially adopted by the people of the Southern States of the United States of America, should be that great lady, Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, of our great and heroic sister republic of China.

Address by Jos. J. Pietrafesa, Before the Roman Social and Athletic Club, Auburn, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Joseph J. Pietrafesa, before the Roman Social and Athletic Club, Auburn, N. Y.:

Mr. Toastmaster, honored guests, members of the Roman Social and Athletic Club, ladies and gentlemen, this is truly a memorable occasion. Mortgage burning occurs so seldom, and is such an event, that it is most fitting that a party should commemorate the deed, and you are to be congratulated on your achievement. Although the Government wants us to save waste paper, I don't think they will mind your destroying such a small piece, but a piece which has been hanging over your heads so long that you are taking particular delight in destroying it. Personally, I am enjoying every minute of it, and for no small reason. After all, we are neighbors, and we have something very much in common—we eat the same brand macaroni products.

A representative gathering such as this is always the target for a high-sounding patriotic address, and particularly for the past 3 years I am certain you have heard many of them, and I am rather hesitant to embark upon a discourse with that theme. But I am afraid I would be rather remiss if I didn't say a few words befitting the times, and knowing the background of most of the assemblage, I know that you will bear with me while I bring a few things to your attention which are most fitting.

The very name of your club indicates the background of its membership, and this background is something that we all are very proud of. It is a priceless heritage, and one that has had no small part in the building of the present great American Republic, which is our home and our country.

It gives me great pride as an American citizen of Italian origin to be able to say, and to have what I am about to say confirmed by the utterances of the President of the United States and other high public officials, that the American of Italian extraction is second to none in his loyalty, patriotism, and devotion to country.

Americans of Italian origin come by their loyalty most naturally, for by long tradition they are as peace loving, idealistic, and democratic at heart as any other people in the world.

The patriotism of Americans of Italian extraction and their devotion to democratic ideals can best be seen in the war statistics of the day. There are now roughly 10,000,000 Americans in the armed forces of our country, and about 1,000,000 of them, which is 10 percent, are young men of Italian extraction. Ten percent, mind you, although the census records reveal that of the total population in the United States, only 4 percent are Italians or of Italian extraction.

Fifteen hundred American boys of Italian extraction from one Catholic parish in Syracuse are in the armed forces. This is more than twice the number of boys that have left from either of the two largest parishes in Syracuse. Needless to say, the parish which has contributed the 1,500 boys is not one of the large parishes, but its membership is almost 100 percent of Italian extraction.

Americans of Italian extraction are proving with their blood and with their very lives their devotion to the American ideals. There is not one casualty list published by the Army, Navy, or any branch of the service in which Italian names do not prominently appear. Many men of Italian origin have been cited for bravery and courage under fire.

Among the first three Americans who were awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for bravery at Pearl Harbor, one of them was an Italian boy from Brooklyn. Another, First Lieutenant Bianchi, of Minnesota, was also awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for his courageous action beyond the line of duty on Bataan. First Lt. John Boselli, of New York City, won the Distinguished Flying Cross and Oak Leaf Cluster for his extraordinary flying exploits in the Pacific.

Ensign William Tepuni, of San Francisco, was also awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross for outstanding courage and skill which led to the destruction of a German U-boat.

And so the story goes, and so it has gone on for many years past. In your own community, as in ours, there are many American boys of Italian origin of whom both you and our country are most proud, as witness the following members of our armed forces from your community who have by courageous deeds brought themselves to the attention of our country: Marine DePasquale, veteran of Guadalcanal; Technical Sgt. J. J. Alongi, who has been awarded the Silver Star for bravery on the African front; Pvt. Emanuel Ferlandi, who has been awarded the Purple Heart for courageous service on the African front; Pvt. John Mazzeo, prisoner of war in Germany, and his cousin, Sgt. Michael Mazzeo, who has been awarded the Flying Cross for transporting planes from England to Africa; Cadet Daniel Melie, who was killed while operating a training plane; Pvt. Bernard Capinello, and many others too numerous to mention.

Italians in America gave a stirring account of themselves in the last war, and Italians in America have given substantial contributions to the greatness and progress of our country from the very beginning of our country's history, even before the Revolutionary War. Italians were among the first Europeans to set foot on the American continent, and they have continued to come in a steady stream since the days of Christopher Columbus and Caboto. Caboto you will recognize in your history books as John Cabot. One of the earliest explorers of northwestern Minnesota, and the discoverer of the sources of the Mississippi River, was an Italian, Giacomo Beltrami. I am sure you have all heard of La Salle and his famous expedition to the Gulf of Mexico, but how many of you know that his chief of staff was the Italian Enrico Tonti? Enrico's younger brother, Alfonso Tonti, was one of the founders of the city of Detroit, and its governor for 12 years. His daughter was the first white child born in the West, and his wife and Madam Cadillac were the first white women to settle in Detroit.

Among the signers of the Declaration of Independence you will find the name of William Paca, of Italian ancestry. Proof of his ancestry is established by a letter which he wrote upon his return from a visit to Italy in 1760, in which he declared that he had visited the land of his ancestors.

Perhaps the most outstanding Italian figure in the history of Italy's contribution to this country is that of Felippo Mazzei. He came to America at the suggestion of Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin. He worked incessantly to change the attitude of the American people, and he actually preceded Thomas Payne, the American liberal, and Thomas Jefferson in their criticism of the then tyrannical British Government. He was a great friend of Jefferson, and some of the very words found in the Declaration of Independence have their origin in an article which Mazzei wrote in 1774, and which Jefferson had published in a Virginia newspaper.

Another outstanding Italian of colonial days was Colonel Francesco Vigo. It was he who made possible the victory of Gen. George Rogers Clarke in 1779, and without this victory, historians say it is very possible that the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan, which comprised the old Northwest Territory, would today form a part of Canada.

The roster of the United States Navy from its very inception shows many an Italian name. The Italians were of invaluable assistance to the American Navy during the war with Tripoli. Records in Washington show that there were more than 200 Italian officers in the Civil War, including four generals: Spinola, DeCesnola, Ferraro, Fardella, and a host of other high officers, and that they fought with valor is attested to by the awards of several Congressional Medals of Honor to them.

Is it any wonder then that I started out by saying that we had no small part in the building of our great country?

More than that, we have contributed to every phase of our country's history. With the advent of the nineteenth century, the coming of Italians to the United States increased. Religious and political exiles, especially Garibaldi, pioneers in search of new life in a new world, all found their way to this country. The fine reputation carved out for themselves by Italian artists and educators in America is common knowledge, and our contribution is found also in the actual physical building and growth of our country, in the history of our communications and all industrial enterprises in America, and whenever danger threatened this country and the cry went out for volunteers, Americans of Italian origin have always sprung to the van.

I bring these facts to your attention, not because there is any reason for us to protest our loyalty and devotion to this country, as there is no need to talk of that. Actions speak louder than words, and on the basis of the record of action, American citizens of Italian ancestry can turn their faces to the sun and be fiercely proud of their heritage and of the contributions that Italians have made to the greatness of our country.

Were Columbus, Caboto, Vespucci, Tonti, and the other great explorers of the American continent here today, they could well feel a surging pride over the fact that their countrymen and their descendants have immeasurably helped to carry the torch of civilization and progress in this new world.

Today as united Americans we are standing in defense of our homes, our institutions, and our democratic way of life. True that we are doing our duty, but let it not be forgotten that while the American citizens of Italian origin are responding generously, freely, and with their lives, it has been a stern and bitter test, for up to a short time ago, the country of their fathers was on the other side of the fence, and to their everlasting credit, let it be noted and said, that during all that time when Italy was an enemy, not one Italian in this country was charged with espionage, treason, or sabotage.

They have been tried in the crucible of war, and they have been found equal to the full measure of loyalty and patriotism.

Let it be also said and noted that on the battlefield, in the air, or on the sea, the Americans of Italian origin are proudly doing their duty, and on the home front, in the fields, in the factory, in every branch of civilian defense, yea, even in the purchase of War bonds, all are performing their duty and contributing their all for the survival of our way of life, our civilization, for the betterment of all mankind.

In the name of the countless Italian families in this country whose blood has been spilled in the defense of America and in the defense of all mankind, for the defense of America also means the defense of all mankind, I ask you to join me in saluting America, our country, united and indivisible, and affirm once more that we American citizens of Italian origin know our duty and will not falter, even unto death.

The Commandant Talks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, as a former marine, I am happy to have the privilege to insert into the RECORD a copy of the talk given by Lt. Gen. Alexander A. Vandegrift, Commandant of the United States Marine Corps at the Associated Press meeting in New York City on April 24, 1944.

Just as marines waste no time in gaining their objectives so does General Vandegrift waste no words in making a speech. What he has to say is to the point and one cannot help but feel a renewed source of pride in the corps after reading his speech. It is indeed worth the attention of every Member of this House:

It is always a pleasure to speak before the press, and I believe that I have before me today as high powered a gathering of newspapermen as I have ever seen. The prospect of speaking to such a gathering of editors and publishers caused at first a slight feeling of uneasiness, for if the press of this country is any example, the publishers and editors behind that press are keen men of sagacity and knowledge, quick to perceive and pounce upon any hazy or ill-considered statements by a visiting speaker.

But I called to mind the fine newspapermen I have known overseas and since assuming my duties in Washington. I remember all of them as congenial fellows, energetic and dependable, who liked to talk shop about the war in the Pacific, and who could do so with unusual insight and intelligence. If that were true of the field representatives of the men before whom I speak today, it should be especially true of the men here in this room. And so I will talk shop about the war in the Pacific.

The war against Japan has been the primary concern of United States marines, and it will continue to be. It is especially interesting for a marine to look back 2 years and compare the present scene with the picture of the Pacific in those hectic months of 1942. The comparison is pleasant and as the war in the mandated islands and in the South Pacific groups goes forward toward the Japanese homeland, the comparison becomes increasingly pleasant.

To you, this comparison has been brought home by the corps of foreign correspondents who have landed, shoulder to shoulder with marines, on many a bitterly contested beach. Through those public relations officers whose privilege it is to guide and inform the civilian press I have received high praise of the newsmen who have accompanied us. They seem to be honored when we call them "good marines." And there are many who are just that. We have a close tie with them through our enlisted correspondents. Our news services of this country have done a fine job on the reporting of the war, and it is gratifying to look through the files of news stories of early 1942 and early 1944 and to draw comparisons.

So gratifying, in fact that we are in danger of forgetting that black winter of 1941–42. We should never make that mistake. We were not ready. But that is a reason, not an excuse for the shattering news that seemed to come in with such depressing regularity in the early days. Why we were not ready is not a problem to discuss here. But it is a problem for every member of the American information services, if I may so characterize the press of this Nation, to think of as we approach victory; for in our democracy the Nation gets what the people want, and your publications are the greatest educational outlet to the people that we have. We must never let ourselves be so unprepared again.

It was the Marine Corps' privilege to lead the first campaign against the land masses which must be retaken. We were fortunate in the Marine Corps in those days, for I dare say there was not a single unit of any size that did not have in it men who had been in action before. I do not intend to discuss the various small wars and minor skirmishes which marines have observed here and there around the world. I will say, however, that a leavening of old timers who have been in fights before, who have seen shots fired in anger, is the most beneficial human ingredient that a green outfit, going into action for the first time can have. On August 7 at Guadalcanal we had a measure of that leavening—marines who had learned the craft of jungle fighting in widely scattered places. Now there is no outfit going into a fight that does not have men in it who have fought the Japanese, and four marine divisions have attacked as units. The young American men have an aptitude for jungle fighting and it developed quickly.

We were fortunate also in the outcome of a certain gamble. For many years we had been constantly experimenting and developing the technique of that most difficult of all military-naval maneuvers, the amphibious operation. We had known since the twenties that if ever we fought the Japanese we would have to fight an amphibious war in the Pacific islands. We had practiced at Midway and in the Caribbean. Guadalcanal was to tell us whether our amphibious principles were sound or whether we were not yet ready for the test. I do not like to contemplate what the consequences might have been if we had not been ready. But, as events proved, we were. Our techniques were by no means perfect; we learned many valuable lessons, both in landing operations and, as I have said, in jungle fighting. But the basic training principles were sound.

Current in the pages of your newspapers are the stories of the atoll battles, the shattering bombardments, followed by the amphibious assaults. Kwajalein and Eniwetok were the results—in light casualties—of the hard lessons we learned elsewhere. But the remaining islands on the Tokyo road are not all atolls. Some are volcanic islands, choked with jungle growth and honeycombed with caves. There will be many places where naval gunfire will not be possible and where bombs will not penetrate. As we go closer to Japan I have no doubt that the enemy will redouble his fury in defense and counterattack. His fleet, now giving the lie to his propaganda broadcasts in some hidden base, might come out. And we may take heavy casualties. (The enemy will take more, I assure you.)

But in 2 years we have learned much of this close, individual war and our technical equipment has improved by bounds. This learning and development does not stop with technique of battle on a grand scale or new landing craft. It goes into the very heart of our organizations. Since December 7, 1941, in a thousand jungle skirmishes, we have built up a tremendous volume of experience.

A minor but representatively far reaching example of the fruits of this experience is our new rifle squad, which I mention here because it affects every marine in every rifle regiment. Where formerly our squads were 10 or 12 men under a leader and his assistant, now each squad is an integrated unit of three separate "fire teams" each with its own automatic weapon, antitank grenadier, and riflemen; and each man is a fighting unit. It is a good organization for American marines.

I do not pretend to say that we have learned everything there is to learn about jungle and atoll fighting. But we have learned a lot. The campaigns on New Britain and Bougainville go forward faster not because the enemy is tired or low in morale, for as long as he is alive he is dangerous. Rather the advances are more rapid because 2 years of war experience, coupled with 2 years of enthusiastic war production and research, with the whole entrusted to young energetic Americans, who know the resources at their disposal, is a well-nigh unbeatable combination.

We must not assume, however, that all of our successes spring from our own capabilities. The Japanese gave us a respite in May 1942, when they decided to stop their march south long enough to take a good long breath and to build their new possessions into layers of protective steel around the Japanese homeland. Their assumption—and in May 1942, there was apparently little to indicate that it was not a wise assumption—was that we were so shaken that they would have plenty of time to refit for further conquests.

The enemy leaders believed it would be physically impossible for the United States to make in 1 or 2, or even 3 years, the shift to a war basis which had taken them more than a decade. They were confident that by the time the United States, which they considered effete and decadent, had built up its forces, the fortified belts around the new empire of Japan would be well nigh impregnable. They were almost right about the fortifications. Let no one tell you that our first atoll in the Gilberts was easy. The thing that tipped the scales and caused that atoll to become an allied base was an intangible virility in our people. That was where the Japanese had made their biggest mistake. They knew our productive capacity from firsthand observation. They knew our reserves of raw material from the same source, but they considered us, as a people, too effete and decadent to take the kind of war they would force on us.

Perhaps, if we had waited and let them consolidate in the extensive manner they wished, their fortifications might have stopped us. In the light of recent events on Cape Gloucester, Bougainville, and the central Pacific, I doubt it. We would have taken more casualties, but we would have taken our objective too. At any rate, we did not allow them to rest unmolested while they built up their gains. Although not prepared for an offensive of great size in the summer of 1942, we knew that we had to strike back, divert them from their purpose and at the same time prepare for something that would be more than a diversion. We hit Guadalcanal and today our forces roll the enemy up the north coast of New Britain and our pilots fly unchallenged over Rabaul. It is a source of satisfaction to me to remember that the division which I took into Guadalcanal is now fighting its way toward the bastion of Rabaul from the west.

We have the power in the Pacific. We have the trained men and battle-wise units. Everywhere we strike, we strike hard. The reports from the field must draw grunts from the impassive war lords in Tokyo. The enemy will fight until he is beaten. There might even be leaders of his who still think they can win the war, that we will grow tired, and, being soft and effete, quit the fight short of our goal. But those are men who have never faced our troops in battle. There have been few Japanese in this war who have faced our troops in battle since August 7, 1942, and gotten home to tell of it.

Today, then, we strike the enemy on all his fronts and we strike him successfully. But we must not forget those hectic days of early 1942 and the unpreparedness that brought them about.

Feeding Children in Occupied Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over the Blue Network on Friday evening, April 28, 1944:

The object of this talk over the Blue Network is to arouse the humanitarian impulses, to point out the moral responsibilities, and to enlist the support of the American people to help feed the starving children of the occupied nations of Europe before millions of these helpless and innocent victims of the ravages and horrors of war die of starvation and disease.

To those who might think that feeding starving children in Europe would help the Nazis, let me quote from a statement made by Dr. Howard E. Kershner, director of the American Friends Service Committee:

"Hitler wages biological war. He seeks to destroy whole peoples and we play into his hands by doing nothing to save them. Those who survive will be subnormal in mind and body, unable to compete with the Germans in the reconstruction of Europe. The people who established the principles of free speech, free press, free religion, trial by jury, and all the institutions of freemen are dying while the Nazis are still getting enough to eat. What will the future be if the people who believe in human freedom are not here when the war is over?

"It is not a choice between sending food to the children or sending more bombs, for the food would go in neutral ships that cannot be hired for the war effort and would not cost the American people a dollar. No food needed for ourselves or our allies would be sent from this country. It could be brought from South America and South Africa. Half of what we waste here would save the lives of at least 10,000,000 children.

"Impressive testimony was given by spokesmen for the occupied countries showing that the children are dying. In some areas over half of them have tuberculosis and others are threatened. They faint in the schoolrooms. They have stopped growing, are tragically underweight, have no breakfast, a small piece of bread for lunch, with an onion or a turnip, and vegetable soup for supper—perhaps one small portion of meat a week. Millions of children are getting no more than 700 to 900 calories of food daily, about one-third of what we give our children, and not enough to sustain life over a long period of time. I have seen these children with starvation-bloated stomachs. I have seen their blue lips and bloodless faces, their rickety legs and hollow chests. Their sad little eyes accuse us of murder. I have heard the tubercular cough mingled with the cry for bread and I can never forget it."

The Congress has done its part by a unanimous vote. In the Senate the Gillette-Taft bill was adopted, calling upon the State Department to use its influence to persuade the British Government to relax the blockade against food ships. The House of Representatives, also by a unanimous vote, passed House Resolution No. 221, introduced by me, which was practically the same as the Senate resolution except that it specifically included France as one of the occupied countries to which relief was to be sent along with Belgium, Holland, Norway, Poland, and other occupied nations.

The time for action has come. Every week that passes endangers the lives of untold thousands. I am giving the Macedonian cry for help to American men and women, and am asking them to write to Secretary of State Cordell Hull, at Washington, and request him to use his influence with the British Government to carry out the purposes of my resolution to provide immediate relief to the starving women and children in the occupied nations of Europe.

I am asking you to communicate with Secretary Hull because American public opinion is the greatest and most powerful moral force and influence in the world today. I am convinced that if American citizens make known their views and sentiments in favor of feeding the children in the stricken and hungry nations that have been invaded by the Nazi armies, that the British Government will lift the blockade and cooperate to save millions of helpless children from mass starvation within the next 10 months.

I am proud to be the author of the resolution, and doubly honored in having it reported and passed in my name, which is an unusual honor for a Member of the minority party in Congress. It goes to show that there is not the slightest degree of partisanship in it.

Now let me give you the facts and show you the motives that have impelled Congress and thousands of churchmen and leaders in all walks of life to demand that these helpless and innocent children who are facing death from disease and starvation be afforded immediate relief.

Time is of the essence. It will do no good and serve no useful purpose if after Congress has adopted my resolution the State Department fails to persuade 10 Downing Street to cooperate, at least to the extent of permitting food ships to enter European ports. The resolution, without firm action by the State Department would become a mere scrap of paper and a useless gesture.

I take it that it is the unanimous desire and purpose of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate to insist that the State Department make every possible effort to persuade the British Government, our friendly ally, to relax the blockade to permit food to reach millions of destitute children who are now on the verge of starvation. Many of them have already died of starvation and dread disease, such as rickets. Sixty-five percent of them have some form of incipient tuberculosis. Most of them will not survive another winter.

We in America are, indeed, fortunate. We have plenty to eat. We have been, so far, saved from air raids and bombings by the enemy, but these mothers and children in the nations that have been overrun by the Germans are the victims of war and famine. They did not cause the war. Their fathers fought against the Germans until they were defeated and their countries overrun. Today, as a matter of record, we are feeding our own prisoners in Germany. Great Britain, who so far has refused to relax the blockade, is also feeding hers in Germany, and let me say in all fairness I believe the English people feel exactly the way we do, and so does the Parliament. I predict that within a short time the food blockade will be lifted and these occupied nations with their own money, because they have gold and other securities in the United States and England, will be able to buy food and milk and vitamins to send in Swedish ships, neutral ships, to France, Holland, Belgium, Norway, Poland, and other occupied countries.

I believe the British have already about made up their minds, or are going to make up their minds shortly, and this resolution will be very helpful, showing the will of the Congress and of the American people, in favor of relaxing the blockade.

We can understand perfectly well that in the first part of the war, when England was under attack, she could not afford to modify the blockade. Conditions are different today and England is not in any immediate danger of attack. During the last war Herbert Hoover was the administrator of relief in Belgium for 4 long years. He fed 7,000,000 Belgians and kept them alive. It is claimed that not 1 pound of this food went to the German Army or to the German population. Today we are sending to Greece great quantities of food. Turkey and Canada are doing likewise. We are sending it in Swedish ships and keeping young children and mothers in Greece alive, where a short time ago they were on the verge of starvation and death.

It has worked well wherever it has been tried. I know of no military reason for not permitting those occupied countries to buy food, or even for us to put up the money to buy food and let them buy it elsewhere, in Argentina or South Africa, or wherever food may be had.

We have a great moral responsibility in America. We cannot simply sit quietly by and wash our hands like Pontius Pilate, and let millions of innocent children die in the agony of starvation, with bloated stomachs, or die from some dread disease while we evade the issue and the moral responsibility as one of the partners in a war, with food abundant to save these unfortunate and helpless children from death or from living with twisted and distorted bodies and minds.

But one thing I want to make abundantly clear is that if 1 pound of this food goes to the German Army or goes to the German population, then we should stop it immediately. If they did take all of it, it would not be enough to last them 24 hours. At least we would have made an honest effort. At least we would have carried out the desire of the American people to help these starving children and to try to save them from death by starvation and disease.

I predict that unless something is done immediately there will be mass starvation, and millions of these helpless children—Jews and gentiles—will die that terrible death of hunger within the next 10 months. It would be the greatest tragedy of the war, and we would be morally responsible unless we make a sincere and honest effort to persuade the British Government to permit us to ship the much-needed food to the stricken occupied nations.

So I am hoping that not only the Congress will be listened to by No. 10 Downing Street, but I hope that the women of America who are primarily interested in this kind of humanitarian relief legislation will write to the Secretary of State and to the President and ask them to use their influence in accordance with the unanimous request of the Congress of the United States, to start feeding these children before it is too late. Even now millions of European children will be crippled for life; and if food is not forthcoming soon, the future destiny of these occupied nations will be ghastly beyond words to describe.

Hitler's proud boast that the Germans are a superior race will come true to the extent that we allow him to destroy the freedom-loving people of Europe by starvation and to render those that are left subnormal in mind and body. People who have eaten well are indeed superior to those who are undersized and riddled with disease.

It is not only good charity, but the best of strategy to save the starving children of the Nazi-dominated countries of Europe. These people are our friends and allies. They have fought for liberty for centuries before our country was born. They are still fighting for it. They crave our moral support and help. To save their children now would win their friendship and affection forever. We need their help now, and we shall desperately need it in the reconstruction days ahead. How will we ever reestablish democracy as the ruling philosophy of government if we allow Hitler to destroy the democratic peoples of Europe?

At no expense to ourselves, and without using any ships or food which we or our allies need, it is possible to save many of these starving little ones. It is not only a human obligation, but it may well help to shorten the war by building up the morale and resistance of the people of Europe who are opposed to nazi-ism.

We talk glibly of a better world after the war. How can that be attained with diseased, stunted, and physically and mentally warped children who will be the new generation in Europe?

In conclusion, let me remind you that action speaks louder than words in getting food to the stricken nations, and is the only thing that counts. Starving and dying children cannot live on congressional resolutions, eat promises, pledges, and expressions of good will, or survive on pious platitudes and glittering generalities.

Let us act now, in the name of humanity, religion, and America, asking nothing for ourselves but the satisfaction of feeding the hungry, healing the sick, and promoting peace and good will in the devastated and war-torn occupied nations of Europe.

I have just received the following letter from Secretary Cordell Hull, which is self-explanatory:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 28, 1944.

The Honorable HAMILTON FISH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FISH: I have received your letter of April 19, 1944, enclosing a copy of House Resolution 221 and expressing the hope that arrangements will be made immediately to send shipments of relief supplies to the distressed peoples of the occupied countries of Europe.

The Department, in consultation with the authorities responsible for the successful prosecution of the allied war effort, is presently engaged in reexamining this entire question in the light of existing conditions with a view to determining whether the most successful prosecution of the war effort will permit the extension of relief to the peoples of the occupied countries prior to their liberation from Nazi oppression. The views of the legislative branch of our Government, as expressed in House Resolution 221 and Senate Resolution 100, are, of course, being accorded the weight to which they are entitled in connection with the examination of this question.

I can assure you that our approach in this matter is a most sympathetic one and that we have a very real desire immediately to relieve the suffering in the occupied countries if such action is determined to be consistent with the attainment of our primary objective, that of bringing the war to a successful termination at the earliest possible date.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Second Lt. Ernest Childers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 26, 1944

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, it was both my pleasure and my privilege last Monday to meet two prominent heroes of World War No. 2, and holders of the Congressional Medal of Honor, namely, Second Lt. Ernest Childers, an Indian from my own State of Oklahoma, and Sgt. Charles Kelly, an Irishman, of Pittsburgh, Pa.

We had lunch in the Speaker's dining room at the Capitol, together with Mr. Thomas J. Kehoe, assistant national service director of the Disabled American Veterans, Senator GUFFEY, Congressman SCANLON, of Pennsylvania, and the members of the Oklahoma delegation. During luncheon Commando Kelly and Lieutenant Childers, after much insistence, modestly related some of their experiences while serving and fighting at the front.

All Indians and all Irishmen, as well as all other Americans, are mighty proud of these 2 young men, who represent 2 of the 15 living servicemen who have received the Congressional Medal of Honor during this war. The Congressional Medal of Honor has been awarded to 40; however, only 15 are living.

Because he is a very interesting young man, I thought you might be interested in Lieutenant Childers' background and service record, as related in a War Department release, as follows:

SECOND LT. ERNEST CHILDERS

Second Lt. Ernest Childers, 26-year old infantryman, who won the Congressional Medal of Honor, has returned to the United States from Italy under the Army's rotation policy.

The medal was presented to Lieutenant Childers on April 12 in the north African theater of operations.

The citation follows:

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity at risk of life, above and beyond the call of duty in action on September 22, 1943, at Oliveto, Italy.

"Although Lieutenant Childers had just previously suffered a fractured instep he, with eight enlisted men, advanced up a hill toward enemy machine-gun nests. The group advanced to a rock wall overlooking a cornfield and Lieutenant Childers ordered a base of fire laid across the field so that he could advance. When he was fired upon by two enemy snipers from a nearby house he killed both of them.

"He moved behind the machine-gun nests and killed all occupants of the nearer one. He continued toward the second one and threw rocks into it. When the two occupants of the nest rose up, he shot one. The other was killed by one of the eight enlisted men. Lieutenant Childers continued his advance toward a house farther up the hill and single-handed, captured an enemy mortar observer.

"The exceptional leadership, initiative, calmness under fire, and conspicuous gallantry displayed by Lieutenant Childers were an inspiration to his men."

Lieutenant Childers, a Creek Indian, was born at Broken Arrow, Okla., February 1, 1918. He owns a 40-acre tract of land in Wagoner County, Okla., where his parents settled in 1906, a year before Oklahoma was admitted to the Union.

His parents are both dead. His father died in 1930, and his mother 6 years later.

Lieutenant Childers is one of five boys in the Childers family, all but one of whom are now in the armed services. Clarence Childers, 31, is married and has a family and is employed in the oil industry in Tulsa.

The other brothers are Anderson, 29, a master sergeant in the Air Corps, now stationed at Seattle, Wash.; Ellis, 24, a corporal in the military police, now stationed at Florence, Ariz.; and Owen, 21, who was inducted into the marines last month.

Lieutenant Childers' parents were both native Oklahomans, and he himself has lived in the State his whole life. As a boy according to his sister-in-law, Mrs. Clarence Childers, of 2537 North Garrison Place, Tulsa, he was noted for his daring and his natural leadership.

He attended school at Wagoner until 1934, and then enrolled in the Chilocco Indian School at Newkirk, Okla., from which he was graduated in 1940.

Lieutenant Childers first became interested in the Army while attending the Chilocco school, where a National Guard unit had been organized. In 1936 he joined the guard and was assigned to Company C, One Hundred and Eightieth Infantry Regiment, Forty-fifth Division.

He has been connected with the Forty-fifth ever since. He went on active service in 1940, when the division was activated and began its training at Fort Sill, Okla. During most of 1941, it was stationed at Camp Barkeley, Abilene, Tex.

Childers was a private when the Forty-fifth began its training. He worked his way up through all the noncommissioned ranks, and was a master sergeant when his outfit reached Italy.

He was given a direct commission in recognition of his battle services.

Mr. Speaker, incidentally both of these young men expressed their interest in becoming active members of the Disabled American Veterans' organization, which consists entirely of American war wounded and disabled veterans. They also signified their intention of becoming members of the American Legion.

When Mr. Kehoe invited them to attend the next national convention of the Disabled American Veterans to be held at Denver, Colo., in September they both agreed that they would like very much to have the opportunity to tell discharged disabled veterans their experiences at the front lines, and I am hopeful that the War Department will allow them to attend the convention of their disabled comrades, and thereby possibly to help to formulate plans for the post-war period.

Although these men declared that they were merely symbolic of the thousands of men who have already been wounded, Childers reminded the gathering of newsmen that he had been fortunate in receiving only minor injuries and that there were many of his buddies who would return to this country less fortunate.

Daylight-Saving Time

REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 14, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House and to extend my remarks and include therein certain communications urging the repeal of daylight saving.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is widespread interest in the proposal to repeal daylight saving. It is bringing about wastage of manpower on the farm and absenteeism in the factory. It is contributing to the wastage of farm products and inefficiency of production in defense plants. It increases the consumption of power and light in every home and place of business without corresponding profit. It has contributed directly to juvenile delinquency and assaults upon women on their way to employment in the premature darkness of the morning. It has increased the number of traffic accidents on darkened highways and increased the wear on motor vehicles. It is sending millions of small children into the darkness and cold on remote highways to await school busses in every community in the Nation. It has deprived millions of a needed hour of sleep on sultry nights and has increased death and illness rates through exposure and exhaustion. It has added confusion and distress to the already tense war situation without compensating advantage. Schools and churches and farm and labor organizations and a majority of the citizens of every community and the membership of this House disapprove of it.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include excerpts from some of the letters received on the subject:

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

May I add my thanks and hope for success in the good work in trying to abolish the silly winter daylight saving? It is the greatest minor inconvenience of the war. (I have a son in the Navy—I'm not talking about major troubles.)

EDITH LAVELL.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

I wonder if you can realize just how great a thing you are doing for humanity in introducing a bill to set the clocks at their regular time? After all, 24 hours a day divided into three shifts are 8 hours each, and while setting the time ahead really couldn't benefit most of us, it just gives the reckless, adolescent age an earlier start by 1 hour on their never-ending quest for thrills and excitement and parents past their 60 years who have to arise and prepare their household for war industries—some of whom must travel 36 to 40 miles—arise at 4:30 a. m. (while in reality it is only 3:30) more fuel, more light, more effort—and for what?

It is really hardest in the cold winter months. We would gladly accept this war time if it really pertained to the war effort. I have 5 sons out fighting for right and freedom—one has made the supreme sacrifice last November; no sacrifice is too great for our country—but while we all wish to do the necessary sacrifices required of us, it is unnecessary to set the clocks ahead that 1 hour.

MAUD B. ALLEN.

BLUFFS, ILL.

We farmers will certainly welcome the return of sane standard time and appreciate your efforts and wish you every success.

ROYAL OAKES.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.

California on three occasions has voted against the adoption of daylight-saving time, or, in other words, burning the candle on the wrong end.

W. B. VAN HORN.

PORTLAND, OREG.

War time is the biggest farce ever put over, and there are thousands of people who see and admit that this measure is becoming more and more unpopular and that it has rendered no service whatever, but, in fact, has been and is now a decided detriment in every respect in the Nation's effort to win this war. Please return us to standard time.

S. G. HELMER.

ALLENTOWN, PA.

Do away with daylight saving. I hope and trust you will be successful in your venture to do away with what we think is the most unjust piece of legislation ever shoved upon the Nation. There is no reason whatsoever to force the public to unnecessary expense by burning electric lights from 4 a. m. until 8 a. m. The children are only half awake when called for school. Our farmers must all wait until 10 a. m. before they can enter a field to work. In fact, there is absolutely nothing gained by daylight saving. It is a detriment to the whole Nation. If it took the Nation 2,000 years to see the advantage by turning the clocks ahead 1 hour then I feel they are very slow in learning a lesson on the downgrade.

JOHN L. ENGLERT.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

As a Government worker who must be at the office at 8:15 a. m., which means I must dress in a cold apartment, struggle in the dark for transportation, and work in the dark for at least an hour during winter months, I certainly hope your bill restoring eastern standard time will pass.

FLORENCE WHITTEMORE.

WOLLASTON, MASS.

I would like to voice my sincere approval for the abolition of daylight saving for all future time.

It would be one move to normal times.

W. F. PIKE.

OLEAN, N. Y.

I have been reading about the resolution to put the country back on standard time, and heartily agree, and know of a great many others who are of the same opinion but are so busy they find it difficult to express themselves on the subject.

There definitely is nothing saved by daylight saving; and, in fact, the time is wasted. Children refuse to go to their much-needed sleep and continue to walk the streets aimlessly as daylight lasts so long—and who wants to go to bed while it is still daylight? This seems to be one of the greatest contributory factors toward juvenile delinquency.

I can't see where electricity or anything else is saved. Some people must arise before daylight to be at a war plant early and must burn lights.

I certainly do wish something could be done about the time, as this daylight business is a pain in the neck to the working class of people.

MARY C. LIPMAN.

OLEAN, N. Y.

I was very happy to learn that you are working to abolish daylight-saving time. We've given it enough time to work, but it is a miserable failure. Let's go back to "God's own time."

Our neighborhood is full of children who will not go to bed because of the added 1 hour of daylight. But they must arise to be to school at 8:25 a. m. They lose 1 hour of much-needed rest.

Mrs. C. E. ISAMAN.

LEESBURG, VA.

I do hope you will not only bring up but succeed in efforts to restore the sun's time. If any business requires the starting of an hour earlier, let them do so; but that the whole Nation is routed out of bed in the cold and dark to stand on street corners, without even the privilege of seeing the sun come up is barbarous.

Not only is electricity wasted, but coal and all heating affairs. At night the house is heated. School children going along country roads, some with flashlights, some candles, and some matches, and then waiting in the cold dark for busses. Nine o'clock is only the sun's 8, and the sun is not up during all winter months until 7:30 sun's time. Think of the mothers who have to get up to get the children, their husbands, and possibly themselves off to work. Quite possibly most of the tubercular cases can be attributed to the meaningless hours.

PAULINE D. CASTLEMAN.

STEVENS POINT, WIS.

You can do no greater benefit for the farmers than restore standard time. We farmers never miss any daylight, anyhow. You cannot begin work till the dew dries; especially in haying and threshing is this true. Then to quit at 5, or about the middle of the afternoon, sun high in the sky—it just don't work.

We are sick of this freak time. Do everything you can to set the clocks right.

MRS. DAMON.

BONNOTS MILL, MO.

The school faculty and pupils, too, are more than pleased with the repeal bill. At present we are handicapped rising early and returning home late from school.

Returning to natural time will help thousands of farmers. They will be able to work longer in the fields and thus raise more needed raw materials. Food is essential to win this war and we are all anxious to do our best.

CAROLINE ALTHEUSER.

MOUND CITY, ILL.

Re: Befuddled clocks in United States.

Have just noted a resolution in Congress to abolish now and forever, I hope, that infamous, diabolical concoction known as daylight-saving time, the most insane proposition ever foisted on the American people.

Just who got the notion that he had been divinely commissioned a modern Joshua is not stated. But evidently, unable to maneuver the sun, he beguiled himself by spinning the hands of the clock into the belief that he had actually done that very thing.

Accept my commendation, and here's wishing your resolution forthwith adoption and approval.

J. KELLY SMITH, Attorney.

PADUCAH, KY.

I want to send you the piece out of our Sunday paper. At least we have it in the press. They tried the daylight time here a few years ago (before it was Nation-wide) and the people were up in arms about it, so it didn't last. Now it's a law like some of the other crazy things they pass and we can't do a thing.

Mrs. NEVA LEIBEL.

PADUCAHANS REPORTED IRKED ABOUT DAYLIGHT-SAVING TIME

Some people in Kentucky appear to be irked about the hour-fast war time. Several have written to have war time abolished and clocks turned back an hour to standard time.

From messages entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Paducah seems most sore about the time situation.

"In the winter we get up in the middle of the night," complained Mrs. Neva Leibel, 713 Kentucky Avenue, Paducah, "and in summer we go to bed with the sun shining. We have to burn lights half of the morning.

"The farmers don't like it either," she declared. "Cattle go by the sun. I am just one in this town who is dissatisfied."

The Kiwanis Club at Pikeville has had the matter up before its board of directors, Lon B. Rogers, an attorney there, wrote. "If there is anything we can do," he added, "I feel sure that our club would be only too glad to help in any way possible."

A telegram saying "We farmers have been heavily handicapped" came from J. A. Cole, Paducah, Frederick Beyer, Howard Rottgering, and Harry Ross, all farmers of near Paducah.

And Mrs. J. B. Smith, of Paducah, route No. 2, said "half the people" in her town "have never pushed their clocks forward," including the Catholic school which operates on old standard time though the kids start classes at 9:30 a. m. by the new time. She regards war time as a nuisance.

A Sun-Democrat reporter who interviewed most of those quoted above as opposing daylight-saving time found them standing firmly by their statements.

Harry Ross, who lives near Lone Oak, said that he and the three other farmers sent their telegram after discussing the matter at a chance meeting. He thinks daylight-saving time is strictly against the laws of nature. Here's the way he puts it:

"We have to get up an hour earlier—in the dark winter months it is a long time turning light—and quit an hour earlier to conform with members of our families who work in the city.

"Cows and chickens don't get up before sun-up and it causes a lot of confusion when it comes to feeding time for them. Roosters still crow at the same time.

"Besides that," he continued, "it just isn't natural to get up in the middle of the night and promenade around with a lantern on one arm so we can see our way to do chores."

One of the strongest contenders for the hour set-back is Mrs. Leibel, who complained that people here have to go to bed with the sun shining in the summertime. The Paducah housewife doesn't like it because she says the new time was arranged to save electricity and she has to keep her lights burning until well into the day under the present situation. And then again, as she said, she just doesn't like it.

The directors of both the Catholic schools in Paducah and McCracken County—St. Mary's Academy and St. John's—said that the schools operate on war time, opening at 8:30 a. m. daily. If the pupils go to mass they are sometimes late but never later than 9 o'clock, they said.

PATERSON, N. J.

Change the time back to standard time please. Folks work 24 hours and it has an effect. It is especially harmful to patients in the hospitals. It disturbs conditions, for we know the time is camouflaged.

Let us have something natural in this world. Please give us the old time back.

Mrs JAN ELLENOFF, R. N.

WINTER PARK, FLA.

Abandon war time. You are worthy of greatest commendation for courage in attempting to have this nuisance abolished.

We were on central standard time. The clocks were set ahead for daylight saving and never set back. When the directive—was it—was issued for war time, they were set ahead another hour. Need I add that we now have an oversupply of daylight saving.

GEORGE SCHWAB.

STAR CITY, ARK.

Change war time back as it was before the set-up.

More things should be changed for the convenience of people who are doing their best at home for the war effort.

W. R. ALSOBROOK,
President, Bank of Star City.

DANSVILLE, N. Y.

I wish to express appreciation of efforts to further action that will get the Nation back to standard time.

Farmers have always been opposed to it and it does seem that, in these times the wish of the people who raise food to eat, should be considered.

It is a hardship in many ways for working people. Small school children do not get proper amount of sleep as it is impossible to get children to bed when the sun is still shining.

Keep up the good work.

WARREN S. HOLLIDAY.

CRESTVIEW, FLA.

Am hoping you will succeed in your efforts to abandon war time.

PAUL CONSTANT.

EVANS, MO.

No one likes the new time. Can't see where we save anything as we use it in morning bumping around in dark. This old world moved a long time on the old time.

Mrs. H. BONNICHSON.

BELLEVILLE, ILL.

Enclosed is a copy of resolution in support of the bill introduced by you to end daylight saving.

Sincerely yours,

B. W. TILLMAN,
Farm Adviser, St. Clair
County Farm Bureau.

Whereas the present daylight-saving law is needlessly extravagant in the use of electricity, without any offsetting, compensating, economic saving; and

Whereas the system works a distinct hardship on farmers in the employment of farm labor; and furthermore, the farmer often finds it necessary to attend meetings, which under the present daylight-saving system interferes very seriously with his work in food production: Therefore be it

Resolved by members of the Twenty-second Congressional District in business session, That we oppose the present daylight-saving plan and urge a return to the former standard time.

G. G. PAPE,
Edwardsville, Ill.
F. C. GABE,
Nashville, Ill.
LOUIS J. HERTEL,
Millstadt, Ill.

LIBERAL, KANS.

Get standard time restored. It probably will not affect you so much as western Kansas where I live, as by our old time we were 45 minutes behind sun time and with a move-up of another war time hour we really have lunch by the sun time at 10:15 a. m. Really makes long hot afternoons. This winter it was not daylight until 9 a. m. war time.

We find there are only 24 hours in a day after all.

FERN P. DONLEY.

HITTA YUMA, MISS.

I am glad someone seems to be thinking on the same lines as I am about the so-called daylight saving time.

Be so kind as to tell me what started that. I know that the President consented to it as a war measure but I understand that it originated outside of this country.

On hearing from you I will tell you something of what I know about it.

DAME ELLEN PHELPS CRUMP.

SHERMAN, TEX.

Best of luck in getting standard time back. It has always been silly.

H. E. HARDGROVE.

NOVINGER, MO.

Please do everything to get our standard time back. We are farmers and I have to stop my work at 4 p. m. to have supper ready for hands. Wednesday evening I was trying to get my garden in and I quit at 4 to get supper and never got near all planted. The next morning it was raining and has rained ever since. Look at the time we waste when it is so valuable. We are just one of the many that want our standard time back.

Mrs. BEN BURESS.

AMES, IOWA.

I sincerely hope we can get the time set back to standard and left there. It loses an hour per day working time.

L. M. WESTON.

NORFOLK, VA.

Abandon daylight-saving time. I have always thought that changing the time was a crazy idea and I have not been able to find anybody who could see any sense in changing the time. It puts many hardships on the people, it forces them to get up before daylight to switch on the electric lights and waste a lot of electric power and coal. It deceives the people by pretending that the time is late when in fact it is early. This hurry and rush will soon ruin the nerves of the American people.

We should go on standard time now and forever. If anybody wants to go to work 1 or 2 hours earlier, or later, let that be their choice. Every individual, firm, or organization in the country should be able to select such hours as are best suited to their interest to begin work and everything should be based on standard time.

I hope that Congress will soon pass this bill and may the country soon be back on standard time.

E. B. STACK.

WILLIAMSPORT, IND.

Abolish this crazy war time and return the country to standard time. We wish to congratulate this effort to rid the country of one of the big nuisances of this war. We sincerely hope the bill goes through. We are going to write our Representative and our Senator, asking their favorable consideration.

JESSE F. HETRICK.

ORCHARD, NEBR.

Repeal this foolish so-called new time. To most folks it is a waste of time and a waste of money in every respect.

When I saw the notice in the press of this bill, I immediately wrote to our Congressmen and asked them to get behind this move and do what they can to get the matter before the Congress.

Early last fall I wrote and asked them to do something about this fool change of time, but did not receive any consideration. All I got was their old stock answer—it was by an act of Congress, and they doubted if the matter would receive any consideration. But now since you have seen fit to place a bill before the Congress, I trust that you will receive full assistance from those who are hit the hardest—and by those I mean we who live in the central portion of this country. I assure you that everyone with whom I have talked has expressed the wish and desire to get back to standard time at the earliest possible moment.

D. L. FLETCHER, M. D.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX.

I am interested in the bill to have the time changed back to its right place. I have been in evangelistic work, and much of it has been in the country, and I know what a hardship that it is working on the farmers. Many of the places that I have been to dinner in the country have two clocks—one to run the radio by and another to work by.

My work has also taken me to the small towns and cities, and I have yet to find one person that was in favor of having the clock moved up as it is now. The general feeling is that it does absolutely no good and that it does hinder many things. It was contended that it would save electricity—well, my light bill has been more since it was changed, and that is the fact with everyone that I have talked to.

Primarily I am interested in the work of the churches. I can definitely say that it is a hindrance to the work of the churches, since it forces them to have their evening services so early in the day that the folks do not come. People going to church are like chickens going to roost—they just don't do it until dark; and if you set the time at dark, then it runs the service too late for those who have to get up so early in the morning. Personally, I feel, after talking to hundreds of people about it, that it would be a distinct benefit to our national program at this time. People seem to feel that it was entirely unnecessary to meddle with the time. Please forgive if I have seemed to be very frank, but I have tried to pass on to you what I have heard from the people.

R. G. VAN ROYEN,
Minister, Baptist General Convention of Texas.

KENEDY, TEX.

In turning the time ahead 1 hour of standard time works a real hardship on farmers in small towns and cities and in many of our larger cities. We hear from every side, "I wish they would turn the time back to where it belongs." Church work in our country is so very vital to every interest of our national life that we need to give it every possible advantage we possibly can. It will be necessary real soon to set the time for the evening service to 8:30 o'clock; and, of course, the people complain about the lateness of the hour. We cannot improve on the Lord's time and we certainly trust standard time may be restored.

If there are certain manufacturing sections who want to get out earlier in the afternoon why can't they begin their work at 7 in the morning, lunch at 11, and out at 4, and this will not place such a handicap on the millions of people who would much prefer the standard time.

JOHN K. BEERY,
Minister, The Methodist Church.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA.

I am a farmer, and daylight saving time to a farmer has never been anything but a curse. That afternoon hour is valuable beyond comparison to the so-called saved hour in the morning.

The few instances where daylight saving time has been twisted around to appear beneficial does not justify cramming it down everyone's neck. Most industries are working around the clock; for them the plan has no benefit whatever. If some group want to start their activity an hour earlier, all right, but leave the rest of the people alone.

HORACE D. DEWEY.

TROY, ILL.

We are watching with much interest the fight to get the daylight-saving law repealed, and we wish it much success, for it is very unpopular around here.

Please do all you can to help us.

VOORHEES CONLEY.

OKLAHOMA CITY.

The attached article was in one of our publications and desired to lose no time in commending you in your effort and assure you it is the desire of Oklahomans to have this, as a vote was taken by one of our daily papers and there were some 4,000 votes for repeal.

Please spare no time and effort in this matter.

The present time is a hardship on old and young alike and has been the past winter very detrimental to the health of the people standing out in the early cold mornings waiting on transportation, as well as an extreme hazard, street lights being put out before daybreak, many streets being poorly lighted and on the streets with the traffic, the flare and glare of the passing cars, but no steady light to show us the roads and streets afterward, made it very unsafe for pedestrians. In the home a greater amount of electricity was used.

One hour later would take care of this difficulty, insure better health, and lastly, would put people in a better frame of mind to enter upon their duties in places of employment.

FRANCES A. STANWOOD.

CRYSTAL CITY, MO.

The daylight-saving time is a thorn in the flesh. If you can get this law repealed, I will support you for any office and on any ticket.

WM. D. WHEATLEY.

TULIA, TEX.

Swisher County Post, No. 214, of the American Legion went on record last night in regular meeting as favoring your proposal to do away with this foolish system of so-called war time. We have never been able to see just why such a scheme was ever inaugurated. Do what you can to put this bunk in the ash-can. We are sick and tired of this regimented bureaucracy.

AMERICAN LEGION,
Tulia, Tex.
H. G. BRIGGS, Adjutant.

ALAMOGORDO, N. MEX.

I think you were off a little when you stated only golf players want war time, I think the companies selling power for lights and the like want it, as it makes working people get up earlier, but does not make them go to bed any earlier. In my opinion, if the records of the electric companies could be looked into you would find that nearly every home would show a large increase in their light bills, as here in New Mexico at 8 o'clock in the morning during the winter months it is just coming daylight, and nearly all workers only work 8 hours. Why should they be forced to go to work before daylight? The best of luck in getting us back on standard time.

C. E. ROGERS.

SEATTLE, WASH.

For 2 whole years now every time I've looked at our clock or my watch it has told a lie. It says it is an hour later than honest time. We go to work in the dark and our children go to school in the dark, and then at night it is time to put the little ones to bed and the sun hasn't set yet.

I could put up with all this if it accomplished anything. But it hasn't even helped win the war like we were promised. Let's face realities. Let's be honest with ourselves and our neighbors. Let's stop kidding ourselves. Get this wrong righted.

W. H. TYER,
State Manager, Modern Woodmen of America.

FERNDALE, CALIF.

I understand you have a bill to put the United States back on standard time. More power to you on this move.

I never could understand how we can save something we have not got. There is just so much daylight, and no decree or document can possibly increase it. Just another noble experiment. I agree with you wholeheartedly it has only brought about confusion, is very impractical, and has hindered more than it has ever helped.

HARRY A. PERRY,
Third Senatorial District, California Legislature.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

How grateful many of us are for your effort. In an upset world why upset the time—one thing that could remain stable? And please try, and keep on trying, to turn the clocks back before the hot weather comes. It is truly awful in summer with no cool evenings.

This is the first time I ever wrote a letter about legislation.

N. V. MYERS.

FORT WORTH, TEX.

I may be permitted to extend sincere congratulations on effort to repeal the alleged daylight-saving time and restore this Nation to its usual standard time.

In my humble opinion this change of time has only added confusion, demoralization, derangement, disarray, jumble, commotion, agitation, tumult, turmoil, bewilderment, and embarassment, together with any other synonyms that may be known.

More power to you is the hope of millions and millions of citizens of these good United States.

CHAS. T. ROWLAND.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA.

Allow me to applaud the resolution offered to return to standard time, throughout the year, as distinguished from what is erroneously known as daylight-saving time. I hear much favorable comment upon the resolution and much hope expressed that it will be passed.

C. L. WATTS.

ARCATA, CALIF.

Thank God someone has waked up. I lived in Detroit the first community to fall for the insane idea, when it was put over by a doctor who wanted more time to play golf. Electric bills, both domestic and industrial, increased 10 percent.

New York and Eureka are in the same latitude but due to the Rocky, Cascade, and Coast mountains sun rises here at 8:30 a. m. standard time and in New York at 7 a. m. in midwinter—meaning 9:30 a. m. war time.

A. L. PUTNAM.

KENTON, OHIO.

I am writing you to express my appreciation of efforts to have the clocks turned back to standard time. I farmed 280 acres of land. Most of the time it is nearly noon before grain is ready to combine or hay to go into barn. If I have to go somewhere in evening I must lose an hour. There are more meetings now than before war I must attend, if I want to do my full part in war effort.

You are right about golf players and fishermen wanting wartime, because part of farm I rent contains a golf course, and in evening taxis make as high as a dozen trips out and back, and a good many cars find gas and tires to come out and spend their extra hour.

I know of no instance when a man living and working in town has spent his extra hour helping a farmer.

I hope you are successful in righting this wasteful blunder.

JOHN A. WELLING.

[Telegram]

[The filing time shown in the date line on telegrams and day letters is standard time at point of origin. Time of receipt is standard time at point of destination]

BOSTON, MASS.

Highly favor abolishment of daylight-saving time.

THOMAS A. KERR.

UNION, MO.

Put the time back to the old standard time again. This new time is a nuisance. It takes more light and you get nowhere with it.

LELA HUMMEL.

ALBANY, OREG.

We farmers are all for your fight to ban wartime and return to standard. It has been a terrific and expensive handicap to us.

C. O. KEESTER.

CUMBERLAND, MD.

I have been reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday 7, concerning the so-called daylight-saving bill. Let me say I have always opposed it. My electric light bills have been higher instead of lower. I can't see where we save on electricity when we have to have lights in the morning instead of at night. I hope the bill passes.

WM. H. GATEHOUSE.

XENIA, OHIO.

Just read the evening paper of efforts for congressional action to abandon wartime and put the Nation on standard time.

We most heartily approve—let us know if we can assist. We will be under great obligations to anyone who helps to rid the Nation of this great nuisance and inconvenience. It is an imposition upon working people.

LENA GILBERT.

DOVER, OHIO.

To get rid of this war time would be one of the great things to win this war. It is ruining the morale and health of our people and driving farmers off their land. They tell me it is sheer nonsense. I made a survey of this and find the schools, gardeners, farmers, greenhouses, and work people, and the old greatly opposed to it. Power is wasted now more than when we had the slow time. The defense plants are all working 24 hours 8 hours a turn so what difference is it? Plants that work 8 hours a day do not want this time for they do not want their men to work before daylight.

ELSWORTH ALLMAN.

ADEL, GA.,

I have just read speech in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 7, Repeal of Daylight Saving. I wish to express my appreciation and approval and urge you to fight on till this impractical, confusing inconvenience is removed by law.

It does no real good. Any practical man knows what time is saved on one end of the day is lost on the other.

One of the worst effects of it all was to shake the confidence of many people in their leaders. It just don't indicate ordinary, practical common sense in times of stress like these to fiddle away time and cause so much confusion. Moving up the dead hands of the clocks can't save anything. I repeat, it makes us doubt whether we are following leaders of practical sense. Lord knows we have confusion enough in these wartimes that is necessarily so without adding any that is not absolutely necessary.

People very cheerfully do necessary things there is real reason for.

W. D. WELLS.

DES MOINES, IOWA.

I sincerely hope the bill re returning to standard time is passed upon favorably.

CORA LORENZ.

LEXINGTON, VA.

It is with genuine pleasure that I note you taking the initiative in the congressional action toward the repealing of the daylight saving time.

This indeed is a step in the interest of the masses, particularly the workman in plants as well as those conducting their own business. In the next place it is very uneconomical, as from personal experience we consumed more electric current under the present time than we did under regular standard.

I sincerely hope you succeed in getting the measure through and in so doing you will have bestowed a wonderful favor on all working people, and not on the golf players.

D. C. REMSBURG.

LANSING, MICH.

I am very much interested in House Resolution 4428 to put the clocks back during the months of January, February, November, and December.

I am very much in favor of this resolution and hope that it will prevail. We here in Michigan are getting a double dose; since 1931 our legal time has been eastern standard time rather than central, in which time belt we are located, so with war savings time we are 2 hours ahead of schedule all of the time.

BERNEICE E. THOMAS.

ST. CHARLES, MO.

Glad to see you are trying to have that silly daylight-saving law repealed.

More power to you!

The folks who want that extra hour in the evening can just go to work an hour earlier by Nature's time, go to lunch an hour earlier, and quit an hour earlier, and not make the rest of the country suffer such inconvenience for their selfish pleasure.

Push the bill for repeal good and strong.

E. F. BLANN.

PARIS, MO.

Won't you do all you can to change "time" back to God's time?

ERNEST HARDWICK.

GOUVERNEUR, N. Y.

The bill H. R. 4489 expresses the wishes of all dairymen in New York State, and I imagine the United States, in regard to the wasted man-hours on farms during the critical harvest season. First, by losing 1 hour in the morning due to the fact making it most impossible to get to work before 9 o'clock on account of the dew. Second, shortage of labor in the dairy section. Having to quit at 5 o'clock war time, 4 o'clock standard time, for chores, 1 hour is lost in the best part of the day for haying. Thus 2 hours daily are lost. Costs farmers millions. Third, it makes no difference in industry as they are working on 24-hour schedule and industry would not be hampered in any way.

Pass this bill.

JAS. B. THOMPSON.

LINCOLN, NEBR.

I want to commend your stand on the daylight-saving law. If there ever was an asinine law put on the statute books this is it and if you can do something about having it changed, I am sure you will receive the everlasting gratitude of the rank and file of Nebraska farmers.

CHAS. Y. THOMPSON,
President, Nebraska Farm Bureau Federation.

DOVER, OHIO.

If you can do anything about this time problem I hope you will. Haven't we enough to contend with in this terrible war, and so many heartaches? And our electric bills are just the same. How in the name of common sense does it help?

It is a lot of baloney. Things go too far sometimes. We in Ohio don't like it one bit. Will be watching our paper for results. We are Americans and if our voice is to be heard we ask a fair deal. Please give us back our eastern standard time.

God bless you.

MRS. D. MORRISON.

RANDOLPH, MASS.

Enclosed find article from Boston paper in regard to returning to standard time, something necessary for the health and comfort of the working class and their children.

Of all the stupid laws, daylight savings was the most stupid. Nothing was saved, much electric light used night and morning, according to the season, and mothers' nerves torn and frayed from children refusing to go to bed in the afternoon.

Have never seen any real advantage to it, unless one calls working 18 hours a day an advantage.

GERTRUDE E. SULLIVAN.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

I want to congratulate you on your good sense in asking for the repeal of the law setting time up 1 hour. I think 90 percent of the people are for it. In my mind you will make a lot of friends if you push the bill on through.

Sincerely yours,

G. W. WILLIAMS,
Commander, Post No. 222,
The American Legion.

CLARKS SUMMIT, PA.

Very glad to see that others are interested in giving us a break in daylight saving.

Never could see how it applied outside of industry and they were working the clock around anyhow.

Thank you; thank you.

H. A.

JONESBURG, MO.

I see in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat where they are going to try and have the so-called daylight-saving time changed. Hope they can because I think it is one of the damnedest fool ideas that was ever put over.

HERMAN LUDY.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

An article in the Schenectady Union Star said that you are against war time, and going to try and have standard time back the way God created it. That's my belief. It should be standard time.

Here in my city they believe in standard time. If one wants to do anything to accomplish it, let him get up 1 hour ahead. I hate this stinking 1-hour-ahead business. You don't accomplish a damn thing with that 1 hour ahead.

S. C. SKOTARCZAK.

DAYTON, OHIO.

With reference to bill No. 4489, introduced recently in the House of Representatives, calling for the establishment of standard time throughout the Nation, I am very much in favor of this bill and hope that you will vote in favor of its passage.

In my opinion the time should never have been changed. It has worked an unnecessary hardship on all people throughout the country whose work requires their getting up at an early hour, and has caused endless confusion in many other ways. The abolishment of this foolish measure will aid in a small measure to get this country back on a sensible basis.

H. A. GOSCH.

MOODY, TEX.

I want to commend the bill which would put the Nation back on standard time, and I herewith add my name to the list of protesters against fast time, which was imposed upon us at the beginning of the present war. I trust Congress will act to restore standard time.

Our national slogan is "Save and conserve." Fast time forces us to get up 1 hour earlier in the coldest part of the day, thus using an hour more of artificial light and an hour more of fuel. Fast time is a burden on the masses and puts money in the pockets of the few who sell light and fuel. It is inconsistent with the idea of saving and conserving.

To our knowledge, all war plants are running on a 24-hour basis, so how could fast time help there?

It also enhances the hazard of night driving of automobiles, as more people have to drive at night, causing more wrecks and deaths, going to and from work. It uses up more car batteries and light bulbs, which is not being conservative.

CECIL O. GUYTON.

LYONS, IND.

I see they are making a fight to get the time changed—I should have said clocks, I guess—because they can't change the time. It was a very foolish thing to do in the first place.

I don't see where there was any saving in daylight by so doing. Success in getting the change.

H. F. FERGUSON.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Have Congress pass House bill 4489, and abolish war time. Fast time works hardships on the working people. School children have to go to school while yet dark.

No electricity or fuel is saved by war-time schedule. I surely hope we as a Nation can get back to normal time.

JOHN L. SUTTON.

SHELDON, MO.

The morning press reports redoubled efforts for congressional action to abandon war time and put the Nation back on standard time.

There has never been any occasion for this funny time. I have lived in Chicago, Kansas City, and Tulsa, etc., and have worked in offices with many different starting times, but there has never been anything practical about the current daylight saving time.

Old Greenwich has been our standard for hundreds of years.

With the necessity for very accurate navigation and avigation I sometimes wonder if our Army, Navy, and Air Force doesn't just ignore the current legal time and go by standard. Otherwise there must be beautiful confusion with the intermingling of the forces of the various nations.

Of course putting Father Time back on his established base will not win the war or save democracy, etc., but it will be a fine start toward unscrambling some of the many useless and irritating fumblings.

I have talked with over a thousand individuals and all consider early time as just plain foolish.

W. L. CORRELL.

NEVADA, OHIO.

The enclosed clipping from the Toledo Blade prompts me to say it will do the country a good turn to get us back on proper time. There is actually a waste of power under war time. Everyone's light bills are higher.

Our legislature put Ohio on eastern time several years ago, after we had been on central time ever since it was established over 60 years ago. Now, almost the whole State is on eastern war time though the legislature outlawed it last year. In summertime it is daylight until 10 p. m. and one must wait until the air and houses cool sufficiently for sleep, and it is midnight before that comes. Then, in the morning when it is cool and one can rest we have to get up 2 hours ahead of the proper time.

War plants operate 24 hours a day so there is no saving there. A man with any ambition can maintain a large garden on 1 hour a day. When this crazy time was proposed I wrote, on behalf of my shopmates, in protest against it.

GEO. R. WILLIAMS.

PARIS, MO.

We are for changing back to standard time.

Daylight-savings time has always seemed out of place and we never could understand why people could not go to work an hour earlier if they wanted to without changing the time.

ANDREW D. THURSTON.

SMITHSHIRE, ILL.

I heard over the radio a few days ago a statement in regard to changing back the time. If they would only change it up there at Washington how much better it would be. Country people go by the new time only because there is a war on. Maybe it benefits some but it isn't the farm people.

MRS. GEO. WEAVER.

BERKS COUNTY, PA.

Am interested in the fight for elimination of daylight saving. I wish to state that we farmers do not wish it as we have just so much work to do and are restricted in help. Also gasoline rations. How does this daylight help us? This is nonsense. It is time for Congress to pull together and get rid of it.

J. N. EISENHART.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.

I want to voice my hearty approval of the bill to move the clocks back to natural, sensible time. This freak time has given me the jitters and headaches more than any one thing that I have ever had to deal with. In winter, 9:30 a. m., daylight; in summer, 9:30 p. m. before darkness. In winter huge amounts of electric current is wasted. It is worthless, useless, confusing, so this is one wartime headache of which we can rid ourselves without hampering our war effort in the least.

JOHN P. STEWART.

MARTINSVILLE, VA.

Please let me wish success in doing away with daylight saving time.

How any plan which makes you get up an hour earlier by the sun and burn an hour's more electricity and fuel for 6 months of the year; that makes school children in rural areas walk long distances to catch school buses in the dark, how could time like that benefit anybody?

I hope we will be able to get the Nation back on standard time, and before the hot summer months.

MRS. ROY G. BURGESS.

NIAGARA FALLS.

I am enclosing copy of editorial in my home newspaper which refers to efforts toward abolishing fast time and restoring standard time.

I wish to commend in the highest terms efforts to abolish a long-standing public nuisance and menace to the country. Common sense teaches that inasmuch as war production is continuous day and night, fast or daylight saving time is a useless factor, and should be abolished.

Fast time is not only a public nuisance but a menace to health in loss of sleep. I am working at Niagara Falls at Bell Aircraft. All through the winter months I have had to get up in the morning to go to work in pitch darkness.

I earnestly hope a majority of sensible Congressmen will vote in favor of restoring standard time.

S. C. LEFEVRE.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

I urge you to put all power behind the bill to put the Nation back on standard time. The working people in the cities and on the farms want the standard time. The silly law should be erased from the book. It does more harm than good. If it was left to the people to vote it would be voted down. We, here in California, hate it.

E. A. MCNORMAN.

JACKSON, MICH.

Am writing in regard to this "war time." Am glad there is someone to fight for the people of the country and against this terrible time.

In our town or county we were already on fast time, getting up 1 hour before the sun and now it is 2 hours. I wonder how long people are going to keep on kidding themselves.

Persuade the Congressmen to vote this "war time" out.

ANNIE O. PATIENCE.

ELIZABETH, N. J.

Read this newspaper clipping in our evening paper and sure hope the bill wins on the daylight saving question. Our light bill jumped. It takes longer and more light in the mornings. I never did believe in the daylight saving time. It is only for golfers.

Leave God's work as it was.

MRS. P. S. WEIMAR.

DES MOINES COUNTY DRAINAGE DISTRICT NO. 7, Oakville, Iowa.

Place the Nation on standard time again and remove one of the greatest handicaps to wartime food production.

Last spring we were delayed by rain during the month of May and could not plant corn until around June 1. Our help refused to work beyond 6 o'clock by the watch and I am quite sure that considerable land was not farmed because the war time was out of joint with regular standard time, and thus threw our farm operations out of gear.

NOAH SCHROCK,
Chairman, Board of Trustees.

SPRING VALLEY, OHIO.

Put the Nation back on standard time. We farmers and grangers all hope that bill goes through. After all man can't change the sun nor the habits of animals, and we farmers have to work by the sun and with animals. It is a terrible hardship for the farmers and I haven't talked to anyone in the city—teachers, professionals, mothers, housewives, etc.—that are in favor of fast time. Please put the Nation back on standard time again and we will be rid of one bad mess at least. I talked to a Dr. Mon and she said it was the most senseless thing she knew of to set the clocks ahead. You may be sure you have a lot of backing on this whether they write or not.

H. L. GERHART.

OSWEGO, OHIO.

Keep up the good work to abolish daylight-saving time.

J. H. TAYLOR.

MAUMEE, OHIO.

Daylight saving means nothing to the farmer except inconvenience from all angles. The railroad man working by one time and his family living by another may be a means of fewer accidents if we were back to sun time.

As a commercial man this past year have had to contend with three different times in Michigan, and two places in Ohio. Both attorneys general of Michigan and Ohio said changes were unconstitutional. This legislation has been one of confusion.

H. T. HATTON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I appreciate efforts in behalf of setting the clock back 1 hour as my wife was nearly killed by a colored thug taking advantage of the extra darkness to attack women on the streets of Washington.

J. H. N.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The short article in today's Washington Star about daylight savings noted.

For about 25 years this has been a humbug put over on the population of the United States of America. The quicker it is discontinued the better.

H. B. STACKHOUSE.

BOSTON, MASS.

In the Boston Post of today appeared a front page story of efforts to restore standard time. Bring before the people of our Nation a realization of what a humbug is this cock-eyed dislocation—called daylight saving. It is one of those hysterical devices that has helped juvenile delinquency and nervous breakdowns. The great bulk of our people will be with efforts to restore standard time. If anyone wants to set their clocks an hour fast—O. K.—but not by law.

F. E. BENTLEY.

LABOR, Washington, D. C.

Thank you very much for copy of extension of remarks on daylight saving. I am with you 100 percent. It's not so bad in the summer, but it works a lot of hardship during the rest of the year.

EDWARD KEATING, Manager.

FLORENCE, S. C.

I note with a great deal of interest a bill in Congress restoring war time to what it was before we entered the conflict. Such a bill meets with my hearty endorsement, and why our Senators and Representatives in Washington have not urged the passing of such a bill long before now is beyond my comprehension, as the present daylight-saving time, particularly for the southeast section of the United States, has, in my opinion, handicapped rather than helped the war effort.

Please accept deep appreciation of efforts in connection with this matter.

C. W. STIKELEATHER,
Vice President and Treasurer, Peoples Federal Savings and Loan Association.

MARYSVILLE, OHIO.

More power to the effort to repeal the War Time Act. Fast time is doing as much to sabotage agriculture and industry in our war effort as any device that could have been put over on us by the enemy. Let us know if we can help.

CHAS. F. TOSSEY.

BONNOTS MILL, MO.

Our entire school is pleased with the bill to repeal daylight-saving time. If it is passed, it will make a great improvement in our daily routine. The teachers of our school also heartily approve bringing back the old standard time. Many children of our school are obliged to leave home in the dark and return in the dark. Of course, the previous statement is due to the transportation schedules, which cannot be changed without the consumption of more fuel and rubber—a thing we would not do.

I do not know to how many people this will be of an advantage, but I do know it will please the majority.

Since the clocks have been functioning an hour earlier, everything has been unnatural. If the clocks were again to resume their regular time, it would contribute to health, comfort, and production.

IONA KOENIGSFELD.

PERRY, MO.

I note in today's St. Louis Globe-Democrat a bill to abolish daylight-saving time. This is the right track. We Ralls County people hope that it will be successful. If this so-called save daylight has done anyone any good in this section I fail to know about it.

GILL RICHARDS.

MONROE CITY, MO.

I am very much interested in the resolution to abolish daylight-saving time.

Quitting in the middle of the evening when we should be working, putting my sheep and stock up at 5 o'clock when they want to stay out and graze 2 or 3 hours longer, is ridiculous.

CHAS. L. ELZEA.

TROY, MO.

I have been listening with interest to the discussion about changing the time which Charlie Stooke is putting on over the radio. I am heartily in favor of changing it back. If anyone wants to go to work an hour earlier and get off an hour earlier let them settle that, but let the Nation be run by standard time.

E. B. HARDY.

FULTON, MO.

The old time is more acceptable to the farmers and all others. Give us the old time. Give us the 1 hour back.

JOHN DAY.

FARBER, MO.

I was at a club meeting one evening last week and heard the daylight-saving time discussed. Almost everyone present expressed the hope that we'd go back to the old time.

LILLIAN CROW.

SHELBYVILLE, MO.

I've talked to many people, and I felt sure you would like to know how very much they endorse your bill to do away with daylight-saving time. I'm shocked at the many hardships it causes in rural communities.

I'm actually saddened by reports of this regulation, which has served no purpose whatsoever, except to add to the break-down of health and morale of the Nation.

I should like to see the General Federation of Women's Clubs endorse this bill in convention.

MRS. ERNEST W. HOWARD.

COATS, KANS.

May I resent your term "daylight saving"? In my opinion, there is nothing that has done more toward wasting daylight than the present set-up. Best luck and thanks a thousand.

BEN SCHREPEL.

NEW LONDON, MO.

Keep up the fight to get rid of war time, daylight saving, which is a darn nuisance. Those who want to go to work early may do so.

W. W. CROCKETT.

NEW HAVEN, MO.

This and other communities would certainly appreciate if daylight-saving time could be abandoned. It handicaps production. This especially holds true on the dairy farm. We must get up earlier and milk because the truck comes earlier, then to keep from throwing the milking schedule way beyond reason we must milk too early in the evening to get the benefit of a full day's work in the field.

If there is any benefit in having factories start earlier there is no reason why the clock should be tampered with and handicap the farmer, who certainly has plenty of difficulties without adding to them unnecessarily.

WILBERT J. ROHLFING.

PORTLAND, MO.

Good luck these troublesome times. Get the time changed back to the old way. The present time helps no one.

H. V. BAKER.

PERRY, MO.

I don't like the daylight-saving time, it makes things out of balance for the farmer.

DAN T. TICE.

MCCREDIE, MO.

Get daylight-saving time changed back to sun time. This 1 hour per day per man, when multiplied by all the thousands of laboring men on farms in the United States, will amount to thousands of bushels of grain and food for our fighting forces.

RALPH WILKINSON.

MARTINSBURG, MO.

This daylight-saving time is a big nuisance. It is no longer necessary to get people out in the dark and cold to make them war conscious. In the rural districts we have been having daylight saving all through the years. In June, July, and August we have had our church services an hour earlier to escape the heat. If we had school during those months, the classes would have started an hour earlier, too. The only ones who benefited by the war time are the few metropolitan plutocrats who used to get to their office at 10—now get there at 9—standard time; and had an extra hour in the afternoon to play golf—which they couldn't do 12 months in the year, either. If some of the city factories and places of business would start an hour and a half hour earlier, that would relieve congestion on streetcars and busses. But that is the mayors' business. Relieve a war-confused people of this altogether unnecessary, irritating, and costly burden that has been saddled on them.

H. FREESE.

NEW PHILADELPHIA, OHIO.

Return our Nation to standard time. This daylight saving has created confusion worse confounded. One must use electricity more by beginning a day on eastern war time. Executive decree could govern working hours, but the sun still rises on God's time, which is even one-half hour later than standard. Most sincerely we hope the time bill will prevail.

EDNA M. SOUERS.

SANDY POINT, TEX.

It was an imposition on farmers to have ever had sun time changed. The average farmer can't produce as much with the new time. I have quit farming and don't expect to have another animal harnessed until the common-sense hours are restored. There was never any sense in changing the time. It seems that every nonessential rule those bureaucrats can devise is put into a law or rule. If there was any advantage in the change, it would be O. K., but there was never any need of it. I've discontinued 150 acres, and will never resume until the proper hours are reestablished.

H. L. TRAMMELL.

OUAQUAGA, N. Y.

Do away with this everlasting torment of war time. If golfers want to play, let them get up, and for heaven's sake leave the clocks alone. I am for America first, then pro-English from head to foot, but that don't mean we have to do like the English and set clocks 2 hours ahead. Let us have the time that has always been ours until some "brain truster" down at Washington came along to tell the common herd what's good for them. Success in getting our clocks set to standard time.

F. MERN.

IRWIN, OHIO.

Allow me to express my approval of efforts to restore the Nation to standard time. This idea of daylight saving, etc., is one of the most nonsensical things ever heard of. The return to central standard time in this section would greatly increase the efficiency of farm labor at a time when it is most necessary.

G. G. MCILROY,
President, Farm Management, Inc.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The attention of the board of directors of this organization was called to a news dispatch which stated in effect that a bill had been introduced to return the United States to normal time.

California farmers have found that the so-called war-saving or war time has been a war losing time in their operations. Thousands of hours are lost from day to day because farm work cannot start in the morning until the dew has dried from the fields and trees.

It is apparent that American agriculture will see a greater shortage of labor in 1944 than at any other time during the recent years. It will be difficult at best to plant and harvest our crops.

In view of these circumstances the board of directors of this organization has formally endorsed the proposed legislation.

ASSOCIATED FARMERS OF CALIFORNIA, INC.,
By S. H. STRATHAM,
Executive Secretary.

WALLOWA, OREG.

I am in accord with the repeal of daylight saving, cutting out all red tape, etc. I have been trying for some time to get one of the Oregon Congressmen to present a bill for repeal.

Here's hoping it carries in a big way.

H. M. THOMPSON.

PINE BLUFF, ARK.

Rid the country of the war daylight-saving time, which benefits no one. This law saves nothing in the way of electricity or gas, and we will be very glad to see the law repealed and let God take care of the daylight.

If there is anything I can do to help along the repeal of this fool law command us.

Mrs. MAUDE S. FLYNN.
Mrs. TRACY MILLS.

MOBERLY, MO.

I hope the bill to establish standard time all over the United States will be enacted. The so-called daylight-saving time table now in effect is, in my opinion, just one more cockeyed regulation and is of no practical benefit whatsoever. In fact, its use entails the use of more electricity in this part of the country.

THOS. J. TYDINGS.

DAYTON, OHIO.

Please do all in your power to put bill 4489 in effect. I am sure the majority of the people of Dayton wish standard time.

LAWRENCE E. MILLER.

ARLINGTON, VA.

The sensible proposal to abolish the nonsense of trying to fool ourselves by monkeying with the hands of our clocks deserves the support of all intelligent citizens. The people deserve to be given the truth, even on the faces of their clocks.

TED SUMMERS.

BOSTON, MASS.

Earnestly endorse the bill to abolish daylight saving and return to normal time. Unfair to the laboring man and wastes electricity and gas and complicates every business and household activity. Let us get back to sun time with which everybody everywhere is acquainted and satisfied.

J. H. CRAMER.

SUGAR GROVE, ILL.

There isn't anything that will help the farmers more than to go back to standard time. They actually have to go by God's time to a certain extent and they are always out of tune with the towns and cities.

City folks complain they can't get the children to bed in the summer so they can get their rest. And all winter they have to get up in the dark.

It upsets the farmers work in every way. There really isn't one good point in favor of it. It very definitely hampers war production on the farm.

So I am speaking for all farmers in this section of the country when I say we hope fast time goes out fast. We are all hoping and praying for our regular time.

Mrs. OAKLEY MIGHEEL.

BOSTON, MASS.

The country is all upset from daylight saving. The time should be left the way the Lord intended, not what a few want.

(Many signatures.)

DAYTON, OHIO.

I wish to express my desire to return to and keep standard time.

CARL BACHER.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.

People down here in the sunny South certainly hope the bill against the fast time will go over in a big way. We are tired of it.

MARGARET GIBBON.

ENDICOTT, N. Y.

Get rid of the so-called daylight saving. It is the most foolish and one of the dumbest this country has ever had to endure. Let's have standard time.

Mrs. JOHN N. BOWER.

CLARKSVILLE, TEX.

Millions of folks in these United States join in trying to get the new war saving time repealed and getting back to standard time. This new time has cost the people millions of dollars more for fuel and light bills. This new time has hindered the war effort instead of helping. Do away with this unnecessary wartime.

D. J. STANPHILL.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

These are the days of willing and unquestioning sacrifices. These are also the days of agonized pleas for 100-percent efficiency. It is essential that our workers as well as our soldiers and sailors and air force be at their best at all times. It was no trick at all to sell the idea that by tempering with the clock, more money could be made. The world was stunned by the most calamitous war in all history. It was in a condition to grasp at any straw that would help increase production. The idea looked good. It was adopted, first in Europe, then here. Clocks were earnestly turned back and a certain amount of daylight, previously "wasted," was put to work.

The avowed purpose is to save daylight, yet all our munition works and factories, railroads, coal mines, etc., are working continuously 24 hours a day. Every bit of daylight is used and every bit of darkness too. Who wants it? The farmer doesn't, the mother of growing children doesn't, the laborer, the soldier, sailor, and airman don't, the businessman doesn't, in fact, the vast majority of our population doesn't want it. Only a dwindling handful of golfers get some little light for their pellet chasing while the rest of us are condemned to eat our dinner in mid-afternoon, wasting daylight until after sunset. We get up in pitch-black darkness, turn on artificial light, hurry through our dismal breakfast, stumple out into dimly lit streets, wander into brilliantly lighted offices or work shops where, half asleep and at a dangerously low energy level, we must apply ourselves to precision work at an outrageously accelerated pace for many hours on end, oblivious to whether the sun may be shining or not. That sun is our great health giver, vitalizer, and energy producer.

Absenteeism is on the increase and the toll taken by accidents in war work is mounting at an alarming rate. Efficiency has been lowered and general health menaced in a host of new neuroses and mental complaints due to hyptertension. Set the hands of the clock back where they belong. It would increase efficiency and improve general health, although most of those who suffer most from this off-key life are unaware of the underlying cause of their present discontent and chronic weariness.

RALPH DEGOLIER,
Head of Modern Language Department,
Trinity School.

COLUMBUS, OHIO.

We heartily concur with you in the effort to get us back to God's time once more. In fact, the people don't particularly care what kind of time it is, just so we adopt one time and stay there.

The writer is a traveling man and covers several of the Midwestern States. Everybody is badly confused with the various varieties of time. Nobody I have talked with can see where it helps the war effort. The old argument about conserving electricity is the bunk. The golf player is the only one that likes it.

We go to bed by daylight and get up in the dark.

Anything you can do to get us out of this time mess will certainly be appreciated by a very confused public. The thoughts I have attempted to express here are not all my own but of the many that I come in contact with every day.

C. C. THOMAS.

STOCKBRIDGE, MICH.

Get congressional action to abandon war time and set all clocks of the United States on the true time—standard time based on sun time. We have not gotten very far on war time, so I earnestly urge Congress to open their eyes and fall back to God's time. The so-called war time is detrimental to human rights, and our Michigan Legislature voted it down, but the Detroit "Hirohitos" overruled them. In talking with many people I have yet to hear of war time doing anybody any good.

FRED MCCONEGHY.

MANSFIELD, OHIO.

This artificial time is most unpopular and certainly wasteful. You would have to live on a farm fully to appreciate the latter. If you want to have a part in any worth-while project in the city, it is necessary to quit your work in the middle of the afternoon in order to have all stock cared for and just routine work done in time to attend the meeting. You can see what that does toward our efforts to raise all the food we can in this time of war, and we are all doing everything we possibly can in this time.

The bill will have the solid support of rural folks.

Mrs. H. J. SEEVERS.

BRYAN, OHIO.

The bill to return the country to a standard time basis will be greatly appreciated by millions of people, especially the day working class, who must arise around 4 o'clock in the morning, based on the old time, to get started for work. I must be to work at 7:30 eastern war time, as I work on the New York Central Railroad, and must be at the station for a train due at 8:13 a. m. eastern war time. I have talked with several of the railroad men and they do not like eastern war time. Most all of us day men are around 50 to 70 years of age, and we must be to work from 7 to 8:30 a. m. As compared to the old central standard time, we report for work from 5 to 6:30 a. m.

Get the country back on a standard time basis. That is what the people want.

E. A. KASTNER.

STERLING, OHIO.

From my observations, it is my opinion that daylight-saving time or war time is O. K. during the summer months, that is, from around May 1 to October 1, and would be much better for the State of Ohio than the present situation, where we have two kinds of time, but most communities will change to war time again about May 1.

I hope that a compromise will be made between your bill and year around war time, so that we can have daylight-saving time in summer and the regular zone time in winter.

It sure seems foolish to go to work at 7 a. m. in winter and find it does not get daylight for a couple of hours yet.

G. A. MCBRIDE,
General Secretary-Treasurer,
The Order of Railroad Telegraphers.

OXFORD, OHIO.

I have received many communications from Grange members throughout the State expressing satisfaction over the fact that you have introduced a bill to place the Nation back on standard time. It is the feeling of the farmers that the fast time has not been of any benefit to industry and that it has been a great handicap to farmers in their food-production efforts.

JOSEPH W. FICHTER,
Master, Ohio State Grange.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Dallas, Tex.

I am enclosing an editorial from one of our leading newspapers regarding the bill to abolish daylight-saving time. It expresses my views and that of everyone else with whom I have talked, except that I would express my objections to the present system more strongly.

I believe that I can conservatively say that 90 percent of our people would like to go back to standard time. We do not object to any inconvenience that is necessary to the war effort; but we do not like to have a lot of what we think are foolish regulations just to make us war conscious. And no one has ever yet explained satisfactorily wherein the present system in any way contributes to the war effort. During the past winter I have seen many women standing in the cold and rain long before daylight waiting for streetcars or busses to go to work. If that helps the war I cannot see it.

JEFF D. STINSON,
Chairman, Committee on Municipal and Private Corporations.

[Enclosure]

[From the Dallas (Tex.) Times Herald of March 29, 1944]

TURNING THE CLOCK BACK

A Representative has introduced a bill in Congress to abolish daylight-saving time. He would turn the clocks back the hour they were set ahead when the present time system was adopted as a war measure.

It is to be hoped that the Congressman's effort will meet with success.

It may be that the ingenious method of setting the clock ahead an hour to get more work done has produced the desired effect in some portions of the country. It is doubtful, however, that it has produced any such results in places like Texas.

It may be that it has saved some electric power, which was, as we recall it, another of the announced objectives.

Lacking specific figures on both these points, no attempt is made here to pass on them definitely.

But it can be said without fear of contradiction that daylight saving, so-called, has disarranged the lives and schedules of a great many people, who do not like it. They would like to get back to standard time again. It is only necessary to point out that several State legislatures have already taken action for their States, and to look around and listen to the reactions of the average citizen, to prove this.

In the face of such popular demand, it should take a good deal of convincing argument to keep this bill from becoming law.

ELIZABETH, N. J.

I am against daylight saving time. We middle-class people, who live in the city, get no enjoyment out of it. The sun stays up too late for the rooms to cool off and a workingman has to go to bed in daylight. I say get rid of it for all time.

Mrs. L. GABRIELSEN.

DAYTON, OHIO.

It will be a godsend to war workers and others to eliminate daylight saving time so it will be effective this month. You are familiar with all the confusion and argument this measure has caused the entire Nation and this letter is merely to add support from this part of the country. Wishing you unlimited success in getting the measure adopted quickly.

D. A. COZAD.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Abolish daylight saving time and return us all to standard time once more. I fail to see how it can aid in the war effort when most of us go to work in the dark of the morning for so many months in the year. It is bad enough for the few months in the summer but all year round is harmful.

A great many fatalities, due to heart attack, are due to an accumulation of fatigue produced in the circulatory system, brought about by the loss of sleep occasioned by daylight saving.

Especially is this true in men who are between 40 and 50.

In behalf of the early riser.

N. E. KOENIG.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

It isn't fair for 999 people to be forced to get out an hour early so one of each thousand can play golf. These golf players could get up before 8 a. m. and play golf before they go to business at 9 or 10.

Believe me, the first ward of Binghamton, the largest and most populated ward in the city, is against daylight saving. Our councilman can attest to that fact.

JOHN J. SIMECK.

MARYVILLE, MO.

We have read of the bill to go off daylight-saving time November until February, inclusive. We, as an American Problems Class, wish to express our opinion of the bill. Many of our pupils must walk considerable distances before boarding our school busses, which leave the far end of their routes at 7 a. m. in order to be at school at 8:30, our usual starting time. Parents have to arise so early to get their children off to school that there is so much time lost because of their being unable to perform any work before daylight. The pupils have to travel in all kinds of weather and, due to road conditions, it is inconvenient to walk in the dark.

It is the opinion of the class that the majority of the people of the rural sections are in favor of your plan to change back to standard time, especially during the winter months.

AMERICAN PROBLEMS CLASS, HORACE MANN HIGH SCHOOL, THE NORTHWEST MISSOURI STATE TEACHERS COLLEGE.
(Many signatures.)

PALMYRA, PA.

So glad someone is interested in abolishing daylight-saving time. I am sure we do not save any, getting up at 4 in the morning, and I would like to see the man from Pittsburgh who is supposed to be father of daylight-saving time get up that time. I think he is one of those who don't know what hard work is. I would like to see him get up at 4 in the morning, work in the hayfields and, when threshing time, help there. I'm sure he would not need to go on the golf course to sweat. I sure think it was one of the meanest things done. If anyone cares to get up an hour earlier let him do so and not compel others. Why not let the time as it was. Man cannot change the moon, stars, or sun.

Hope we will win; here's luck.

Mrs. R. C. BOWMAN.

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.

Please give the daylight-saving bill an extra kick for all time when it comes up for repeal. We are a patient, long-suffering people, but when it is 5 o'clock it is not 6; why allow ourselves to be fooled. Don't forget to knock it out for good.

A. H.

JACKSON, TENN.

We, in our city, are very pleased over effort to get back to God's time. Please work a little harder and know all the housekeepers are with you, for it's been a terrible trial on us.

Thank you.

LOIS SAUNDERS.

BARRY, ILL.

Abandon war time and put the Nation on standard time.

It would be one of the finest things that could be done for the betterment of our country.

I have never been able to see where this war time does anyone any good at all. I could think of hundreds of reasons why it should not have been done.

I hope we get the time changed.

G. N. REDMAN.

EVERETT, MASS.

I have read with interest the April 7 issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and want to take this opportunity to commend your stand in this "crackpot" idea of tampering with the Nation's time.

Every citizen of this country is good and sick of this tampering with the clocks and it is high time we got back to sanity.

EUGENE BERTRAM WILLARD.

TACOMA, WASH.

I was very glad to read that Congress will soon start hearings on the bill to put the country back on standard time.

I have never been able to figure out how daylight saving, or war time, has been of sufficient benefit to even offset the confusion and inconvenience it has caused. I sincerely hope Congress will see fit to repeal it.

ALMA MADSEN.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I want to express my appreciation of the bill to eliminate daylight saving from November 1 to March 1.

It's just a pain in the neck to get up and go to work in the dark in the wintertime. And, judging from Pepco's reports, I can't see where it saves any electricity, because what you don't burn in the evening you burn in the morning, and vice versa.

CLIFFORD E. SHULTZ.

LISCOMB, IOWA.

Enclosed find a petition in favor of restoring time back to standard, or sun, time.

This was signed by two Christian churches here.

Nobody refuses to sign, and I could get a thousand signers if I would get out and canvass.

The sun time suits us so much better, and hope you can get it restored to where it should be.

G. S. NUGENT.
(Seventy-eight signatures.)

FORT WORTH, TEX.

Please change the clocks back pronto. Get rid of this confusing mistake. It was well-intentioned but has turned out to be a sad mistake. I hope Congress will never again tamper with the time.

M. F.

BROOKLINE, MASS.

I wish to commend abolition of daylight-saving time.

This is the wish of thousands in this section. Best of luck in the matter.

N. E. BARNES.

ARLINGTON, CALIF.

We in the rural districts of the State of California are, indeed, interested in efforts to repeal the daylight-saving law and put the Nation back on standard time.

The Governor, as well as the California State Grange, have gone on record as being in favor of the restoration of standard time. The act has not accomplished its purpose and is causing vast inconvenience.

T. L. COWDEN.

ARLINGTON, CALIF.

Efforts in regard to the abolishment of the wartime daylight saving have not gone unnoticed by the farmers of California. As you know, the farmer lives and works by the sun, so any legislation to change that is entirely without purpose.

Our Governor Warren has come out strongly in favor of rescinding this bill and we are all firmly behind any action which will restore standard time.

RACHEL G. ORCIERE.

CASEYVILLE, ILL.

I want to add all possible help to efforts to get this country back on standard time. I work shift work, but fast time is as much a detriment to me as to the farmers and other people.

When on the day shift it means getting up an hour earlier, which in the wintertime takes more fuel and electricity and in the summertime robs me of an hour's sleep in the cool of the morning when I could sleep. It means dangerous hardships for most school children starting to school in the dark. If I need to work in the garden, I would much prefer doing it before going to work instead of in the midafternoon in the heat of the day. Very few people will even play golf then, let alone working at anything else. On the midnight to 8 shift I get very little sleep in the daytime and could get another hour before going to work if we were on standard time. Most war plants are on 24-hour schedules, so changing the clock cannot possibly benefit them. I know of no advantage in fast time to anyone, but certainly am aware of its disadvantages.

CARL W. CLAY.

EDMONDS, WASH.

I would like to see our clocks set back where they should of been left. It was never anything but a silly idea at best.

JENNIE L. ANDREWS.

DAYTON, OHIO.

I am in favor of bill H. R. 4489, to restore standard time.

The present arrangement gives us a very unpleasant rearrangement of time that is harmful rather than helpful in the war effort.

M. J. GIBBONS SUPPLY CO.

LOUISVILLE, KY.

Abolish war time. I am not only speaking for myself but for hundreds of my fellow men at the L. & N. R. R. shops here, as being in favor of standard time, all the time.

WILLIAM H. PERKINS.

PASS CHRISTIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Pass Christian, Miss.

I am directed to send you a copy of the enclosed resolution introduced by Mr. Robinson on September 2, 1943, at a regular meeting of this body.

MYRTLE S. MCDERMOTT,
Secretary.

Whereas the existing daylight-saving law is causing unnecessary and wasteful use of electricity and imposing hardships and expense on many people during the long nights of the winter season; and

Whereas no such conditions existed during the First World War, when daylight saving was observed during the season when the days were long and the nights were short; and

Whereas there is no reason why the daylight-saving hours observed during the First World War should not be put into effect now, thus causing less expense and bringing more satisfactory results: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Pass Christian Chamber of Commerce, That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized and urged to amend or change the existing law so as to provide that the period of daylight saving shall begin on the third Sunday in April and end on the third Sunday in September each year at hours to be fixed by law, and continue in operation until the end of the war.

GRAY SUMMIT, MO.

I want to tell you how pleased everyone was with the bill to change back to standard time. Please can you get that bill through in a hurry?

MILFORD T. OMOHUNDEO.

DEPARTMENT OF HIGHWAYS,
Leesburg, Va.

Several weeks ago there was an article in the Washington papers stating that you had introduced a bill in Congress for the repeal of the daylight-saving time.

The employees of the highway department in Loudoun County are very much in favor of your bill and we would like to know what progress has been made toward getting this bill passed.

G. P. BOZEL, Resident Engineer.

MASSACHUSETTS.

To the EDITOR OF THE POST.

SIR: The article on page 1 of a recent edition of the Post setting forth that at last Representatives are coming out for a repeal of the so-called daylight saving is sure good news to all of us workers.

Must we go through another winter with this crazy set-up? Why has there not been something done before this to put us back on our regular time? Farmers, workers, and especially mothers, have been clamoring for the turn-back to normal time and no one has done a thing about it. When this thing was put over it was just for one reason, but like many other things that have been put over on a gullible public, it has remained until we are all fed up on it.

Please, will some of the politicians do something now?

F. D.

CLARENCE, MO.

I noticed in paper a bill to change from war time to old time.

We are farmers, operating about 800 acres of land, and are interested in having time changed. Have talked to a number of good farmers and all have expressed themselves that they would like to have the change.

When we are putting up hay, harvesting oats, wheat, and soybeans, or plowing corn early the dew ordinarily makes it very bad getting started on war time. Then when 6 o'clock comes the greater part of labor wants to quit and at that time it is best part of time to work in farming season.

Then in winter when days are short and you get out at war time you have to get stock up, and we don't think that good in feeding stock.

We are interested in food production and doing our part in winning the war in the best way to our best judgment, and the number we have talked to feel it would be best to have time changed back.

MCCARTY BROTHERS.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

Abandon war time and go back to standard time.

I don't believe one watt of electricity was saved by this war-time policy, and I believe it is much nicer to go out in the evening when it's dark. The days are long enough in the summer without trying to make the evenings longer.

Here in Los Angeles before the war this change of time had been voted down by the people several times.

So here's hoping we can return to normal standard time soon.

RAYMOND MCLAUGHLIN.

WINTER PARK, FLA.

I have thought that no one in the United States disliked this stupid war time as much as myself. In winter it is dark here until after 8 a. m.; breakfast has to be prepared and eaten by artificial light—though we are urged to save electricity. It is too wet to work in one's garden. Country children have to take the bus, if they live any distance from it, in the dark. In summer it is not so bad in the morning but one has to water the garden while the sun is quite hot. I should think golfers would not be able to play until 5:30 p. m. at least.

If it were intended for workers in munitions factories, I fail to see the need of it because there is a night shift anyway. I hope Congress will succeed in going back to standard time.

MARIAN S. FRANKLIN.

HUMBOLDT, TENN.

I am glad to find someone whose views coincide with my own on the subject of wartime or daylight-saving time, as it is erroneously called.

Daylight saving time is the greatest misnomer, in fact so great as to be rank folly. I have yet to see one person but that says to have the clock an hour ahead of the sun causes them to use much more current for household and business alike. It causes the man of small or average income to pay extra light bill, for he must have light 2 hours on the average every morning while if the clock were with the sun he would have to use artificial lights only 1 hour.

Defense workers who are on the daylight (8 a. m. to 4 p. m.) shift must get out of bed and make all preparations for the day in pitch darkness and go to the bus lines and stand there in blackness of early morning waiting to catch their bus. This from November to April at least. Frankly, I see not even an atom of common sense in such an arrangement.

MRS. R. C. BETTS.

LITTLE FALLS, N. Y.

Abandon the war time and put the Nation on standard time.

Having the clocks ahead of standard time this past winter was nonsense and no saving as far as electricity was concerned, and many here think it lowered physical resistance.

E. F. J.

CANANEA, SONORA, MEXICO.

I noticed in a Douglas, Ariz., newspaper congressional action to abandon war time and put the Nation back on standard time.

I have noted the effects of time in various parts of the Nation from coast to coast and have made a thorough study of our time system. The sun after all governs daylight and railway junctions do not.

During the short days of winter nearly half the population go to work an hour before daylight and the other half quit work an hour after dark. Such a situation does not help the war effort or save electrical energy.

Your proposal is something that is vital to every American.

JERE CHAMBERLAIN.

[Telegram]

ELKO, NEV.

Fight the silly daylight-saving law. I heartily endorse your stand. More power to you. I think—and so do thousands of others—that this law is about the most foolish and unnecessary one ever written and enforced. There is no saving of anything; in fact, it requires more electricity most places, as 8 a. m. is actually 7 a. m. and barely daylight inside of houses and stores. There is only 24 hours in a day and a man or woman can only do so much in 8 hours whether the day starts at 8 a. m. or fictitiously at 7 a. m.

The people that want to get up early and start Victory gardens, etc., will do it anyway at whatever time they please regardless of the time of day, and if everyone was doing their bit for the war effort they wouldn't need time in the afternoon for golf—they could be better employed helping in some local service that was short-handed on account of the war. There is entirely too much regimentation by Washington trying to tell all the people what they must do, and passing a law telling us when we must start the day, etc., is just much too much. Kill this daylight-saving foolishness.

CARROL H. PARSONS.

ESTHERVILLE, IOWA.

For God's sake do all you can to put the clock back to the right time. It is driving us all nuts and we are all losing money by this war time. The war is bad enough with out putting up with the wrong time. Put it back to the standard time and help win the war.

ALLEN SMITH,
For all the people of Estherville.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.

Do something to get off this daylight-saving time. I don't see where there is any saving in the new time. I'm speaking from experience, and really I feel worse since the war time has been into effect, as I don't get enough rest. Hoping the new time will be changed and you succeed in getting the clock on standard time soon.

MRS. E. L. BURFORD.

WEBSTER, N. Y.

After reading a news item regarding efforts to abolish war time. I wish to emphatically state that I am heartily in favor of the bill. In my opinion this turning back the clock has done nothing. It has saved neither electricity nor the people's patience and is just another example of foolhardy legislation.

LOUIS F. KOLB.

LOUISVILLE, KY.

I am glad to know someone in Congress doesn't favor daylight-saving time.

For working people who have to get up at 4:30 or 5 a. m. and some even earlier, it is cruel.

The idea that it saves electricity is worse than foolish. People all over the Nation getting up earlier burn a lot more electricity and use their automobile lights. In the summer it is too unbearably hot to go to bed at the accustomed hour so people lose that extra sleep.

I'm positive the people who thought up this abominable idea do not get up early every morning, winter and summer. They would be the first to complain.

MRS. W. G. BROWN.

CAMPBELLSPORT, WIS.

It is with great interest that I and millions of other people of this Nation have been reading and hearing over radios of the fight in Congress for sensible standard time. It's been a big disadvantage to everyone except playboys, night-spot patrons, and golfers, and we the people who are so necessary to the war effort and working for the good of the Nation in every way would like Congress to show us where that caliber of people are so important to the Nation, that Washington should cater to them.

Millions of us in every State are so thankful for the bill to abolish war time. Our earnest wishes are that it will be brought about. The sooner the better for this Nation.

Keep up the fight for us.

E. F. MESSNER.

VACAVILLE, CALIF.

Just a brief note on the bill to eliminate the silly "crackpot" ruling or act called daylight saving which saves nothing and does no good. All its bad features you already know so I will not take up your time in a tirade against the childish act. It is in a class with tin pennies and other well-meant moves produced by war hysteria. We have too many serious things before us these days without so many trivial things. We, the people, are not complacent. We are worried, some of us grief-stricken, all with some fear. We could hardly be complacent and there is no sense in daylight saving. If you could interview 129,000,000 of us, you would find that many against the act.

M. SHARPE.

MOBILE, ALA.

Repeal daylight-saving time.

That will be one of the best things that can be done. I do not see where we save any time, men come to work and have to wait for daylight to go to work.

Keep up the good work and repeal it.

STUART C. STEINER.

UNIVERSITY CITY, MO.

Do all you can to abolish daylight saving. We save nothing. The disadvantages are a hundredfold greater than the advantages. It has caused hardship to 90 percent of the people in our country. I never could understand why any person should want to tinker with Father Time.

F. ROY DEAN,
Member of General T. J. Wint Camp No. 14, Department of Missouri, United Spanish War Veterans.

Mr. Speaker, these letters are voluntary and spontaneous. Without prompting or suggestion from any source, the writers out of their deep personal interest, have taken the time to write a letter in the earnest hope that the Congress will take action for relief from this national handicap.

An interest so general and so insistent warrants at least affording the House an opportunity to consider and vote on the question.

Polish Constitution Day

REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, on May 3 Poles everywhere will celebrate the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the establishment of the constitution of that great nation. It is especially fitting that here on the floor of the Congress of the United States, a country which is linked to Poland in the firm common bond of the love of freedom, we should pay tribute to our valiant ally.

It was on May 3, 1791—2 years after the adoption of our own Constitution—that the Diet of Poland adopted a constitution for that nation, which, though the monarchy was retained, guaranteed to the people many liberties which had been denied them. In observing the anniversary of that great event, the Polish people honor the day as we of America do our Fourth of July, for both holidays mark a birth of freedom.

It is hardly necessary to remind any American of the contribution which those outstanding Polish patriots, Thaddeus Kosciuszko and Casimir Pulaski, made to our own struggle for liberty, nor is it necessary to extol again the heroic deeds of those Poles who have fought in the armed forces of this Nation in all its wars. We are eternally grateful to them. In now fighting on battlefields the world over so that Poland's freedom may again be wrested from the grip of an oppressor, Americans are repaying in some measure, the debt which we owe.

We are indebted to Poland not alone for her examples of bravery, fortitude, and devotion to freedom, but to the contributions which her people have made to the culture, the history, and the industry of this country. Her sons and daughters are talented in the arts and sciences; they are patriotic, God-fearing, and industrious. They have earned high places for themselves in the fields of government, law, medicine, and in other branches of human endeavor in this country, and in so doing they have enriched the Nation.

In the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and other branches of the armed services of this Nation, the rolls of honor of this war are studded with the names of heroes of Polish extraction. Thousands of young men whose parents or grandparents, instilled with the love of liberty in their native land, came to this country from Poland, are serving with great distinction. In my own district, boys of Polish descent have already won high honors for courage and for valor and many of them have given their lives in the service of this Nation.

These valiant boys and all Americans, whether or not we are actually serving in the armed forces, take inspiration from Poland, not alone for her early devotion to the cause of liberty, but for the fact that she has remained steadfast in her loyalty to her ideals. Let us not forget that it was Poland which was the first nation to resist Hitler in this war. Let us not forget that though the odds, as usual, were overwhelmingly against her, Poland chose to fight to protect her soil and her honor. The heroic defense of Warsaw shall ever be one of the most stirring and inspiring chapters in all history.

Again this year, as Polish Constitution Day is celebrated, the nation itself and millions of her people are in chains. Yet, for the first time since Hitler's hordes engulfed and enslaved her, Poland today can feel that the day when the shackles will be struck loose is not far distant. The success of the United Nations in all theaters of war during the past 12 months has given renewed hope to Poles everywhere—to the millions still remaining in Poland with little but courage to sustain them and to the countless others in exile who fight with and in the armies of her allies.

As the mighty armies of the United Nations stand poised for the invasion of the continent of Europe from the west, let those who have suffered at the hands of the brutal German invader take heart. The day of liberation is near. Poland, as she has in the past, will once again rise triumphantly to a place among nations befitting the traditions of her liberty-loving people, and the heroic sacrifices they have made to preserve her national spirit, her honor and her dignity.

Post-War Economy

REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, my remarks pertain to that period ahead of us which is occasioning so much apprehensive discussion just now—the adjustment period after victory is finally won. Even those of us who fear that victory is not "just around the corner" must if we are to be conscientious do what we can now to prepare for that post-war period.

I think it is generally conceded that no time in our past history has presented an outlook more fraught with foreboding, more filled with deep concern. And the worst thing about this apprehension is that unless allayed it could make us impotent to do anything definite to avert the danger. Is our Nation so bankrupt of statesmanship that we cannot insure ourselves against disaster? Has the competence we have displayed in waging war successfully exhausted our power to analyze these forces threatening the post-war period? I cannot and do not believe so.

Let us determine exactly what it is that we fear. If we know definitely what it is that we are afraid of we can build safeguards against it.

It is my belief that this fear is a hold-over from the long period of depression that the war lifted us out of so promptly. We fear that we may slump back into that same nightmare of unemployment and destitution. We know that there will be millions of soldiers and sailors and WAC's and WAVES and war workers who will be seeking work when the war ends and who will be unable to wait for weeks or months for it. What so deeply disturbs us then is the fear that after a brief post-war boom we will permit ourselves to slip back into depression—worse perhaps than the last one. This state of mind must and can be overcome.

It seems strange to me that we have not long ago sensed the analogy between depression and war. They are both manifestations of the same fundamental cause—the poverty and misery of great masses of the people somewhere. Allow people to be unable to buy the things they need and the things they can so readily produce and you bring on a depression that leaves them hopeless and apathetic. Allow this depression to last long enough and they become resentful and angry to a point where the demagog finds them in a mood to follow him into the excesses of war. Poverty and its attendant misery produce the social weed crop out of which, if allowed to grow too long, war will inevitably spring.

Our own depression like that in other nations of the world came upon us for one fundamental reason: In the midst of abundant production—or power to produce—we failed to make certain that the people had a buying power equal to their power to produce.

Here we find the key to all our difficulties; here we put our finger upon the weakness in our system. We create a system of exchange for our convenience, using a thing we call money to facilitate the exchange of goods and services that we possess for other kinds that we do not have. And while fully conscious of the fact that none of us can effect the necessary exchanges for our health and convenience without money, we foolishly permit an insignificant number of our population to maintain a monopoly of the creation and supply of money, withholding or releasing it for the use of the public as they will.

If society is ever going to rid itself of depressions and wars, it must destroy the monopolistic control over the flow of money. Money is the lifeblood of commerce and industry. Commerce and industry are the sole sources of created wealth. Without a constantly increasing volume of wealth equitably distributed we cannot maintain a growing and developing civilization.

So it becomes clearly apparent that for the general good it is imperative that the flow of money shall not inhere in the hands of a comparative few, but that its control, its issue, and distribution must be governed by the people themselves through their elected representatives, who will establish constitutional regulation of the output of money, establish its values, and set up an equable system for its distribution.

Among other measures for building such an economy of abundance is House bill No. 1649, which is nothing more nor less than an adaptation of the principle of insurance on a national scale. It would set up a mutual Federal annuity insurance for all citizens, making the immediate beneficiaries all those citizens who were adjudged by competent boards of examiners to be incapacitated for physical reasons from making a living. It would classify the adult population into two groups, the workers and those who by reason of old age, sickness, blindness, or some other cause, are seriously handicapped in the race for jobs. To those latter groups it would provide a fair share of the Nation's income each and every month for expenditure during that month. Thus the money received by the insured would flow directly back into the channels of trade and become a blacklog of assured consumer demand for the goods produced.

This would go a long way toward giving us demand in sufficient volume to enable the consuming public to buy and use goods of all kinds as fast as they could be produced. It is just as necessary for society to build and maintain a market as it is to build factories and turn out goods. Without either of these factors of business the other will prove to be useless.

Mr. Speaker, I urge careful consideration of H. R. 1649. Its basic principles contain in large measure the answer to unemployment, an insurance of the steady development of business and production, and the antidote for fear.

Such a program of national security insurance for those groups who cannot or should not be employed is a basic necessity in meeting our problem of the post-war world.

The Polish Situation

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, according to press reports, Prof. Oscar Lange and Rev. Stanislaus Orlemanski have been received by Premier Stalin at Moscow as American representatives to discuss the Polish situation.

Oscar Lange was a professor in the Chicago University and became a citizen of the United States only about a year ago. He is a self-appointed, one-man representative of the Americans of Polish extraction, and is attempting to sell Communist Russia to Poland so that Poland would then become a republic—but within the boundaries of Russia. It seems that he is in favor of giving away a greater portion of present Poland as a gift. I say that only a rat or a Quisling would sell his own mother country to the hated Communist.

Reverend Orlemanski, a Catholic priest, American-born, of Polish parentage, has made this trip with Professor Lange without his bishop's consent. Remembering Judas Iscariot who betrayed his Lord for 30 pieces of silver, I cannot help wondering what price this priest is asking to betray the land of his forefathers, his church, and the loyal Americans of Polish descent.

I am also wondering if the papal delegate and the bishop of his diocese will take the proper steps to unfrock this traitor to their church—a priest who has forgotten that it was through the valiant efforts of Poland, under the leadership of King John Sobieski, that Christianity was saved for Europe at Vienna in 1683.

I am wondering too why the State Department has issued visas which permitted the transportation of these two "representatives"—the traitors to Christianity, the land of their forefathers, and the principles of Americanism—to Russia at a time when Russia has renounced the principles as outlined in the Atlantic Charter.

It is definitely a matter to be given serious consideration.

Yesterday, Rev. Msgr. Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, issued the following statement, which appeared in the morning Washington Post:

CALLED "BURLESQUE"—PRELATE HITS SOVIET VISIT OF UNITED STATES PRIEST

The visit of an American priest of Polish descent to Russia is "a political burlesque, staged and directed by capable Soviet agents," for propaganda purposes, the Right Reverend Monsignor Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, declared here yesterday.

"It is the 'phoniest' propaganda that the usually clever-idea men in Russia have palmed off on the United States," he said.

The priest is the Reverend Stanislaus Orlemanski, of Springfield, Mass., who has been reported as having conferences in Moscow with Premier Stalin and other Soviet officials, concerning the fate of Poland after the war. He left his parish, according to diocesan authorities, without obtaining the proper ecclesiastical permission.

MENTIONS STATE DEPARTMENT

Monsignor Ready, noting that the priest involved is known as a partisan of Soviet policy, recalled that other had heretofore tried unsuccessfully at the State Department to "get worthy priests to Russia."

He referred to "stabbing in the back the Poland whose government this Nation recognizes."

"Since Russia now considers the Polish forced exiles in her territory citizens of the U. S. S. R., will our Government at the respectful request of millions of citizens, now issue a friendly indorsement for Russian passports for the priests and bishops imprisoned in Russia to come to the United States to enjoy the four freedoms?" he asked.

Monsignor Ready spoke at a communion breakfast of the regional supervisors of the National Catholic Community Service at the National Catholic School of Social Service here. Senator John A. Danaher of Connecticut, also spoke.

MONSIGNOR'S STATEMENT

Monsignor Ready's statement follows:

"The news of the arrival of a Catholic priest in Russia made the front pages of our press this week. The news in Russia was likewise phenomenal.

"Moscow announced that the purpose of this visit was to study the Polish situation and that of the Polish Army in the U. S. S. R. As a priest, Father Orlemanski would be much more interested, it seems to me, if he were permitted to seek out and to confer with the Polish priests and people enduring since 1939 a cruel exile in Siberia and other parts of the Soviet Union.

"But like other missions to Moscow this has no religious significance. It is a political burlesque, staged and directed by capable Soviet agents. It is the phoniest propaganda that the usually clever-idea men in Russia have palmed off on the United States.

"The incident naturally has aroused a great deal of speculation, and a lot of us who have tried heretofore at the State Department to get worthy priests to Russia would like to know the exact part our own Government had in the performance. It is heartening certainly to have the State Department spokesman say the White House had nothing to do with facilitating the passport arrangement, as first widely conjectured in the press.

"The implications of arranging a passport for the only priest in the United States—and likely the world—known as a partisan of Soviet policy are serious enough without having the White House accused of stabbing in the back the Poland whose Government this Nation recognizes.

POSES QUESTION

"The State Department spokesman said a passport was issued because of the request of a friendly government, Russia. That certainly is most interesting. Since Russia now considers the Polish exiles in her territory citizens of the U. S. S. R., will our Government, at the respectful request of millions of citizens, now issue a friendly endorsement for Russian passports for the priests and bishops imprisoned in Russia to come to the United States to enjoy the 'four freedoms'?

"It is discouraging to all who seek friendship with Russia to note the Soviet Government's methods of deceit and confusion. All the great peoples joined in the United Nations are fighting for a world of justice and truth and decency. Only one—Russia—stoops to policies and tactics which divide the orderly march of our forces to victory and a better world. If we cannot attain an honest collaboration among allies in the midst of war, we shall approach with misgiving the task of forming a really noble society of nations after the war.

"Russian valor and genius can contribute much to that hoped-for society, but only if based on truth and justice and charity. We pray for the peoples of the world to unite and bring about that sort of society. Only the Soviet Government is keeping the Russian people from that world fraternity."

The Invasion of Europe

REMARKS

OF

HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, zero hour and D-day are approaching for the landing of American troops on the west coast of Europe. This invasion will be the most stupendous, intricate and difficult attack ever made by any army. We hope that the steady, relentless pounding by our Air Forces has softened the German Army and the civilian will to resist. But Salerno and Cassino make us wonder and while we have high hopes, we know the advance is going to be tough.

Many men are sitting in this House who participated in the opening drive in the Argonne on September 26, 1918. That background enables them to visualize and sense the terrible job that our great Army has on its hands; it makes us know how tough a well-trained German Army can be, especially in rear-guard maneuvers.

These veterans of the World War will fully understand what it means to have high morale and the winning spirit in the troops who are going to accomplish such a great mission. Nothing is so important to the soldier as to know that the "folks back home" are thinking of him and supporting him. And I mean thinking of his future so that when he comes home a battle-scarred veteran he will be able to again find his niche in our society. And the mother, wife, and children of that group that will not come back should be taken care of, and particularly, the troops should know now, as zero hour approaches, that we have made provision for them.

Last night Commander Atherton of the American Legion voiced the hope that the House of Representatives would bring out the G I bill which passed the Senate by an almost unanimous vote. In this I heartily concur. The committee that has the bill should bring it out for action. We are not telling them what kind of a bill to bring out—that is their responsibility. But bring the bill out so we can vote and tell our veterans in a substantial way that we are going to help them when they get home; train each veteran for a job, give him a chance to go to college; loan him money—in short, help him every way we can to resume his place in his Nation, that he and his comrades have protected with their lives. If the committee wishes to amend the bill that is satisfactory, but bring it out now and the House will make short work of it and write into it what amendments it thinks essential. Every member that I have spoken to about this has his mind made up about what should be in the bill. And I predict that the bill we do pass—when we get a chance to vote on it—will be about the bill that the Senate sent over to us many weeks ago. Our troops are entitled to this small recognition from us now just on the eve of their greatest drive for victory.

Anti-Semitism in the Polish Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 26, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over Station WEVD on Saturday, April 29, 1944:

Americans were very rudely jolted last week end when news arrived from London that about 21 Jewish soldiers had received sentences ranging from 1 to 3 years for alleged "desertion" from the Polish Army. Soldiers deserting an army? Why? The "desertion" consisted of an attempt by these Jews to join the Britism armed forces. Again, why? And why the British Army? As the facts developed, the picture became clearer, it began to take on form and substance. It was the same old subject in a new frame.

A Polish court martial had been convened in Scotland, and the sentences had resulted. The convicted men had left the Polish forces because they could no longer endure the treatment meted out to them by Polish officers and noncoms. They had been snubbed and cuffed, beaten and insulted. They had been the victims of uncontrollable and deplorable impulses. Those they considered their comrades in arms had fallen upon them with the wickedness of animals in a jungle. One can well imagine their bitterness and amazement. This was happening in free England; 600 innocent men are involved, but to date only 21 have been sentenced.

Reports indicate that many of the so-called deserters were veterans, some were wounded in the battles of Poland and of France. They had amply demonstrated their desire to fight Hitler. As experienced and battle scarred soldiers, they have memories of many an endless march along hot and dusty roads and during the cold and storm of winter. They have known the distress of bad sleeping quarters, of poor food, and danger every minute. They know what it means to lose an arm or a leg or have a bullet go crashing through one's skull. They have also learned that it is necessary to pick one's way carefully at times or a booby trap will blow you to bits.

Yet they had been the objects of scorn and reprisal and hostility. Why? They were Jewish.

There was an intimation of serious trouble when on April 21 the news despatches from London disclosed that the War Minister, Sir James Grigg, would be asked in Commons the following Tuesday if he would consider the formation of a Jewish unit in the British Army, composed of soldiers who could not serve in the Polish armed forces because of anti-Semitic outbursts of a virulent character.

In this connection, a public meeting is scheduled to be held in London on May 14 and the slogan "End race persecution on British soil" has been adopted. The well-known British weekly, the New Statesman and Nation, has criticized Foreign Minister Anthony Eden for the statement that he cannot intervene again for the transfer of Jewish soldiers in the Polish Army to the British forces. The article further indicated that the British Government had the obligation as well as the right to demand that the powers given by Britain to its Polish allies are not to be abused. A refusal, it was said, might lead to grave and damaging incidents among the Allied armies when the offensive against the Continent begins.

Members of the British Parliament, representing all parties have expressed indignation and have protested the convictions. It has been reported in the London Daily Express that the British Government was likely to take action.

This sudden rupture came hard on the heels of the first anniversary of the Battle of the Warsaw Ghetto, where at least 40,000 were slaughtered. The actual figure is unknown but estimates run as high as 400,000, inasmuch as it has been determined that this number had been imprisoned in a carefully guarded section of the city. These Warsaw martyrs were subsisting on the barest of food rations in tremendously overcrowded tenements under the most unsightly conditions. They were diseased, dying, and helpless. They had been told they would be deported but suddenly it dawned upon them that deportation in the Nazi code was synonymous with death. As their wretched numbers diminished, a wild determination to fight, to resist, stiffened their waning courage. Arms were smuggled in and when the Nazis arrived to make fresh inroads into this poor mass of humanity, the quiet preparation of weeks broke out into a furious battle. Many Germans died and the fortress was bombarded but the survivors held every inch of soil until fatally overcome. Persons of all faiths and all creeds, throughout the world, paid tribute to the Jews of Warsaw, lauding their phenomenal courage and sacrifice in the face of relentless death and destruction. In this historic siege, they struck their blow for the freedom of their fellowman, knowing full well their own resistance was hopeless. The New York Times, commenting in an editorial commemorating the occasion, justly estimated the truly heroic nature of this incident. "The whole human race owes them a debt of gratitude for the inspiration their self-sacrifice gives to the cause of freedom."

Have they died in vain, these Jewish heroes? Shall their spirit go unheeded? Will their Jewish brethren have to struggle on in darkness, to be the eternal whipping posts of Europe? Will they be the continuous victims of unrestrained whims and caprices? Are they doomed to the constant repetition of the discriminatory experiences occasioned by race and religion?

In the light of events such questions are extremely pertinent.

The board of deputies of British Jews, representing the bulk of English Jewry, has expressed deep concern over the terrorism existing in the Polish Army. The British Government was petitioned to intervene with the Polish authorities so that the findings of the court martial might be reviewed and annulled in keeping with the principles of the present struggle.

A delegation of 3,000 Jewish clothing workers called on Prime Minister Churchill and, although unable to see him, left a letter protesting the treatment of Jews in the Polish forces and urging action. It is understandable that British Jews cannot remain content until the rights of Polish Jewish soldiers are fully guarded and preserved.

A high-ranking Polish official is reported to have commented by way of excuse that the details concerning antisemitism were "exaggerated."

However, we have the startling account of one such situation, and it does not sound embellished. A Jewish soldier reports that his superior, in a fury, yelled at him: "When we invade the continent, I know what I shall do with the first two bullets. I shall kill a Jew with one and a German with the other!"

I have seen copies of letters from Polish Jewish soldiers which speak of their desperate plight. The words "dirty Jews" are constantly on the lips of the Polish officers. I quote from one of the letters: "One day, when the wireless gave the news of 40,000 Jews massacred by the Nazis in a gas chamber, a Polish officer said, 'A good job. Poland will have less Jews.'"

At another time a Pole said, "Wait until we get back to Poland. Then we will not leave a single Jew alive." It is the fear of Jewish soldiers on Polish ships that they will be pushed overboard by their so-called comrades in arms.

The worst of the anti-Semitic Poles are soldiers who actually fought in the German Army under Rommel and who were taken prisoners in north Africa. Polish authorities obtained their release because they were Polish subjects and commandeered them into the Polish Army. Their hostility to Jewish soldiers is undisguised and most outspoken. Staff sergeants have repeatedly stated: "We will kill all the Jews when we come to Poland. It is better to kill one Jew on the battlefield than two Germans."

I have the statement of a Jewish young man serving in the Polish Navy on a destroyer. He has the proud distinction of wearing the Polish Military Cross and the English Distinguished Service Cross. He states that he was informed by a friend, a Christian soldier, that Polish sailors had decided to throw him overboard because he was a Jew. He stated that other Jewish sailors and soldiers had been pushed into the sea in that way, and when complaints were offered to commanding officers, no disciplinary measures or punishments were enforced. He stated that Jewish sailors were savagely beaten only because they were Jews.

There was a symposium of Polish officers held at Burn Island, in Scotland, in which captains, majors, and colonels participated. The following opinions and promises were registered: "The Jews will be wiped out not only in Poland but also in England. * * * We should not wait until we come back to Poland to kill Jews, but should kill the Jews here."

Demand has been made—and it is one in which I join—that all officers and noncommissioned officers guilty of generating or permitting such intolerable conditions should be stripped of their rank and immediately and severely punished.

Even Russia has joined in the attack on the Polish authorities and has charged that Ukraine and White Russian soldiers in the Polish forces have been likewise mistreated and tortured by Polish gendarmes.

While American public opinion has not been slow in reacting to this sample of the intemperance and hostility of undisciplined minds, it has not been really vociferous. The Jewish Labor Committee, emphasizing that it speaks for 500,000 organized American workers, cabled a strongly worded protest to labor members of the Polish Cabinet in London, expressing its deep-rooted resentment at the extremity of the sentences imposed by the Polish court martial. It stated, "We are well acquainted with the self-sacrifice and bravery of the Jews in the Polish armed services. * * * We, therefore, resent and categorically reject the slur upon the Jewish people, by saying that the Jewish soldiers in the Polish Army have been guilty of desertion."

I say, they did what any red-blooded American with guts would do—go over to the British to fight. They are no less heroic than their brethren exterminated in the Warsaw ghetto.

The British press has strongly condemned the conduct of the Polish authorities, the News Chronicle commenting that "a thoroughly disagreeable impression has been created among all parties and classes as a result of the heavy sentences." It further states that the people of America, Russia, and of all the United Nations will "watch closely to see how we handle the affair, which contains all the elements of the vile spirit of oppression which millions are giving their lives to destroy." An editorial in the Daily Express said that the British people will be glad to learn that the reassurances of the Polish Government are not merely formal instructions, but indicate a determination to stamp out anti-Semitism in the armed forces.

It has been revealed that the trial of the Jewish soldiers was ordered by the Polish War Minister, Gen. Majan Kukiel, after 207 Jews were transferred by the British authorities from the Polish Army. It is well to note here and now that one-third have already been placed in British combat units, clearly indicating that they did not seek any evasion of action service.

The Polish authorities set up a commission to examine the charges. It sought to whitewash the Polish military, but, frankly, this whitewash will not wash. Indeed, the cart has been again placed before the horse, for it has been learned that a circular has been issued to all Polish troops, warning that desertion would be punished by loss of citizenship to the soldier and his entire family.

Outraged by the entire proceedings, on April 24, I wrote a letter of protest to His Excellency Jan Ciechanowski, the Polish Ambassador to the United States, in which I stated that American public opinion was not indifferent to the unjust treatment accorded these Jewish soldiers in the Polish Army and that it was incumbent upon him to so advise his government. I stated that the action of the military authorities is a negation of the freedom of religion and the freedom from fear, two of the four freedoms and incorporated as basic principles in the Atlantic Charter, recognized and respected by the civilized world as an indispensable adjunct to the continuation of the comity of nations.

I am in violent disagreement with the argument that this behavior on the part of the Polish military authorities is entirely an internal problem. Anti-Semitism is a virus that spreads more quickly than the dread forest fires. It is a menace to all soldiers, not merely to Jewish soldiers in the Polish Army.

I further stated that the good offices of the United States had been sought in the physical boundary dispute between Russia and Poland. I asked the good offices of the Polish Ambassador to wipe out a "religious boundary cruelty."

His Excellency, the Polish Ambassador, replied to my communication. Frankly, his letter is most unsatisfactory. If I were to use uncomplimentary language, I would refer to it as so much "eyewash." It is filled with glittering generalities. He seeks to brush aside all criticism by the flat statement that there is no anti-Semitism in the Polish Army.

I emphasize again it is no internal affair, and its enlarged significance is duly noted. Witness the debate that was resumed in the House of Commons on Thursday where it was announced that Prime Minister Churchill had discussed the question of anti-Semitism with the Polish Prime Minister. Mr. Anthony Eden stated that the usual representations to the Polish Government had been made. He impressed upon the authorities the importance which His Majesty's government attaches to the Polish Government continuing to intensify its efforts to eradicate manifestations of anti-Semitism in the Polish forces in this country and that all steps are taken to insure that this policy be translated into appropriate action. Mr. Eden then added that the Polish Government would keep the British Government informed of the inquiries now being made into anti-Jewish activities in the Army.

Labor representatives in Commons properly indicated their dissatisfaction with the action taken and the statement was made that the Polish military authorities had violated the very principle of democracy and humanity by permitting anti-Semitism in the Polish Army.

The commonplaces of sympathy will not resolve this issue.

All sentences of court-martial must be annulled and these Jewish soldiers, if they so desire, must be permitted entrance into the British Army. The Polish authorities are weakening somewhat and it is now announced that the carrying out of the court-martial sentences may be postponed until after the war. This is no answer. We have no assurance that there will be no repetition of such outrages—against even the bravest of men—men who had received the highest Polish military decorations, to wit, the Vittuti Militare, the Cross of Valor, and the Cross of Merit.

The Government of the United States should and must add its protest to the proper authorities with regard to this unwarranted outburst of anti-Semitism. It is hoped that our State Department will take forthright and vigorous action and make crystal clear that we in America will not tolerate anti-Semitism amongst our comrade-in-arms. It is also hoped that unlike Anthony Eden, Cordell Hull will not deal with the Polish authorities with kid gloves, that he will pull no punches. The niceties of diplomacy will be unavailing. The mailed first will be the best method of driving home our attitude.

This unnatural wilderness of superstition and intolerance must be obliterated. These Jewish soldiers are entitled to be officered by men at least their equals in courage, tolerance, and justice.

Any officer incapable of self-command should be deprived of his privilege to command others. Broad chests and loud voices are insufficient equipment to enhance the dignity of office. Such reactionary militarism must be relegated to the ash-heap of useless accommodations. Such official personnel must not be permitted the insinuation that they, and they alone, rule. Pressure must be brought to bear upon them so that they may be enabled to look beyond their own exceedingly narrow limits. Their shallow responses to and their hollow enthusiasm for an inspired and inspiring cause—the essential reality of the equality of all men everywhere—must be eliminated from their repertoire of irresponsible reactions.

These malignant forces must not be victorious. We can't expect heavenly harmony overnight—but the need to enlarge the vision is definite. Barbarism in the Polish Army must not be the order of the day.

Boon From Mr. Doughton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of April 25, 1944:

BOON FROM MR. DOUGHTON

This newspaper has pounded the drums for income-tax simplification so often and so long that its readers may have come to regard us as single-tracked. But we will risk immodesty to remark today that this continued drum beating, in which many others have joined, is at last producing results.

The bill just introduced by Chairman DOUGHTON of the House Ways and Means Committee, after weeks of study by himself and his colleagues in collaboration with their own experts and the Treasury's, looks like a magnificent contribution to the peace of mind of the American taxpayer, who still cannot look back on March 15 without shuddering.

If this bill is passed—and certainly Congress is now fully aware of the public sentiment for simplification—30,000,000 of the 50,000,000 taxpayers won't have to file any return at all next March 15, aside from a withholding-tax receipt and the answers to four simple questions. Where the withholding tax has taken too much or too little, the Government will figure this out itself and mail either a bill or a rebate. So, for those 30,000,000 people the bookkeeping nightmare of last March will be exorcised.

Some 10,000,000 others—namely, those receiving more than $5,000 from an employer or more than $100 from sources where withholding does not apply—will fill out a return, but a much simpler one than they have been accustomed—though not reconciled—to.

The final 10,000,000, principally people in the middle and upper brackets, will file on a "long form," but here again a simpler one than in the past.

Other changes are involved, notably the disappearance of the pesky Victory tax and the adoption of a flat surtax exemption of $500 a person, whether the person be the head of the house, his spouse, or his dependent. And the myth that dependency ends as a son or daughter turns 18—when in many cases the expense is just hitting a peak—is abandoned; hereafter the word "dependent" is to mean what it says.

All in all, the Doughton bill represents a victory for sense and sanity.

The Utah Battery Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD a letter from Maj. Gen. Lucias D. Clay, Director of Matériel, General Staff Corps, Army Service Forces, in reply to my condemnation of the sales of dry-cell batteries in the Ninth Service Command on a very questionable and unbusinesslike basis.

The House will recall that earlier the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] made a talk on this subject. The Army now says that the investigation is completed. While I am far from satisfied with the results of the investigation, I am encouraged by the statement that corrective action has been taken to prevent the recurrence of like transactions, that properly qualified officers will be assigned to salvage duties, and that salvage property will, in general, be sold on widely circulated written invitations for bids.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to unduly criticize the Army in general, as I feel it has a tremendous job to perform and that it is doing its best. I do, however, intend to watch for future violations of the late battery deal kind and if any such happenings occur again I will consider it my duty to bring it to the attention of the House for consideration and action.

I feel also, Mr. Speaker, that in selling any salvage material, due attention should and must be given to the small businesses interested in the particular items for sale. The little businessman has a difficult time as it is; therefore, in matters of this sort they should be given not only prior but every consideration possible. Let us bend every effort to keep small business alive and see to it that it is given the first opportunities in bidding on salvaged material.

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY SERVICE FORCES,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1944.

Hon. MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: This is in further reply to your memorandum of March 10, 1944, addressed to Lt. Gen. B. B. Somervell, with which was enclosed an article from the Automotive News of February 7, 1944. The investigation by the Inspector General of sales of certain dry-cell batteries by the salvage officer at Utah Army Service Forces Depot has been completed. The circumstances of the case have been thoroughly explored by the investigating officer.

It appears from the report that during the period April 1 to October 1, 1943, there were turned over to the salvage officer of the depot for disposition approximately 100,000 dry-cell batteries of various sizes, pursuant to the terms of several inventory and inspection reports and reports of survey. These batteries when new had cost the Government approximately $200,000.

These batteries were listed on the reports as having passed their shelf life and therefore as being unserviceable. The report of investigation lends support to the conclusion that there may have been included with these over-age batteries, certain newer batteries which had not passed shelf life. However, it was impossible to trace these batteries to ultimate purchasers to secure definite confirmation. The civilian employees of the depot who prepared the lists of batteries past shelf life were no longer employed at the depot and were unavailable for questioning. The foreman, who supervised these employees, testified that he checked the lists on a selective basis. The officers who approved the reports of survey and inventory and inspection reports testified that they relied on the accuracy of the civilian employees.

These batteries were sold by the salvage officer in three principal transactions. The first lot of batteries were sold by the salvage officer to Mr. J. W. Harbetson of Ogden, Utah, on May 1, 1943, for the sum of $15. This transaction was a private sale made without the solicitation of bids and without any investigation by the salvage officer concerning the possible utility of these over-age batteries. The investigating officer finds that staff officers at Headquarters, Ninth Service Command, either authorized this sale or had prior notice of it. The second and third lots of batteries were sold by the salvage officer on September 20, 1943, to Mr. J. W. Harbetson and to Mr. W. N. Grothe of Bountiful, Utah, for a total price of $110. These two sales were also concluded after private negotiations under the same circumstances as the first sale. In addition, the salvage officer, from time to time, made three retail sales of small quantities of such batteries to Mr. John F. Baker, of Ogden, Utah.

Fraud or collusion by officers or employees of the War Department in any of the sales are not indicated by this investigation or by the prior investigation by the Ninth Service Command. Indeed, the report of investigation shows that the original purchasers were at first unaware of the real resale value of the batteries.

Some of the batteries acquired by Mr. J. W. Harbetson were resold through salesmen employed by Mr. A. W. Schryber, of Salt Lake City, Utah, for between $1,200 and $1,500. Another quantity of batteries were sold by Mr. Harbetson to George A. Lowe Co., of Odgen, Utah, for $984.55. However, the bulk of the batteries purchased by Mr. Harbetson were resold by his brother, Mr. James M. Harbetson, to Jake Hayutin & Sons, of Denver, Colo., in November 1943 for $20,000. The batteries purchased by Mr. Grothe were resold by him to the Magee Radio Co., of Denver, Colo., for $7,000. These latter concerns in turn resold the batteries to the general public.

Two of the initial purchasers of these batteries, Mr. John W. Harbetson and Mr. John F. Baker, were Government employees at the depot. Army Regulation 30-2145 prohibits the acceptance of bids for salvaged property from Government employees. The sales to these two individuals were violations of this regulation. The salvage officer was unfamiliar with the regulation and claimed that he did not know that Mr. Harbetson was employed at the depot.

Dry-cell batteries are a peculiar item of supply. They must be stored in quantities sufficient to meet all foreseeable tactical requirements, notwithstanding the fact that they are of a perishable nature and begin to deteriorate from the date of their manufacture. To meet this condition, the Signal Corps had from time to time issued instructions to all depots setting forth the shelf life of dry-cell batteries held in reserve in storage. The term "shelf life" is defined as the amount of time that a battery may be carried in depot stock and available for issue, before its capacity has declined to a point where it is unsafe to issue it for tactical military uses. Every effort is made to issue dry-cell batteries for tactical military uses before they become outdated, and the War Department's sytem of stock control is designed to this end. However, it is difficult to prevent certain quantities of batteries in depot stock from becoming outdated before issue, even with the most careful regulation of stock levels, because of the large volume of batteries which must be kept in reserve to meet all contingencies. Obviously, for military reasons, the Army cannot issue outdated batteries for troop use, as their life is uncertain. It is recognized, however, that there remains in such batteries a varying percentage of original capacity.

Without attempting to deny that errors were made in this case, it may be pointed out that the resale value of these batteries was greatly enhanced by an abnormal situation arising from the prevailing shortage of batteries. The amount of life left in outdated batteries depends upon the type of battery, the conditions of manufacture, and the conditions of storage. Outdated batteries of excellent manufacture, stored under conditions of ideal temperature, may have considerable remaining life, while others of different quality, stored under different conditions, may be completely dead. The cost of testing each individual outdated battery would normally be excessive. Due to the abnormal supply situation, civilian purchasers were, in this case, willing to purchase such batteries and take a chance on their durability, because new batteries were not available.

The circumstances of the case, as now established, show the following to have been major factors bearing on the losses to the Government. The salvage officer of the depot was a young, inexperienced officer, lacking in business judgment, unfamiliar with basic Army regulations, and burdened with numerous other duties. A more experienced officer should have been selected for the position. Bids were not solicited for the batteries nor was any investigation made by the salvage officer concerning their potential sales value. Also contributing to the loss were the inadequate instructions issued by these offices concerning over-age batteries which tended to give the impression that such batteries had little value or utility. The circumstancs of this case show that such was not entirely the fact.

The War Department does not defend the sale of these batteries at the prices which were received. The sales were the result of errors of judgment and administration. Action has been taken to bring the consequences of this case forcefully to the attention of the chief signal officer, the Commanding General, Ninth Service Command, and the Commanding General, Utah Army Service Forces Depot. Necessary disciplinary action is being taken against responsible officers at all levels of command, including where appropriate, reprimands, relief from duty, and reclassification.

Corrective action has been taken to prevent the recurrence of such improper transactions. The necessity of assigning qualified officers as salvage officers has been called to the attention of all service commands. The service commands have been instructed that salvage property will, except in extraordinary cases, be sold only on widely circulated written invitations for bids. Instructions have been issued that dry-cell batteries, other than those actually exhausted by use, will not be sold as salvage but will be transferred to the Procurement Division, Treasury Department. All depots have been provided with battery test sets, and detailed instructions have been issued for the testing of over-age batteries on a selective basis.

It is believed that in the great majority of transactions, the disposition of salvage property is being handled expeditiously and with proper judgment by the officers and employees of the War Department and the Army. The regulations and instructions concerning the sale of salvaged property are well designed and explicit. It should be recognized, however, that no regulation can provide good business judgment and that constant surveillance is necessary to prevent isolated instances of improper disposition of salvage. The unfortunate experiences of this case have been widely disseminated and are expected to stimulate renewed diligence against the occurrence of further transactions of this character.

Sincerely yours,

LUCIUS D. CLAY,
Major General, General Staff Corps,
Director of Matériel.

Army Sale of Dry-Cell Batteries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I made an address in the House where I called to the attention of the country the sale of approximately 100,000 dry-cell batteries of various sizes, which had cost the Government when new about $200,000. I pointed out that the War Department had received a very small amount for these batteries, that they had not been sold as a result of competitive bidding, that an employee of the Army had purchased some of the batteries, one lot for $15, and another lot he purchased jointly with another individual for $110. I further pointed out that this individual had received for one lot of batteries $20,000.

At that time the War Department had made a preliminary investigation and had given me a partial report which I made public. I have now received a second report from the Under Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson, which shows that investigation had been completed. While it is regretted that this incident occurred, nevertheless it is pleasing to know that steps have been taken to prevent a recurrence.

This is an indication of the necessity for proper governmental authorities to use extreme care in the disposal of surplus property which will amount to billions of dollars after the war. I feel that the public is entitled to the information contained in this report. It follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE UNDER SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. COCHRAN: In further reply to your letter of 17 February 1944, inquiring about the sales of certain dry-cell batteries by the salvage officer at Utah Army Service Forces Depot, Ogden, Utah, I wish to advise that the investigation of this case by the Office of the Inspector General has been completed. The circumstances of the case have been thoroughly explored by the investigating officer.

It appears from the report that during the period 1 April 1943 to 1 October 1943 there were turned over to the salvage officer of the depot for disposition approximately 100,000 dry-cell batteries of various sizes, pursuant to the terms of several inventory and inspection reports and reports of survey. These batteries when new had cost the Government approximately $200,000.

These batteries were listed on the reports as having passed their shelf life and therefore as being unserviceable. The report of investigation lends support to the conclusion that there may have been included with these overage batteries certain newer batteries which had not passed shelf life. However, it was impossible to trace these batteries to ultimate purchasers to secure definite confirmation. The civilian employees of the depot who prepared the lists of batteries past shelf life were no longer employed at the depot and were unavailable for questioning. The foreman, who supervised these employees, testified that he checked the lists on a selective basis. The officers who approved the reports of survey and inventory and inspection reports testified that they relied on the accuracy of the civilian employees.

These batteries were sold by the salvage officer in three principal transactions. The first lot of batteries were sold by the salvage officer to Mr. J. W. Harbetson, of Ogden, Utah, on May 1, 1943, for the sum of $15. This transaction was a private sale made without the solicitation of bids and without any investigation by the salvage officer concerning the possible utility of these overage batteries. The investigating officer finds that staff officers at headquarters, Ninth Service Command, either authorized this sale or had prior notice of it. The second and third lots of batteries were sold by the salvage officer on September 20, 1943, to Mr. J. W. Harbetson and to Mr. W. N. Grothe, of Bountiful, Utah, for a total price of $110. These two sales were also concluded after private negotiations under the same circumstances as the first sale. In addition, the salvage officer, from time to time, made three retail sales of small quantities of such batteries to Mr. John F. Baker, of Ogden, Utah.

Fraud or collusion by officers or employees of the War Department in any of the sales is not indicated by this investigation or by the prior investigation by the Ninth Service Command. Indeed, the report of investigation shows that the original purchasers were at first unaware of the real resale value of the batteries.

Some of the batteries acquired by Mr. J. W. Harbetson were resold through salesmen employed by Mr. A. W. Schryber, of Salt Lake City, Utah, for between $1,200 and $1,500. Another quantity of batteries were sold by Mr. Harbetson to George A. Lowe Co., of Ogden, Utah, for $984.55. However, the bulk of the batteries purchased by Mr. Harbetson were resold by his brother, Mr. James M. Harbetson, to Jake Hayutin & Sons, of Denver, Colo., on November 1943, for $20,000. The batteries purchased by Mr. Grothe were resold by him to the Magee Radio Co., of Denver, Colo., for $7,000. These latter concerns, in turn, resold the batteries to the general public.

Two of the initial purchasers of these batteries, Mr. John W. Harbetson and Mr. John F. Baker, were Government employees at the depot. Army Regulation 30–2145 prohibits the acceptance of bids for salvaged property from Government employees. The sales to these two individuals were violations of this regulation. The salvage officer was unfamiliar with the regulations and claimed that he did not know that Mr. Harbetson was employed at the depot.

Dry-cell batteries are a peculiar item of supply. They must be stored in quantities sufficient to meet all foreseeable tactical requirements, notwithstanding the fact that they are of a perishable nature and begin to deteriorate from the day of their manufacture. To meet this condition, the Signal Corps had from time to time issued instructions to all depots setting forth the shelf life of dry-cell batteries held in reserve in storage. The term "shelf life" is defined as the amount of time that a battery may be carried in depot stock and available for issue before its capacity has declined to a point where it is unsafe to issue it for tactical military uses. Every effort is made to issue dry-cell batteries for tactical military uses before they become outdated, and the War Department's system of stock control is designed to this end. However, it is difficult to prevent certain quantities of batteries in depot stock from becoming outdated before issue, even with the most careful regulation of stock levels, because of the large volume of batteries which must be kept in reserve to meet all contingencies. Obviously, for military reasons, the Army cannot issue outdated batteries for troop use, as their life is uncertain. It is recognized, however, that there remains in such batteries a varying percentage of original capacity.

Without attempting to deny that errors were made in this case, it may be pointed out that the resale value of these batteries was greatly enhanced by an abnormal situation arising from the prevailing shortage of batteries. The amount of life left in outdated batteries depends upon the type of battery, the conditions of manufacture, and the conditions of storage. Outdated batteries of excellent manufacture, stored under conditions of ideal temperature, may have considerable remaining life, while others of different quality, stored under different conditions, may be completely dead. The cost of testing each individual outdated battery would normally be excessive. Due to the abnormal supply situation, civilian purchasers were, in this case, willing to purchase such batteries and take a chance on their durability, because new batteries were not available.

The circumstances of the case, as now established, show the following to have been major factors bearing on the losses to the Government. The salvage officer of the depot was a young, inexperienced officer, lacking in business judgment, unfamiliar with basic Army regulations, and burdened with numerous other duties. A more experienced officer should have been selected for the position. Bids were not solicited for the batteries nor was any investigation made by the salvage officer concerning their potential sales value. Also contributing to the loss were the inadequate instructions issued by the War Department concerning over-age batteries, which tended to give the impression that such batteries had little value or utility. The circumstances of this case show that such was not entirely the fact.

The War Department does not defend the sales of these batteries at the prices which were received. The sales were the result of errors of judgment and administration. Action has been taken to bring the consequences of this case forcefully to the attention of the chief signal officer, the commanding general, Ninth Service Command, and the commanding general, Utah Army Service Forces Depot. Necessary disciplinary action is being taken against responsible officers at all levels of command, including, where appropriate, reprimands, relief from duty, and reclassification.

Corrective action has been taken to prevent the recurrence of such improper transactions. The necessity of assigning qualified officers as salvage officers has been called to the attention of all service commands. The service commands have been instructed that salvage property will, except in extraordinary cases, be sold only on widely circulated written invitations for bids. Instructions have been issued that dry-cell batteries, other than those actually exhausted by use, will not be sold as salvage but will be transferred to the Procurement Division, Treasury Department. All depots have been provided with battery test sets, and detailed instructions have been issued for the testing of over-age batteries on a selective basis.

It is believed that in the great majority of transactions the disposition of salvaged property is being handled expeditiously and with proper judgment by the officers and employees of the War Department and the Army. The regulations and instructions concerning the sale of salvaged property are well designed and explicit. It should be recognized, however, that no regulation can provide good business judgment and that constant surveillance is necessary to prevent isolated instances of improper disposition of salvage. The unfortunate experiences of this case have been widely disseminated and are expected to stimulate renewed diligence against the occurrence of further transactions of this character.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT P. PATTERSON,
Under Secretary of War.

Overcoming Shortages of War Metals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by Senator Charles B. Henderson—former United States Senator from the State of Nevada—Chairman, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, over Station WOL, and coast-to-coast Mutual network, Washington, D. C., April 29, 1944, entitled "Overcoming Shortages of War Metals":

This is a report to the Nation—that nation which is the richest in productive capacity of minerals but which is poor in many of the necessary ores.

Before this war the United States imported substantially all of its tin, chrome, manganese, nickel, platinum, asbestos, and cobalt, as well as much of its tungsten, mercury, antimony, graphite, mica, and vanadium. It is needless for me to dwell on the importance of each of these minerals in war production. Yet each had to be brought into this country for processing into the weapons and machines of war.

It gives me pleasure to report that adequate supplies of these minerals have been obtained. Stock piles have been established. American industry has had the materials needed for its greatest effort in history.

Your Government has spent vast sums to achieve this. But for every $4 spent for these strategic and critical materials $3 worth has been resold to war industry, while the remaining $1 represents the stock piles which are our guaranty against shortages.

Today the words "stock pile" are commonplace. It was largely a matter of debate, however, until 1939, when Congress appropriated $100,000,000 for the acquisition of strategic materials. That was the start, but only the start, as the impact of war in Europe taught us to go much further.

In June 1940, therefore, Reconstruction Finance Corporation was empowered by Congress to form subsidiaries to acquire strategic and critical materials, and to provide the necessary plant facilities for expanding our production of the implements of war. Of the four present subsidiaries, one—Metals Reserve Company—was charged specifically with the task of acquiring strategic and critical metals and minerals.

It is of the work of Metals Reserve Company that I wish to speak. The National Defense Advisory Council recommended that Metals Reserve take immediate steps to expand our supplies of tin and manganese.

World production of tin immediately prior to the war ranged from 150,000 to 200,000 long tons a year. Nearly half was consumed in the United States, even though our tin production was entirely negligible. Two steps were immediately taken to increase our tin supply. One was an agreement with the International Tin Committee, representing the seven major producing countries, to increase the production of tin from the then current rate of 80 percent to 130 percent of the standard quotas. Metals Reserve agreed to take any excess not sold to consumers up to an agreed tonnage.

The second step was a contract with the Bolivian producers and the Government, under which approximately half of the tin produced in that country would be shipped to the United States for smelting. Certain of this ore previously had been shipped from Bolivia to smelters in continental Europe, which were no longer available.

Even though substantial tin-smelting capacity was then open to us in the Far East, it was felt that this country would be safer with a tin smelter within our continental limits.

As a result, a tin smelter costing over $6,000,000 was built at Texas City, Tex. The plant has been operating since Easter Sunday, April 1942, producing tin of the highest quality. Its output to date has exceeded 41,000 tons and the present production rate is approximately 2,500 tons monthly.

Our dependence on imported manganese is only slightly less than our dependence on imported tin. Domestic manganese ore production from 1919 through 1939 had averaged about 40,000 long tons a year, compared with normal consumption of between 600,000 and 1,000,000 long tons. This country does possess substantial deposits of manganese ore; unfortunately, however, most of the deposits are of low grade.

Because of the huge tonnage required for the defense program, it was imperative that Metals Reserve expand production of manganese in the United States. Therefore, a contract was promptly made for production from the deposits at Butte, Mont., the then largest known commercial source of that mineral in this country. Treatment facilities were built by private capital. Production from this one source since late 1941 has been at a rate more than double the previous annual production of the United States. In addition, contracts were given to other companies owning domestic deposits. Buying stations have been established to which a small miner can bring his ore for immediate cash sale. As a consequence, domestic production of manganese ore is now six to seven times the pre-war rate. Domestic mines now supply almost 20 percent of estimated requirements, whereas prior to the war they supplied about 4 percent.

Steps were also taken to increase the manganese production of Cuba, Brazil, Mexico, and Chile, the other Western Hemisphere sources of this indispensable ingredient of steel alloys. Production in these neighboring countries both in 1942 and in 1943 has been more than double their production of 1939. Large quantities have also been obtained from Eastern Hemisphere sources—notably India, South Africa, and the Gold Coast.

In spite of the war requirements of over 1,300,000 tons of manganese ore anually, this country at all times during the emergency has had more than a year's supply on hand.

I have gone into some detail about tin and manganese because these were the original commodities on which we received recommendations. The program of Metals Reserve has, however, been broadened greatly. To date purchases have been made of 46 different metals and minerals. In addition to those materials with which you are all familiar—such as aluminum, copper, lead, and zinc—the list of materials purchased includes such little-known products as:

Zirconium, used as a steel hardener, a refractory for furnace linings, and an ingredient in enamel and glassmaking.

Cryolite, brought from Greenland to be used as a flux in the production of aluminum; and Rutile, which has made possible the enormous expansion in welding that, in turn, has permitted us to build ships at a rate never before contemplated.

An essential part of the program of Metals Reserve was the negotiation during 1941, before Pearl Harbor, of a series of agreements with Latin-American countries under which we accomplished a twofold purpose;

1. These countries agreed to export strategic materials to the United States only, or to other countries in the Western Hemisphere. Thus the Axis was cut off from all critical and strategic materials from the Western Hemisphere. Japan in particular had been a large importer from Latin America prior to these agreements.

2. Our agreement to buy permitted those countries to expand production. This has been of great value to us. Agreements covering substantially all their mineral output were negotiated with the Governments of Brazil, Chile, Peru, and Mexico. Similar agreements covering specific commodities were negotiated with Bolivia, Argentina, and Colombia.

Fully 50 countries have supplied minerals and metals for our war program. Virtually every one of the United Nations, most of the neutrals, and the liberated territories, including north Africa and Sardinia, have proven valuable sources. These important metals and minerals from abroad are continuing to flow in under the procurement program of the Foreign Economic Administration.

It is interesting to observe how raw materials supplied to us by our allies, are returning to them as weapons of war. For instance, chrome ore from Russia, exported from the Arctic port of Murmansk, returns to the Soviet Union through the Persian Gulf, in the alloy steel contained in tanks, trucks, guns, and planes; nickel from New Caledonia returns to the southwest Pacific in the equipment aboard our fighting ships; tungsten from China returns as filaments in radio tubes on General Chennault's gallant planes, or as an alloy in the tools used at repair shops at air bases. Many of these materials now are being provided to us by our allies under reciprocal lend-lease.

In the expansion of domestic production, Metals Reserve has always cooperated with the Office of Price Administration to help prevent inflation. Let me cite, as an example, the so-called premium price plan—for expanding the output of copper, lead, and zinc. The ceiling prices yield a fair profit to those mines which normally produced most of these metals. However, it was soon recognized by O. P. A., W. P. B., and Metals Reserve that substantial quantities of new production could be obtained at a somewhat higher cost.

To tap this source, a plan was announced early in 1942 whereby each domestic mine producing copper, lead, or zinc in excess of a stipulated quota, would receive a premium payment from Metals Reserve. In these 2 years, the premium payments have amounted to $91,033,000, of which $32,941,000 has been paid to copper mines, $14,340,000 to the lead mines, and $43,752,000 to the zinc mines.

The metals and minerals aspect represents one of the many bright spots of the war production program. Of 46 different materials which Metals Reserve is purchasing or has purchased, in only a few cases—for example, tin and sheet mica—will 1944 receipts be less than requirements. As to tin, we are fortunate in having a substantial stock pile on which we can draw. Sheet mica is the only material in which the situation can be considered tight.

This favorable situation can be maintained only if we continue to acquire additional supplies of these metals and minerals from all sources. In most minerals it is expected that stock piles in Government hands will be materially increased during 1944.

For this reason W. P. B. has decided to curtail production of strategic metals and minerals once ample stock piles have been established. To name a few examples:

Our program for subsidizing high cost tungsten producers recently has been abandoned; the purchase of mercury from small domestic mines at ceiling prices has been discontinued, and the price of that commodity has been permitted to seek its natural level; output of aluminum from high-cost plants using coal-generated power has been stopped; vanadium, graphite, cobalt, and molybdenum are other materials in which both foreign and domestic cut-backs already have occurred.

We have endeavored to make these cutbacks in a manner which will be fair to the producers, to the workmen they employ, and to the taxpayers who are bearing the cost of the war.

Frank Knox

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would feel I had not discharged my obligation to a friend were I not to say with respect to the untimely death of Frank Knox that he was an able and a good citizen; a valiant soldier; a brave man; an exemplary and most efficient public official; always a patriot.

His country and all of us needed and will miss him. He is entitled to the highest and finest accolade which ever can be awarded to any man: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

With Thomas Jefferson may I say:

The term is not very distant, at which we are to deposit in the same cerement, our sorrows and suffering bodies, and to ascend in essence, to an ecstatic meeting with the friends we have loved and lost, and whom we shall still love and never lose again.

Air Bases in the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 28, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I have asked permission to insert these two editorials from the New Orleans Item in connection with a recent report of a Naval Affairs subcommittee which has caused international attention.

These editorials express, I believe, the attitude not only of the subcommittee which made the report but also express the attitude of the vast majority of the American people if the numbers of letters which I have received and the editorials from various sections of the country which have come to my attention are to serve as yardsticks in this instance.

The editorials from the New Orleans Item follow:

GIVE US THE BASES

A Naval Affairs Subcommittee headed by Congressman HÉBERT recommends something that is quite urgent as well as vitally important. After a tour of the Caribbean and the South American east coast, it tells the House that the United States should lose no time in procuring from Great Britain permanent right to all of the bases we have set up at great cost on the English islands immediately off our Atlantic shore, from Newfoundland to Trinidad.

We have often said precisely the same thing and can imagine no good reason for the failure of the Roosevelt administration to take this step so obviously required for the future security of this country from foreign attack. Nor can we imagine any good reason why Britain should be reluctant to accord us these bases while continuing to keep for itself all the other territory on the islands involved, and all the British bases and other establishments that stand upon them.

The ground for our island bases was leased to us for 99 years in return for 50 destroyers, of which the English were in critical need. The ships were worth a great deal more than the land, of course. But if this were not so, the staggering values that Uncle Sam has delivered to John Bull under the lend-lease program would put any consideration of our entitlement beyond the remotest question. Ninety-nine years is longer than most men's lives, says the committee, but in the life of a great nation it is negligible.

We don't want an acre of British earth beyond the small areas of it that our bases occupy. We are entitled to these for sheer self-preservation. If those bases had not been deemed by our Army and Navy—and Britain's, too—to be essential for our protection—and Britain's, too—they would not have been turned over to us. They will remain essential to our safety against attack from the east so long as men retain the animal characteristics that beget wishfulness and war.

They could give us no considerable advantage for an attack on England, which we have no reason for making. The protection they give us against attack in the Atlantic cannot give England pause in the teeth of its repeated expression of its desire to live at peace with us, indeed even in alliance with us. Intelligent Englishmen wishing good Anglo-American relations will let no outworn jingo prejudice against giving up a foot of soil withhold these coastal bases from the United States.

Some Americans won't feel this way. Some of these are already opposing sundry objections to taking up the matter at this time. We don't regard these as sound. We think the committee is right when it says that now is the time to take it up. And we believe that those of our people who regard the future security of this country as a paramount consideration will feel the same way when the subject is clarified by discussion.

We present some extracts from the committee's report that will indicate its position more fully: It first objects to proposals for alienating part of the great base on Trinidad for commercial purposes, and then goes on to say:

"This base is probably the most vital to our national welfare of all those acquired under the destroyer-exchange, and no portion of it should be allowed to remain outside our control. The time to correct this situation is now. * * *

"The subcommittee cannot too emphatically stress the importance of retaining and maintaining at this time all facilities at Trinidad now in possession of the United States. * * * It is our considered opinion that our naval activities at this base should never be allowed to lapse or become dormant. Under no circumstances should the advantages now enjoyed by the United States through acquisition of these facilities be relinquished. * * *

"In visiting many of the naval bases on British territory, your subcommittee was impressed with the great amount of money spent on them. When measured in terms of 99 years the investment will be tremendous. Already, the Navy alone has spent over $30,000,000. Although of questionable legality at the time the (destroyer) agreement was made, we thoroughly approve it as an initial step toward the defense of the Western Hemisphere, even though this benefit to us was incidental to a greater benefit which accrued to Great Britain through acquisition of those ships.

"Having acquired the right to build these bases on foreign territory, and having invested and being prepared to invest still further, we feel it would be a mistake for the United States ever to abandon them, even at the end of 99 years. * * * In the life of a nation 99 years is negligible.

"Rather than await this expiration date, and encounter the hazards of ill will and difficulties which may arise, we feel that steps should immediately be taken by our Government to have the bases changed to 'in perpetuity.'"

DISTANT BASES IN FUTURE

Australia's Prime Minister Curtin says, "No one has asked that Australian and New Zealand bases in the Pacific be under other than our jurisdiction after the war." That suits us.

Mr. Curtin then adds, "Nor are we asking that anyone else's bases be changed. We don't think, because we fought elsewhere in this war, that afterward the bases we used should come under our jurisdiction." That also seems quite all right—so far as Australia is concerned. But the United States is in a different position.

Uncle Sam has built and paid for many of the bases in distant countries which he or the Allies have used. This is not the case to any such extent with Australia. It strikes us that those Pacific-island bases that are most essential to our future defense should belong to the United States. We also think that this country should have future use, at least, of the bases built and maintained by it in other countries, unless these other countries pay us the cost of them. That is mere equitable polity that should put no strain on real friendship.

Mr. Curtin says that discussion of all such details should be reserved until the peace conference. It seems to us, however, that the present is a better time to frame clear understandings on them—which is the position that the Hébert subcommittee has recommended to the House Committee on Naval Affairs with respect to the bases we have built on the British islands of our Atlantic coast.

Rural Electrification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. R. POAGE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by William J. Neal, Deputy Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, on March 21, 1944, at Chicago, Ill., for the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association:

I appreciate your invitation to appear on the program tonight. It gives an opportunity to discuss the progress that has been made by the Rural Electrification Administration, some of its immediate problems, as well as the possibility for achieving your goal and ours—that of bringing central station electric power to every farm home in America. As a farmer, as an organizer, and as a former director of an R. E. A. cooperative, I cannot but have the conviction that those who serve as managers and directors of electric cooperatives have the background for the most constructive criticism, the most sincere interest in its future success, and the greatest loyalty to this outstanding program of cooperative endeavor between an agency of the Government and its citizens.

The directors and managers of the rural electric cooperatives represent the spirit upon which this Nation is founded, the spirit of the progressive pioneer. Without your unselfish leadership we could not have achieved the unprecedented record of R. E. A.-financed systems and R. E. A. in bringing the blessings of rural electrification to so many of this Nation's farmers.

Today I should like to discuss how far we have advanced toward our goal of making electricity available to all of the farms and rural homes of America at low-cost, nondiscriminatory rates. I should like to review for you the progress of R. E. A. and R. E. A.-financed systems during the year which has passed since the convention of the N. R. E. C. A. at St. Louis, Mo. Although this review is on the national program as a whole I am mindful that it reflects the result of the combined efforts of the many local public-spirited leaders throughout the Nation, and I know that each of you has helped in an outstanding way to make that record.

The Rural Electrification Administration has allotted funds to 873 borrowers, of which 853 are cooperatives, or public bodies, such as power districts. Approximately 99 percent of the funds which have been appropriated by the Congress under the provisions of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936 have been allotted to this group of borrowers. The remaining funds represent loans to 20 borrowers classified as private utilities. Our most recent information shows that up to January 31, 1944, a total of $477,429,269 had been allotted R. E. A. borrowers to provide for upward of 425,000 miles of line and other electric facilities. These rural systems are to serve approximately 1,400,000 farms and rural homes.

These statistics reveal that thus far $379,592,354 have been advanced to R. E. A. borrowers who have used the funds to construct 391,551 miles of line and other electric facilities. These lines are now actually serving 1,096,167 farm families and other rural consumers. As of December 31, 1943, these systems had made their scheduled payments and in addition to this, had to their credit in prepayments to R. E. A. $15,229,507, as compared with delinquencies of only $215,576 which were more than 30 days overdue.

Most of the rural-line construction accounting for this progress resulted from activities prior to Pearl Harbor, before it became necessary to establish controls to direct the use of critical materials to the most essential war needs.

Thus, under the stimulus of the national program of rural electrification established by President Roosevelt in Executive Order No. 7037 on May 11, 1935, and given permanent status by the Congress through enactment of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, the percent of farms receiving central station service has increased from 10.9 percent to 41.9 percent.

It is noteworthy that during the 53-year period from 1882 to 1935 the number of farms receiving electric service had reached only 10 percent of all the farms of the Nation. However, after the inauguration of the R. E. A. program in 1935, there took place an unprecedented increase in the number of farms electrified. In fact, within the short period of 8 years there was a total increase of 230 percent in the number of farms connected to rural high lines. Without a doubt, this increase is due in a large measure to your local programs of serving the greatest possible number of farms and rural homes.

To evaluate the progress we have made since last year, let us look at our fiscal data, that is, the factual information obtained from fiscal year operations. Comparing last fiscal year with the present fiscal year up to date, we find that nearly twice as much money has been allotted during the first two-thirds of fiscal 1944 as during the entire fiscal year of 1943. In the last fiscal year a total of $8,225,380 was allotted, while the current year's allotments already amount to $15,922,828. New and increased activities in connection with the food production program undertaken in cooperation with W. P. B., the Department of Agriculture, and the War Food Administration account for a total of $12,736,782 advanced to R. E. A. borrowers through this fiscal year so far, as compared with $14,536,572 advanced for the entire fiscal year 1943.

Estimate work orders submitted by you up to December 1943 resulted in W. P. B. approvals for construction of 19,343 miles of line to serve 73,765 farms. It may be of interest to you to learn that work orders are being submitted today at the average rate of more than 2,000 per week. Minor modifications in regulations will likely result in a further increase in the number of new farm connections.

Our present rate of activity indicates that when this fiscal year is completed, records will show an increase of approximately 400 percent over the activities of fiscal 1943.

As officers and managers faced constantly with problems of operating R. E. A.-financed systems, you know from experience that a construction program of the nature we are now carrying forward under wartime controls, requires much detail work. Not only is this true for R. E. A. cooperatives but it is also true in R. E. A. as well. When a local R. E. A. cooperative submits a wartime application for service, it must be studied from the standpoint of necessity and feasibility and whether provision for the necessary funds has been made in the cooperative's allotment construction budget. All applications also have to be checked in other respects to make sure that they are in shape to be submitted to the W. P. B. for final approval.

Wartime demands, coupled with the grave manpower problem, are adding tremendously to the burden of work and responsibility which has to be carried by R. E. A. cooperatives, as well as by R. E. A. We in R. E. A. know something of your problems in this respect and just so far as possible we are trying to assist you in meeting them. But we too have a manpower problem. It may surprise you to hear that for the present fiscal year we are operating with 20 percent fewer people as compared with a year ago. Today we have only 639 employees to meet the many demands of our 873 R. E. A. borrowers. Obviously it has become necessary to curtail or limit less pressing activities in the nature of service to the cooperatives and to reassign some of the people relieved of this work to temporarily more important duties. Likewise, additional economies and savings of time have been accomplished by simplification of R. E. A. procedures. These steps alone have enabled us to attain a man-hour saving equivalent to approximately 90 employees. Further assistance has been derived from a closer correlation of some phases of the R. E. A. work with that of the other bureaus and administrations of the Department of Agriculture.

You can see that we are attempting to operate R. E. A. with the greatest possible degree of efficiency. If I may be permitted to look at this problem of administration from the point of view of one formerly a member of your ranks, I should say that notwithstanding the efficiencies and improvements R. E. A. may be able to effect, there must be close and constant cooperation and understanding between R. E. A. and its borrowers if the farmers are to get electric services so urgently needed in their wartime food production effort.

Briefly, the program accomplished during the past year under which some 73,000 farms have been connected to R. E. A.-financed electric distribution lines, can be measured by an estimated total livestock production of approximately $257,000,000 and production of livestock products in the amount of $61,000,000 making a total of $318,000,000 based on U. S. D. A. figures of average production and prices. The value of the livestock on hand on these 73,000 farms amounted to over $143,000,000. It is further estimated that the extension of these lines authorized by W. P. B., represents an expenditure of $21,430,400 for labor and material. Compare this figure, if you will, with the resulting benefits to the food production of the Nation of more than $108,000,000—a ratio of better than 5 to 1 for livestock production alone.

This program of extending modern electric power to the farmer on the food front has accomplished unprecedented results. Without question, it has been a vital factor in making possible the food production record of the farmers for the past year, under the leadership of the Department and the War Food Administration.

Thus far I have not given consideration in these remarks to the future of rural electrification. Notwithstanding our splendid record, what all of us should keep in mind is that despite the shortage of personnel both in R. E. A. and the cooperatives, we cannot afford to limit our attention to the lines now in operation. We have an immediate responsibility to extend service to every qualified farmer. So far as possible, we must see to it that electricity, when available, is put to the maximum use on the food-production front. And, in addition to these things, we have the further responsibility now of so conducting the R. E. A. program that at the earliest moment after the war, central station electric service at reasonable nondiscriminatory rates may be made available to the greatest possible number of the 7,000,000 farms and rural homes yet unserved.

As we look to the future, there are two distinct problems: One, the immediate—by this I mean that which will face us within the next few months; and, the other, which is concerned with what is commonly referred to as the post-war period. Both, however, are to some extent related. For the immediate future, it seems to me that three things are of paramount importance: (1) Construction of lines to every qualified farm; (2) completion of the unelectrified farm survey—as a basis for charting a post-war program; and (3) prudent management of the affairs of the cooperative.

Both you and we are constantly alert to the vast requirements of farm people which must be met in the period following the war. Perhaps this might be briefly summarized by quoting from a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, Claude R. Wickard, to one of the outstanding cooperative leaders in another part of the country. I quote: "Rural electrification has two very important aspects with respect to the future welfare of rural America. The electrified farm offers wide opportunities for a more efficient and more diversified agriculture. As your report indicates, you have not scratched the surface in your State, so far as utilization of electricity in agricultural production is concerned. That statement also holds true for the Nation. Of equal, if not greater, importance is the other aspect which involves better living on the farms. I personally know how electricity makes farm life more enjoyable; how it eliminates drudgery by making possible modern conveniences. I know this because I have experienced it as a farmer member of an R. E. A. cooperative in my home State. I know also that electricity offers great opportunities for better health through electric refrigeration and sanitation equipment. It is my sincere hope that rural electrification developments after the war may bring electricity to every farm and rural home in your State and America. Your committee is making the necessary plans now to attain that objective. As you know, the Rural Electrification Administration is quite anxious to do everything possible to assist your committee and the R. E. A.-financed cooperatives of your State in the development of plans for a post-war rural electrification program."

The objectives of a well-rounded program of post-war construction of additional rural distribution lines would achieve a two-fold purpose. First, through the early availability of central-station electric service to other millions of rural homes, it would provide the basis for a more profitable agriculture and richer rural living, so abundantly deserved and won by the sons and daughters of these same families now serving the Nation in this world-wide conflict.

Second, in a program of immediate large-scale construction there would be provided by direct construction activities and through the manufacture of materials and the new market for consumer goods, an opportunity for profitable private employment for thousands upon thousands of our returned soldiers.

The basis for such a program is now being laid through the studies and reports of State committees actively engaged in the planning of post-war programs for agriculture. These State committees generally include representatives of farm groups, including R. E. A. cooperatives, land-grant colleges, and experiment stations—the State extension service, and other State agencies and local and State civic bodies. Through the Department of Agriculture's interbureau committee on post-war programs we have been receiving copies of preliminary reports prepared by many of the State committees. Most of these reports contain a chapter outlining or indicating a post-war program of rural electrification for the respective States. A preliminary examination of the reports we have received so far has convinced me that our own ideas of what a post-war rural electrification program can and should be are right in line with the thinking of these State planning groups.

In this Nation where cooperatives have brought service to more than 1,000,000 rural families, there are yet unserved—according to recent census figures—7,151,188 farms and rural homes. In addition to the two and one-half million farms in America now receiving central station service, available data indicate that there are more than 5,000,000 farms and rural nonfarm residences and other establishments nearly all located within the potential reach of R. E. A.-financed systems.

The major problem that this Nation must solve in the post-war period is that of maintaining employment at a high level. Employment at a level sufficiently high to assure a national income that will provide a decent standard of living for all. If we are to be successful in meeting this problem, private enterprise not inconsistent with the public interest must be facilitated. The Government has a major responsibility in such an effort. We must avoid so far as possible any failure to meet this challenge if we are to escape the more costly remedy of direct Government employment of excessive proportions which a distressed people may demand. As the Baruch report points out on war and post-war adjustment policies:

"Transition from a war economy to that of peace is not easy; nothing worth while is," and "As one indication of the size of the job, about $50,000,000,000 of the current annual production represents strictly war goods—that is, things which, when peace comes, we will stop making. This gap must be filled in large part by civilian production and services, if we are to keep the needed volume of employment."

It is obviously of paramount importance that planned programs be developed which can make a practical contribution to the solution of this problem.

In weighing the desirability of different approaches to the problem, the R. E. A. program should unquestionably receive first consideration. Such a program promotes both the social and economic well-being of people throughout a vast area of this country. This program requires a modest amount of Government assistance on a completely self-liquidating basis, promotes private initiative and enterprise among the people whom it serves, and at the same time opens a vast and continuing market for the products of private industry.

It is estimated that directly and indirectly such a program to reach 5,000,000 members would result in providing a market for goods and services of about $3,500,000,000. Of this total amount $1,600,000,000 would be represented by the estimated physical value of the lines and services constructed to reach and serve these potential consumers of electricity. The value of the wiring and plumbing and of the electrical farm-production equipment and other appliances which these consumers would purchase, on the basis of our past experience in the R. E. A. program, amounts to approximately $1,924,000,000.

Such a program is estimated to create directly 727,000,000 man-hours of work which will be required in the process of constructing the lines, wiring farm buildings, and installing plumbing and other equipment. In addition to this direct labor, it is estimated that at least one and one-half billions of man-hours of work will go into the production of materials and supplies and the manufacture of electrical farm-production equipment and other appliances which these consumers would purchase. In other words, such a program would in itself provide a minimum of two and one-fourth billion man-hours of work, thus opening job opportunities in private industry for thousands of returned soldiers and for industrial workers now in war jobs.

These estimates take into consideration the highly efficient and economical methods of constructing rural distribution lines which R. E. A. and R. E. A.-financed systems have developed together during a period of years. Also, the further economies inherent in the principle of area coverage with its accompanying resultant lower construction costs, which makes it possible to bring electric service to substantially every farm within an area. This principle has been recognized by leaders in rural electrification as fundamental if the greatest possible number of farmers are to have electric service.

The members of the electric cooperatives of this country have conclusively demonstrated that through an intelligent program of cooperation on the part of the Government they can provide for themselves, without expense to others, modern power facilities. The old method—the method which was in existence prior to the time of R. E. A., the method which in 50 years was incapable of providing service for much over 10 percent of America's best-located farms—is utterly inadequate to meet this challenge of tomorrow, inadequate unless it is to be heavily subsidized either by presently served consumers or by the Government itself.

There is another matter of which I wish to speak today, and that is the relationship between the Rural Electrification Administration and its borrowers and other public agencies. R. E. A. is primarily interested in making its contribution to farmers and rural people by carrying out the mandate of Congress to bring electric service to the farms of America through self-liquidating loans.

As a public lending agency, we desire to render those necessary services that will insure the successful economical operation of those lines on which we have loaned money. We believe that since we are working together toward a common objective, we should be responsive to the will and judgment of the local people. I want to make this very clear: It is not the desire of the R. E. A. to run the business of its borrowers. I like to think of R. E. A. as a clearinghouse of ideas and practices, through which the collective experience and the best thinking of all of us—the cooperatives as well as R. E. A. itself—are made available to each individual cooperative or power district. That, of course, requres an exchange of information both ways if it is to be of the greatest practical value to you. Of course, we all recognize that in order to safeguard the Government funds R. E. A. must comply with standard Government regulations and procedures.

R. E. A. looks to the local boards of directors and the local managers for meeting day-to-day management problems effectively. You know what the problems are; you are constantly gaining experience; and so long as membership interest is sustained within the cooperative, so long as public-spirited men and women give their services on boards of directors, I am sure that if we in R. E. A. do our part this program of rural electrification will measure up to our fondest hopes. The record which I have already cited proves that you are doing a good job.

Working together, I am sure that we can achieve the primary objectives of the Rural Electrification Act, which are that ultimately the farm homes of America may be brought from darkness to light, and that the burden of toil upon the shoulders of the American farmer may be lightened by mechanical equipment driven by the smooth, dependable flow of electric power.

Extension of Emergency Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of the Secretary of War before the House Banking and Currency Committee, May 2, 1944:

Your chairman has invited me to come before your committee in order to discuss from the standpoint of our military effort, the question of the extension of the Emergency Price Control Act. I am glad to do so though I have already expressed my views at some length before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. So far as I am aware, nothing has developed in the month which has intervened since my appearance before that committee to cause me to change my opinion as to the importance of continuing present price control legislation without any material amendments.

From the standpoint of the military effort, it seems to me to be essential that we should avoid doing anything at this time which will either create false hopes about the early termination of the war or which will in any way tend to disturb the morale of the soldier in the field or of his family at home. This is particularly vital just now when we are approaching the crisis of the war effort.

From the same standpoint, it is also important that no action should be taken which would tend to check essential war production, whether through a disturbance of morale of the civilian worker or through a dislocation of the national price structure.

It is obvious to all of us that, unlike the last war period, we have thus far succeeded in avoiding a dangerous rise in prices. Undoubtedly this has been due to a variety of reasons: The patriotic restraint of the American people, taxes, some wage control, price ceilings, and rationing. Whatever you may think about the relative importance of these different factors—and I personally would have favored a much greater reliance on a broader tax basis and a firmer wage control—we have in fact adopted and for 2 years have lived under a system of supplementary controls such as price ceilings and rationing. Having chosen greater emphasis on regulatory governmental control without resorting to substantially heavier taxes, I suggest that it would be highly unwise, at this state at least, to remove or materially to modify those controls and thus to run the risk of a price rise that might well be the beginning of the spiral of inflation. Certainly this would be unwise unless higher taxes were first imposed to sop up much more of the present spending power of the people.

It seems to me apparent that with the huge backlog of cash and other savings which are now in the hands of our people and which are estimated to be running at the rate of $38,000,000,000 a year after taxes, a substantial removal of restraints just now might be misinterpreted by many of our people as a deliberate and intentional opening of the floodgates. It might well be regarded as an invitation by Congress to start a spending spree. I am inclined to think that to most of us such action would be taken as a green-light signal which no subsequent tax legislation would be able to reverse in time to avoid disaster.

If that is true, and I think it is, and if our great buying capacity should rapaciously attack our limited supply of civilian goods, then all that we have gained during the past 2 years through the voluntary restraint of the people and from their general compliance with Government regulations may be lost in a price rise which will cause distress and consternation to all our people, especially to those who are obliged to live on fixed incomes.

True, there has been some criticism of the management of the very intricate and difficult problem of price fixing and rationing. I do not pretend to pass on the merits of these criticisms; nor am I in a position to suggest what modifications in the law, if any, might be necessary to insure a more effective or less bothersome administration. So also black markets and other inequities and abuses have developed. To some extent at least these may be unavoidable incidents to such a vast machinery of control. In fact we know they have developed in other countries which have adopted systems of rationing and price control. No one can condone such abuses. If they can be eliminated or minimized, or if troublesome and unnecessary nuisances can be avoided without weakening the control, everyone but the racketeer and the profiteer will applaud. But that will all take time and patience and money to accomplish, and it is my very earnest belief that we should not at this time either scrap or substantially modify the whole machinery of control merely because in some respects it may not yet be perfect in its application or in its administration. In this connection it is encouraging to read Mr. Bowles' testimony before this committee about the determined efforts that are being made, without any amendment to the law, to simplify the regulations and to improve the administrative machinery of the Office of Price Administration.

We now have some seven and one-half million men and women in our Army and most of them have families or dependents at home. The welfare and morale of those at home are vital forces in the morale of the men in the field and have a direct bearing on their military efficiency. I think it would be impossible to measure the effect on the soldier of a sudden or drastic relaxation of the restraints which have been imposed to protect the national economy for his family as well as for himself on his return from military service. Demoralizing confusion might well result from any general price rise or more particularly from a maladjustment of prices which might follow if our controls are substantially loosened at this time.

We all take pride in the fact that ours are the best-paid soldiers in the world and that their dependents receive the most liberal benefits. The amount of the dollar payments to service men and women and their families is not, however, the fair test of the provision which is being made for them. What counts is the purchasing power of those dollars to provide living expenses for those dependent on them. The cost of living will determine whether the actual support received, measures up to the provision intended.

The Office of Dependency Benefits of the War Department sends out over 5,000,000 checks each month aggregating almost $300,000,000 to the families of those serving in the Army. As these payments represent fixed income, the plight of the families in a period of rapidly rising prices is too easily visualized to require any elaboration.

There is also the closely related question of the savings of the men in the Army and what would happen to them during a period of rapidly rising prices. Probably most important in this respect is National Service Life Insurance. By the end of 1943, Army insurance alone had reached a total of almost $74,000,000,000, represented by some 10,000,000 policies. As you know, in the event of a fatality, the insurance is paid to dependents in monthly installments. Certainly the widows and other beneficiaries of those who give their lives to their country are entitled to consideration and, since they are provided with fixed incomes, reasonable stability of prices will determine largely whether they receive the contribution toward their living expenses that was intended.

We also take considerable pride in the War bond purchases of the men and women in the Army and in the War Department. These are running about $60,000,000 a month through payroll deductions alone.

In addition, large savings for assistance to themselves in the post-war period are being accumulated by the soldiers. Those who are overseas send home each month some $20,000,000 in addition to the regular allotments deducted from their pay. I think that everything possible should be done to safeguard the value of these savings.

In addition to the effect on its personnel, the War Department as a buyer of military supplies has the greatest interest in the continuance of price controls. The American people are determined that our fighting men shall have the most modern and effective equipment that can be devised. There is equal determination to devote all necessary proportions of the Nation's resources to the successful prosecution of the war. The result has been the most gigantic production program ever undertaken by any nation. While military requirements will largely determine the magnitude of our expenditures, some control over the cost of the war can be exercised by keeping within bounds the prices paid for supplies and equipment, without sacrificing the quality or the quantity of our armaments.

Thus the War Department itself has a vital stake in the maintenance of stable prices. If prices are rising rapidly, it becomes exceedingly difficult to translate the Army supply program into dollar requirements some months ahead. The normal difficulties of planning a war program far in advance would be greatly multiplied by fluctuating prices and would result in estimates becoming little more than informed guesses.

Let us assume, for instance, that War Department expenditures for the fiscal year 1945 will continue at approximately the same rate as in the current fiscal year, indicated at about $41,000,000,000 exclusive of Army pay and allowances. A moderate increase of 10 percent in cost would involve an additional $4,000,000,000, and an increase of 25 percent would raise anticipated expenditures more than $10,000,000,000. Any such increase in cost would necessitate going to the Congress for additional funds with a consequent disruption of your revenue and borrowing programs and would substantially increase the ultimate tax burden.

Consider also the effect of rising prices on the munitions industry. The War Department has reduced unit prices to a low level by the application of close-pricing policies and by the renegotiation of contracts. These reductions have been possible only because industry could schedule production contracts over a relatively long term. This confidence and ability to plan ahead would be dispelled by rising prices, and long-term commitments would become difficult. Higher costs would result from the short-term contracts under which industry would be forced to operate.

Furthermore, consider the administrative difficulties of the War Department if the innumerable long-term contracts now outstanding should have to be redetermined and adjusted upward continually because of rising prices. Such a burden could not readily be met in the face of rising manpower difficulties today, and close control over expenditures would be lost.

The experience of the last 3 years should be reviewed as a contrast to chaotic conditions which would be produced by rapidly rising prices. A fairly constant price level has enabled the War Department to negotiate expeditiously purchases involving the expenditure of over $14,000,000,000 for munitions in the fiscal year of 1942, $40,000,000,000 in the fiscal year 1943, and for the current fiscal year probably over $41,000,000,000, including lend-lease and working funds. Because of relatively stable prices these dollars are actually purchasing more airplanes, tanks, guns, and ammunition than were originally anticipated.

By contrast you may recall our experience during the World War, when prices were rising steadily and rapidly and the expenditures of the War Department necessarily increased in proportion. The Office of Price Administration estimates that the total cost of the war through 1943 would have been increased over $65,000,000,000, or almost 50 percent, if prices in general had followed the pattern of the World War. Mr. Bowles has given some striking illustrations of skyrocketing prices between 1914 and 1919. It is most fortunate for all of us that there is a different story to be told thus far about this war.

How much of the present story is due to price controls and how much to other factors may be a debatable question. But one thing seems clear: Those controls—whether we like them or not, whether or not we favored them at the time they were authorized as a means of obtaining stability—have now become a very substantial brake on the forces of inflation. To release that brake just now after a year of virtual stability, both in commodity prices and in the cost of living, would seem to me to risk all that we had feared and sought to avoid.

So, in the interest of the soldier and his dependents, to do what we reasonably can now in an effort to protect their standard of living, to protect the value of their insurance and of their savings, to maintain essential war production with the least confusion to the workers and the maximum of savings to the Government, I very sincerely hope that you will see fit to continue price-control legislation without material modification. And I hope that you will continue it not only for the period of the war but also for such time after the war as may be necessary to facilitate the conversion of industry from war work to a full-fledged peacetime economy of production and employment. I can well remember that 25 years ago it was the period after the war was over during which the country suffered most from the inflation of prices. And it will be that post-war period with which the returning soldier will be most concerned.

Message From the Indiana State Federation of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I am proud of a message I have just received from the Indiana State Federation of Labor. The text of the message follows:

INDIANA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR
(AFFILIATED WITH A. F. OF L.),
701 Peoples Bank Building, Indianapolis, Ind.:

The following is an excerpt from page 1 of our list for the Eleventh Congressional District:

"LOUIS LUDLOW, 843 North Meridian Street, Indianapolis. Present Congressman. No better friend of labor ever represented Indiana in the Congress of the United States."

(Signed) INDIANA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Dilemma in Corn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, several months ago the Republican Food Study Committee gave notice to the county that the demands for corn and corn products were such that there was almost sure to be a serious food shortage of corn. No firm and constructive policy has been adopted by the Government, with the result that today there is a serious corn shortage in the country. Confiscation of elevators has not been sufficient. Will the Government confiscate the private corn supplies of the farmers of the Nation? This is a question that the farmers are wondering about.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I submit for printing an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of May 1, 1944:

DILEMMA IN CORN

Eastern agricultural authorities warned more than a year ago that the policy of encouraging ever-increasing livestock production was a luxury which this country could not afford at a time when it was feeding its civilian population and armed forces and also carrying out huge lend-lease commitments abroad.

How well that warning was justified is to be seen in the Government's efforts of the last fortnight to break the "squeeze" in corn—a squeeze which has already seriously affected the east and west coast dairy interests and which now threatens a suspension of operations by the corn-refining industry. The Government's first step toward relieving this situation came 2 weeks ago when it ordered 35 percent of the corn in country and terminal elevators earmarked for sale to the Commodity Credit Corporation. The figure was stepped up to 60 percent a few days later and to 100 percent on April 24.

It is not surprising to find that none of these moves has had any appreciable result, since none of them goes to the heart of the problem. The corn is not in the elevators, but on the farms, and it is on the farms because the corn farmer, who is usually also a hog farmer, can use it more profitably as feed. The present dilemma in corn arises from the fact that the corn-hog ratio, which under a free-price system serves to keep corn and hog prices in equilibrium, has been short-circuited.

How can the equilibrium best be restored? From a purely economic standpoint the answer to this is simple. While both corn and hog prices are out of line compared with normal standards, hog prices are the further out of line; hence, it would seem that they should be lowered to the point where the incentive would be increased to reduce the hog population and stimulate the release of corn stocks. Unfortunately, it is not as easy as that. Hogs are selling where they are today not because of high price ceilings but because of support floors placed under them when, back in 1940, it was felt necessary to provide such guaranties to insure increased production. Economically desirable though it might be, these guaranties cannot be withdrawn short of a clear-cut breach of faith with the farmers.

Various suggestions have been put forward for meeting the problem without reference to the price ratio, but all are unsatisfactory in varying degrees. To requisition the corn on the farms, as some have urged, would not only be to open another "bridgehead" like that of Montgomery Ward, in Chicago, but it would leave unsolved the question of distributing the corn so released. Continuing to dump wheat into the feed market would be repugnant, to say the least, at a time when there already is talk of rationing bread. Every suggestion that has been offered has its weaknesses, and this applies to the idea of raising the ceiling price on corn as it does to the others. Nevertheless, undesirable as this may be, standing alone, it is probably less undesirable, when everything is considered, than the alternative proposals. It could not be very inflationary, since most of the end products into which corn goes are already ceilinged; while it is the one way in which the corn-hog ratio can be set to work to perform its normal function.

Modern Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the Washington Post of May 1, 1944:

MODERN YOUTH

(By Roger W. Babson)

BETTER JUDGMENT THAN PARENTS

During the past few weeks which I spent in Florida, I've seen many soldiers. Babson Park is near the great Avon Park Army Air Field, which contains the largest practice bombing field in the world. This has given me an opportunity to meet not only men in training but men who have returned from all parts of the world. They certainly are a marvelous group. It is almost beyond human understanding what these boys, 20 to 25 years of age, are accomplishing. They truly possess a character, intelligence, and training far in excess of what boys of that age had when I was in college 40 years ago.

However, I wish to write on the business judgment—rather than on the fighting ability—of these young men. The tendency of us oldsters is to judge industry and investments through our own eyes and based upon our own experience. If young people don't agree with us, we naturally assume that we are right and the young people are wrong. I have felt this way for many years; but I am gradually changing my ideas. Without doubt we are entering a new era. Such new eras come only once in about 200 years. It is difficult for us older people to adjust ourselves to these new conditions and to judge things correctly by the new standards.

I often attend conferences where these questions are discussed: "The future of railroads versus aviation"; "Will utilities become municipally owned?"; "Will the Government go more into business in order to provide employment?" At these meetings we older people think we are to determine what is to happen to our investments. We make a great mistake in figuring on any such false assumption. The answers will be determined by the young people in our families and employment. Even the future of the New Deal lies with these boys and girls.

Do not be shocked by this, but the opinion of most persons in the twenties as to the future of any industry or political policy is more valuable than the opinion of most persons over 50 years of age. The reason is that the future of the industry or policy depends upon what these young persons are going to buy, or do, or vote—not according to what we older ones buy, do, or vote. I had rather have the opinion of an intelligent 25-year-old returning serviceman on the future of most American industries than that of a conservative investment counselor who is judging the future by the past.

Recently I was with a group of officers including graduates from Harvard Business School, Wharton School of Finance, Northwestern University, and Babson Institute. We discussed what would happen, after the war, to our Government bonds in case the debt reaches $300,000,000,000. These are the boys who will decide the question of whether or not the debt is to be refunded and, if so, how. It will not be decided by present Treasury officials, nor by present officers of banks or insurance companies. I will repeat the suggestions of three of these boys:

Suggestion No 1:

"I believe that the government debt of all nations should be reorganized as would be the debt of a railroad which has become too unwieldy. The holder of a $1,000 Government bond could be given $250 in a new 2½-percent 30-year coupon bond; $500 in a registered income bond, the interest on which could be payable at various rates according to the receipts from a new sales tax levied for this purpose; and $250 in non-interest-bearing scrip which could be used for the payment of certain taxes. This would immediately cut the fixed interest payment down 75 percent and yet every bondholder should eventually get his principal back with interest depending upon the prosperity of the country."

Suggestion No. 2:

"Let other countries readjust their debts in the above manner, but I shall never vote to have the United States do anything which could be called repudiation in the slightest degree. I believe a debt of $300,000,000,000 can be supported and should be supported so that every one will get his full interest and some day his principal. All we need do is to revalue the dollar by printing more currency and thus cause an increase in national incomes proportionate to the increase in our national debt. Instead of cutting down the war debt, let us inflate prices, wages, land values, etc. Then it will be just as easy to pay interest on $300,000,000,000 as it was to pay interest on 25 percent of this amount a few years ago."

Suggestion No. 3:

"I have a better idea than either of you other men," said the third soldier, "I oppose either a reorganization of the debt or inflation. Both ideas are wrong. I recommend refunding the entire debt of $300,000,000,000, for 100 years—with a one-half of 1 percent coupon. Then I should allow these bonds to be used at par for the payment of taxes and I should support them with a Federal sales tax, the income from which could be used to call bonds by lot at a premium of 10 percent. A small sales tax will easily give the Government $3,300,000,000 a year which would repay the entire debt within 100 years. It is true that these bonds might at times sell at less than par, but the fact that $3,000,000,000 would be called each year by lot at 100 should hold prices pretty close to par. This means that taxes could be greatly reduced, inflation avoided, and everyone could receive par for his bonds plus as much interest as the big banks of New York are now paying depositors."

Do not quote me as making any of these recommendations, I merely give these illustrations to show how modern youth is thinking and to urge readers to give more attention to the "crazy" ideas of our young people. They are the ones that will determine what will happen to the national debt and to every stock and bond. I do not say that youths have better judgment than their parents, nor that they are less likely to change their minds. All I say is that our returning servicemen should be better able to forecast the future.

Many people worry as to what extent the Russian shadow is to fall upon this country, especially during the next depression. They see Russia becoming such a world power that they fear she will Russianize Europe and England and the effects of this will ultimately be felt in America. This certainly seems reasonable, but a 22-year-old flier, returned from delivering airplanes to Russia, said to me, "Don't worry about Russia. She will have her own post-war troubles. Sixteen Russian generals are already planning to get Stalin's berth."

The Political Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Representative CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, of Connecticut, to the Ohio Federation of Republican Women's Organizations, in Columbus, on April 21, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is always an honor for national officeholders to visit your great State, which has already given America seven Republican Presidents and so many fine Republican Governors. Today, under the efficient administration and fearless leadership of one of the best Governors you have ever had, wartime Ohio is setting an example for wartime production which is the envy of many another State, the more so since Ohio is sure to pace, if not lead, the victorious Republican States in November.

Having shown what he can do in his own State, your Governor is now engaged in a patriotic campaign to lay before the whole American people the issues upon which the next election will be decided. Much of the credit for a Republican victory in 1944 must be given to Governor Bricker, not only for demonstrating to the people, by his own high record in office, what Republican government has always stood for but for his vigorous analysis of fundamental American principles now.

Ohio is also fortunate in its outstanding representation in Washington. Senior Senator TAFT and the junior Senator BURTON are as famed on the Hill as they are at home as 2 of our most brilliant and respected Members in Congress. In the House you have 20 able and hard-working Republican Members out of a total State delegation of 23. Ohio seems to have found the correct congressional ratio of Republicans to Democrats.

I know none of the men Representatives will mind my speaking specifically of Mrs. FRANCES BOLTON. They know, as well as I, that she long ago convinced skeptics that a member of her sex in high office can serve with wisdom, wit, and vision equal to that of any man. But I am especially grateful to her for the record she has made in Congress, for that record made it much easier for my own State of Connecticut to send me there.

But above all I am proud to be here as a woman, talking to so many able and active women Republicans. The women of America will largely decide whether the next President is to be a Democrat or a Republican. It is estimated that 6 out of every 10 votes cast in November will be cast by women. Millions of America's sons and husbands and sweethearts will be away fighting. Many, perforce, must leave the election decision up to their women. And these women see quite clearly at last—clearly even through their tears—that their decisions will affect their homes and lives, and their children's lives for a generation. For this reason alone thousands upon thousands of women who have never voted before, or who have heretofore voted Democratic, motivated by the deepest concern for their loved ones overseas and loyalty to their country's best interests, will cast their precious ballots this year for our party's candidate.

But even apart from their direct effect at the ballot box, the indirect influence of women has always been great in politics, simply because the influence of women has always been great on men. This is, I am sure, no secret to any married gentlemen here.

I sometimes like to think that the reason Solomon was the wisest man in the world was because he had so many wives to advise him. If, in November, many a man shows the wisdom of Solomon by voting Republican—cherchez la femme. For it's the soldiers' mom and sis, his wife or his girl back home who will be most ardently urging the men folks here to vote Republican.

Now expert speechifiers say that the recipe for a successful speech is to present one thought, and three facts to substantiate it. Instead, I am going to present to you one fact—and that one fact is about a woman. And from that fact I am going to suggest three thoughts, which I believe to be worthy of most careful consideration by every person in this Nation—but above all by American wives and mothers—particularly young wives and mothers with growing children.

This fact concerns the woman who has both indirectly and directly wielded more political power and influence, behind the scenes and on the forefront of the political stage, than any other woman in our day.

She is, as you have guessed, Eleanor Roosevelt. Of course her power derives primarily from her position as First Lady and her access to the President's mind. But it would be mean-spirited and wholly false to deny that her power has always been courageously and richly implemented by her own extraordinary physical and emotional energies. Whether one agrees with Mrs. Roosevelt's processes of intellection—and often I do not—the fact remains that she is a woman of great good will and a lively affection for the masses of the people. However, do not misunderstand me. Much as I admire her as a woman, as a Republican, I do not consider her "the indispensable lady."

But here is the fact which I wish to lay before you this evening: On February 22, in a press conference in Washington, D. C., Mrs. Roosevelt plunked frankly and unequivocally for peacetime universal compulsory military service.

I quote from that interview: "On possible military training for 17-year-olds, which soon may be the subject of hearings before the House Military Affairs Committee, Mrs. Roosevelt thinks there should be a post-war 1-year service program for both boys and girls, after finishing high school, or at the age when they would be high school graduates; for duration training, if 17-year olds are added to the compulsory list as material for replacements, after the end of hostilities, she thinks they should be given the works, like their older brothers. A possible post-war year's military training on the contrary, would be educational and would include some kind of community service to give boys and girls a background of community responsibility." Several times since that interview Mrs. Roosevelt has taken the occasion in other interviews and in print in her own words, to repeat her call for compulsory military post-war training, plus Government directed and supervised education in citizenship for every boy and girl in the land.

Now that is my fact. You ask right away, "But hasn't legislation for universal compulsory military training already been introduced into the Congress." The answer is, "Yes." The Democratic May bill and the Republican Wadsworth bill for compulsory national military training had been introduced long before Mrs. Roosevelt endorsed the idea. And both these bills have been referred to my committee for action. Then what is so significant about my fact?

Perhaps what is significant about this fact is (a) that the President's wife endorsed it; and (b) that she endorsed it 9 weeks after her husband returned from the famous Tehran and Cairo conferences.

At those conferences, we are told the shape of the peace to come was discussed by Mr. Churchill, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, Marshal Stalin, and Mr. Roosevelt.

Churchill once spoke of Stalin as "an enigma wrapped in a mystery." Since Tehran, many Americans have come to feel that insofar as the President has revealed his "specific" beliefs concerning the future that America will face after victory, he has become an enigma, wrapped in a mystery, and sealed with a riddle.

But here, in Mrs. Roosevelt's post-Tehran call to arms after the war is won, perhaps we have been unwittingly given a key to the puzzle, a tremendous and significant clue to what the New Dealers think is in store for post-war America.

I believe it is a tremendous clue, not only because Mrs. Roosevelt often reflects, as any wife must, her husband's own attitude on vital questions, but because on the record, for the past 12 years, Mrs. Roosevelt has so often in her interviews and in her column, telegraphed her husband's legislative punches.

There are three possible explanations for why the President's wife, who is certainly America's No. 2 New Dealer, might wish to create public opinion in favor of compulsory military training year in and year out in the post-war era for every American boy and girl.

The first explanation is that Mr. Roosevelt, after the Teheran conferences, concluded that we are not headed for 50 years or even 20 years of peace, but another war in the foreseeable future. After his discussions at Tehran he may have reviewed America's international post-war future and found it not so bright as some New Dealers would, for the purposes of the next election, like us to believe. At Teheran the President may have come to the conclusion that even when the Nazis and Japs are beaten to the ground, even when an international police force is formed, even when some organization for international peace is gotten together, our country is still going to need an army of mammoth proportions that can be whipped together in the twinkling of an eye, and a public, conditioned by training in citizenship, to whip in after it. And if this is what Mr. Roosevelt, after Teheran, thinks, and if he is right, our international future is black indeed and national post-war military service will be a necessity. It was because, in times past, the Swiss, the French, the Dutch, the Swedes, the Danes, and Belgians, although democracies, knew themselves to be surrounded by enemies, that they also had compulsory military training. Aggressive neighbors are, or always should be, good and sufficient reasons for arming. And wise statesmen, when their countries are faced with the threat of future invasion, never hesitate to call for peacetime compulsory military training.

To be sure, statesmen are not always wise, and do not always foresee the dangers which threaten them or take the necessary precautions to mitigate those dangers.

At this point I would like to read a few quotes from Mr. Roosevelt's pre-Pearl Harbor speeches on the subject of our armies and navies, just to show you what he has thought in the last post-war period about American defense preparations.

In his annual message to Congress on January 4, 1935, the President said, "There is no ground for apprehension that our relations with any nation will be otherwise than peace."

And on December 9, 1935, he wrote a letter to Norman Davis, which was read at the naval conference in which he said, "We three Nations—Great Britain, Japan, the United States—have nothing to fear from one another."

In a letter to the D. A. R. on April 20, 1936, he wrote, "We are maintaining a system that will meet our defensive needs. We have no plan for any other kind of system."

In Dallas, Tex., June 12, 1936, he said, "Things are not going so well on the European Continent and on the Asiatic Continent as they are going in the American Hemisphere. That has been the reason why I have tried to keep the feet of this country on the ground, hoping that by our example * * * we might have some effect on the rest of the world that is thinking too much of armaments and war."

And on October 11, 1936, he said, "One reason that we have such a very fine, though a very small Army is that our Army is training for peace."

Today, it is plain as the mustache on Hitler's face, or the hideous grin on Tojo's, that our President grievously misjudged the whole World War No. 1 post-war international situation, and failed entirely to see what America's military relation ought to be to the rising military menaces of fascism in Europe and Japanese imperialism in the Orient.

Actually no President in all our history, after being in power so long, has ever misjudged a world situation more seriously. In view of that fact simple minds like mine are bewildered when his adherents have the intellectual effrontery to present him to our people as the great international statesman who foresaw every disaster we have since faced and took every means to prevent it. But it is not my purpose to examine Mr. Roosevelt's vulnerable record of appeasement, isolationism, and unpreparedness, which lasted until some time after Munich. I am willing to concede for the moment that he has now learned his international lessons. Or rather that millions of our lads on the battle fronts are learning them. Soldiers often die in wars so that politicians may acquire the art of statesmanship. I am suggesting, indeed, that Mr. Roosevelt, confronted with this bloody lesson in New Deal unpreparedness and inept New Deal diplomacy called our World War No. 2, is at long last better capable of judging our future international situation. I have merely recited his pre-1939 attitude to show that at no time before then, when Germany and Japan were waxing in might, did Mr. Roosevelt feel that large armaments, not to say universal compulsory military training, were necessary in order to defend our country. But in view of Mrs. Roosevelt's current endorsement of it, I must assume that he feels differently about our future. This is very strange, indeed, since the might of Germany and Japan is now not waxing, but waning.

But let us assume that Mr. Roosevelt does feel we will still be surrounded by potential enemies and aggressors even after the Axis is beaten. And if this is the explanation of why Mrs. Roosevelt, No. 2 New Dealer and advance legislative agent for Mr. Roosevelt, has come out for compulsory military training in the post-war era is correct, I believe the American people have every right to demand to be told who our potential enemies are when the Germans and Japs are licked. What are their names? How will they get together against us? And why will the international police force, the international organizations, and perhaps leagues, the four power agreement, which we are all hoping will guarantee world security, fail to do so? The American people deserve to be told what there is so dark and menacing in the international post-war picture which makes the President's wife, who knows so well what the President thinks, demand that henceforth young Americans must all go in for a yearly stint of soldiering?

I wish to make it abundantly clear that I am not against compulsory military training if it is needed to defend America. It would be utter folly for a Republican, a woman, or a patriot to agitate against compulsory post-war training, if it is necessary to the defense of our Western Hemisphere against our future enemies. We can never prevent wars simply by curtailing our own defense system. Blind and unprepared pacifism in a world of potential enemies is the utter betrayal of one's country. Simply legislating at home against armaments and military training never prevented a foreign aggressor from arming. Mr. Roosevelt thought so in his own isolationist days, when he praised his fine small army. He has since found out this is not true—to many a bereaved American mother's sorrow. At all times, we women must urge the adequate defense and armament of our own country, even while we urge world-wide disarmament and all economic and international measures which will foster contentment and prosperity—the true breeders of the non-military spirit in other nations.

The point is that today, in the utter absence of any information from the White House about the true state of international affairs and future international prospects, no American is able to judge for himself whether the chances are really for a viable peace, or whether we shall have to stay drilled to the marrow of our bones and armed to the teeth for years, even after our present enemies are beaten.

For my part, I am frank to say that if we should have Mr. Roosevelt in the White House for 4 more years, I am inclined to be for compulsory military training, simply because I believe, on the record, that the administration has shown itself unable to keep us out of war or to prevent the rise and rebirth of aggressor nations. It would be folly, if we are to be doomed to 4 more years of New Deal foreign policy not to prepare our growing boys for the next European or Asiatic holocaust. So who knows? Perhaps the best insurance the Nation could take out on 16 years of New Deal statesmanship would be compulsory national service for everybody of fighting age.

But I said there were three possible explanations why Mrs. Roosevelt came out for compulsory military training after the war is won. I have given you the first and most plausible one: that she feels we will need young men and women trained for war to fight our future enemies, after we have licked our present ones. There are, however, two other explanations.

The second explanation is that the New Dealers may simply feel that discipline, plain, old-fashioned brute discipline of an undisguised military and governmental nature, is good for Americans. The New Dealers may feel that we are a lazy, happy-go-lucky, undisciplined bunch of individualists, who need to be taught henceforth how to snap to at drill time and form squads right at the flicker of a top sergeant's eyelash. They may believe in discipline for discipline's sake. This Prussian approach has certainly become natural to those New Deal junkers, the bureaucrats. But I am loath to believe it would be wholly agreeable to either the President or Mrs. Roosevelt, who, I honestly believe, are too American to believe in regimentation simply for regimentation's sake.

There is a third and better explanation: The New Deal could be for compulsory post-war military training for boys and girls for purely domestic, economic reasons. We all know that if sound financial and legislative steps are not taken in the near future we will be faced with another terrible depression and a disastrous unbalance of our domestic post-war economy. This depression would be deeply aggravated by thousands upon thousands of returning war veterans for whom jobs could not immediately be found and for whom, I fear, jobs will certainly never be found if the New Dealers remain in the saddle.

Now the New Dealers may today be figuring that a nice new way which they have never tried—or dared to try before—to make plenty of jobs, or at least plenty more jobs for returning veterans, would be to start drafting high-school graduates right out of civilian life, to put them into uniforms, so that they would not compete in civilian enterprises with returned veterans. Moreover, large, permanent military establishments might prevent the folding up of Government-owned armament factories, aircraft, and munitions plants, so foresighted New Dealers may view national peacetime service as an excellent flesh and blood P. W. A., easy to sell on patriotic motives to the public. Certainly make-work, leaf-raking, or W. P. A.-ism will not be countenanced again by the American public as a solution for unemployment. But a large army, and compulsory military training possible of passage in the post-war glow of war hysteria—training in which the young boys, in peace, would be "given the works" like their older brothers, as Mrs. Roosevelt's interview had it—might well be, in the New Deal view, a more popular solution.

The unhappy thing about such a solution for a suffering post-war economy is that it has so often been tried before in European countries and found wanting. Indeed, after World War No. 1, the Nazis, and the Italians under Mussolini, began to solve their own domestic depressions in this very way. German and Italian fascism got going and received their popular support by exactly this method of compulsory military training for the young. It may be added that Mrs. Roosevelt's "own idea," as she called it in her interview, of "training at the same time in citizenship" under governmental supervision, was exactly the fillip given to such Fascist programs by Hitler and Mussolini. They called them youth movements and the "strength through joy" programs.

Moreover, militaristic solutions for domestice economic difficulties contain one terrible and bloody joker. It has often been said that the one thing you can't do with bayonets is to sit on them. Certainly history is replete with tragic examples of governments which built armies and navies larger than they needed in peace because of domestic political expediency, only to find in the end that they had to go places and do things with them of a strongly aggressive nature. No, I do not think that compulsory military training as a solution for unemployment is a happy one. And it might have, as Mr. Roosevelt said, way back in '36, a very poor "effect on the rest of the world that is thinking too much of armaments and war." We would be in a sorry position, indeed, in the post-war period to plead with other nations to cut their armaments and military programs if we proceeded meanwhile to build up at home the core of the world's greatest potential army. If compulsory military training is ever advocated by this administration as a means of solving our domestic economic problems, let us remember this: We have embarked on the road to fascism at home, which inevitably leads to imperialism abroad.

To repeat, are we to have compulsory military training (a) for discipline for discipline's sake? (b) To solve the unemployment problem? (c) Because the post-war world that 12 years of New Dealism has led us into will be so full of enemies that it is parlous for us to do otherwise? These are pregnant questions. They should be asked often in this coming election, for it is women above all who will suffer if they go unanswered. It is their sons now growing up who are faced with being cast for time out of mind into military mold, heretofore alien to this country.

And now I must at this point inject a few words which were totally unprepared this morning. I spoke of the way Mrs. Roosevelt telegraphs the administration's legislative punches. Well, an hour ago I was handed a copy of Collier's magazine, on the newsstands today. In it there is an article by Secretary of the Navy Knox, calling for compulsory military training for 17-year-olds now, and for all boys after the war. And among others, the three reasons he gives are:

(1) Discipline will be good for young Americans. It will make them aware of their obligation to the state.

(2) It will help solve the unemployment problem, not only because high-school graduates will not be competing with returned veterans for civilian jobs, but because it is only fair that these young boys should bear the brunt of policing occupied countries for as many years as is necessary after the war, so that their older brothers can come home and get the good jobs.

(3) It will provide us with the core of a great army to defend ourselves against future aggression or invasion. Our future enemies are, of course, unnamed.

Well, that's that. We can tonight here, definitely conclude that the administration has espoused Mrs. Roosevelt's proposition of 2 months ago, and will make from here out a concentrated effort to pass it in law. And thus, are we not also to conclude—no matter what the State Department says, that this administration fears fresh wars and oppression—in short, despairs of bringing about a real peace of any reasonable duration—and also that the New Dealers no longer quite believe in the old, prosperous, democratic, civilian-minded America? Yes; we must, from this latest proof, deduce that the New Deal no longer believes in the possibility of a straw-hat, slouch-hat, baseball-bat America. It believes in a helmeted and bayonet-carrying America.

Is this really to be the fate of American youth, of your boys and girls now growing up, in the post-war era? Yes, alas, if we are to have 4 more years of the New Deal at home and abroad. But, no; if a wise and cautious and sincere man moves into the White House next year; a man who can work out with foreign countries, in predominantly economic terms instead of predominantly military ones, a viable and durable peace, a peace based on better economic and cultural relations instead of backed by the conception of the bayonet, and if at home he finds ways of employing our people without putting them on to a dole or into a uniform. After 12 years it has been writ in the Nation's blood that Mr. Roosevelt cannot do this. With all my heart, I believe that a Republican administration can do it. It may take a long time to clean up the whole New Deal mess after our boys come home from their certain victories. But God willing, for their sakes, the patient American people once put in possession of the facts, will clean it up. I believe they will make a happy beginning with a Republican President in November. To see that this man has this noble and challenging opportunity, the chance to bring our sons home from a completely victorious war over the most evil forces that have ever menaced us, bring them home to an America which is not henceforth to be totally militaristic, and to keep them home for at least the next half century in a truly peaceful and prosperous world is the job for which Republican women will be largely responsible in November. I do not have a shadow of doubt that they will do it magnificently.

"When greater perils men environ,
Then women show a front of iron,
And gentle in their manner, they Do bold things in a quiet way."

The Use of External Sovereignty for Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Use of External Sovereignty for Security," delivered by me at the annual spring meeting of the section on International and Comparative Law of the American Bar Association, April 28, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The United States Government can legally become one of the founders, and an active member, of a cooperative organization of sovereign nations, for security.

The power of a nation to establish its security is a birthright. Moreover, a state is not qualified for recognition unless the family of nations can perceive that the new-born state possesses this power. Its source is the practice and law of nations. It may or may not be enumerated in constitutions. It was enumerated in the Constitution of the United States.

The occasion for my discussing this subject is the recent expression of skepticism by some leaders of thought regarding the legal capacity of the United States to join other sovereign nations in setting up the necessary implements of political, military, and judicial control over the causes of war and threat of war, and to create international conditions in which a peace can be attained which will prevail. If the legality fog caused by the conflicting conceptions of the word "sovereignty" could be dissolved by the sunlight of reason, a seeming obstacle to the joining of nations as friends would disappear. We would open the way to consideration of methods of security which would benefit each of the nations.

As a result of this second needless war, humanity should be ready for the specific institutions for abolition of fascism and the establishment of republicanism.

Such service as we render today, in various forums, is inspired by our desire to establish faith in the new way which leads to the bright horizon of order through justice.

I would strengthen the faith of the American people in the feasibility of the exercise of external sovereignty for security without impairment of the power or the dignity of the United States Government. I would point out that we can safely take the new position, conditioning our nationalism to the extent which may be necessary for protection of our country and the other members of such an organization from military aggression.

In fact, the frequency of wars in the past, through failure to use sovereignty in a partnership for peace, has made applicable Virgil's metaphor that "the unused weapon dies with rust." The most imperative function of sovereignty is such exercise of it as will establish security, in which the virtues and the energies of the people can be freely developed and expressed.

The enfranchised American people, in whom sovereignty, as popularly interpreted, resides, have vested the Federal Government with exclusive exercise of external sovereign powers. They have deprived each of the several States of the functions of external sovereignty.

I do not presume to instruct this distinguished group of international lawyers as to the difference between external and internal sovereignty. I do not undertake any discussion of the devisibility of internal sovereignty, or of the distribution of its powers between Federal and State governments.

In the interest of certainty regarding the use which I make of the term "external sovereignty," I do not discuss, I assume, that there is no such thing as absolute sovereignty beneath the Word of God; that omnipotence or almightiness in states constituting the family of nations does not exist, and that total independence of one another among states that are equally sovereign is impossible.

For practical use, that meaning most available to the people through dictionaries is here used:

"The sovereign states are those which are fully autonomous and independent—i. e., relatively free from higher or outside control—a freedom not fully enjoyed by part sovereign states." This definition recognizes that, on the external side, sovereignty may be limited in various ways by the rules, principles, and customs of international law, and by treaties of alliance, guaranty, and protection, by which a state obligates itself to give aid to another under certain conditions, or to assist in maintaining a state of affairs agreed upon." (Dr. Amos S. Hershey, The Essentials of International Public Law and Organization.) Dr. Hershey says: "External sovereignty or independence must not be understood in any absolute or unrestricted sense. Whatever may be the case in theory, in practice it is very limited and wholly relative."

When given this meaning, the exercise of external sovereignty for security does not cost the surrender of sovereignty. Such use of sovereignty tends to preserve and strengthen it.

Oppenheim points out (I, p. 174) that a State does not lose any part of its sovereignty by concluding a treaty of arbitration, and that, if we had a general treaty of obligatory arbitration, the contracting States would remain sovereign because all would be equally and reciprocally bound.

Merignac (II, p. 43) urges that "treaties of guaranty do not destroy sovereignty. Such treaties do not necessarily imply a limitation of sovereignty—not unless the State whose rights are guaranteed binds itself permanently not to exercise important or essential sovereign powers such as other States enjoy."

Senator TOM CONNALLY, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, in a colloquy with me while I was discussing this subject in debate on the Connally resolution, stated (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Nov. 3, 1943, p. 9062):

"Mr. CONNALLY. The question which I wish to propound relates to the subject of the surrender of sovereignty. There are those who contend that by entering into a treaty a nation surrenders some of its sovereignty. Is not the implication just the opposite? Sovereignty implies an independent and free nation with the choice and with the power to do those things it wants to do, and the making of a treaty, instead of being a limitation upon its sovereignty, is really a demonstration of its sovereignty. So far as the terms of a treaty are concerned, a nation's liberty of action is restricted until the treaty has expired. But if we were bound by the exaggerated view of sovereignty that a nation cannot make a treaty without giving up some of its sovereignty, we could never make a treaty respecting anything."

Another colloquy in that debate clarifies the interpretation which I make of the term "external sovereignty" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Nov. 9, 1943, p. 9062):

"Mr. WHEELER. When the recent agreement was entered into in Moscow between Russia, England, China, and the United States to do certain things and to say that they themselves would invite other countries to come in, did not that involve the giving up of some of the sovereignty of the United States? * * *

"Mr. AUSTIN. If the Senator will permit me, I should prefer to say that it placed a condition on sovereignty. It did not destroy or take away any of the sovereignty of any one of the nations, but it placed a condition upon them for a time and for a purpose; but it was specific and not general."

These colloquies are pointed up by paragraph 4 of the Moscow Declaration, which was substantially embodied in the Connally resolution, reading:

"4. That they recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

And by article 6, reading:

"6. That after the termination of hostilities they will not employ their military forces within the territories of other states except for the purposes envisaged in this declaration and after joint consultation."

This acceptance of conditions on nationalism is already part of our foreign policy.

I am indebted to Mr. Green Haywood Hackworth, legal adviser of the Department of State, for the following citations found in his Digest of International Law, volume 1, pages 51–66, giving historical support for the meaning of sovereignty employed in this address, and for the main thesis that the use of external sovereignty by the United States for security is legally possible, and does not entail loss of sovereignty.

In the case of Duff Development Company, Ltd., v. Government of Kelantan, in which the House of Lords affirmed an order staying proceedings against the Government of Kelantan, on the ground that the Sultan was an independent sovereign over which the Court had no jurisdiction, Viscount Finlay made the following remarks:

"It is obvious that for sovereignty there must be a certain amount of independence, but it is not in the least necessary that for sovereignty there should be complete independence. It is quite consistent with sovereignty that the sovereign may in certain respects be dependent upon another power; the control, for instance, of foreign affairs may be completely in the hands of a protecting power, and there may be agreements or treaties which limit the powers of the sovereign even in internal affairs without entailing a loss of the position of a sovereign power."

The Permanent Court of International Justice, in its judgment rendered on August 17, 1923, in the case of S. S. Wimbledon, involving the refusal by German authorities to permit this British ship to pass through the Kiel Canal, said:

"The Court declines to see in the conclusion of any treaty by which a state undertakes to perform or refrain from performing a particular act an abandonment of its sovereignty. No doubt any convention creating an obligation of this kind places a restriction upon the exercise of the sovereign rights of the state, in the sense that it requires them to be exercised in a certain way. But the right of entering into international engagements is an attribute of state sovereignty."

The Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Sutherland, in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. et al., upholding the constitutionality of the joint resolution of Congress, approved on May 28, 1934, to prohibit the sale of arms or munitions in the United States under certain conditions, said:

"Rulers come and go; governments end and forms of government change; but sovereignty survives. A political society cannot endure without a supreme will somewhere. Sovereignty is never held in suspense. When, therefore, the external sovereignty of Great Britain in respect of the Colonies ceased, it immediately passed to the Union. See Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall. 54, 80–81.

* * * * *

"It results that the investment of the Federal Government with the powers of external sovereignty did not depend upon the affirmative grants of the Constitution. The powers to declare and wage war, to conclude peace, to make treaties, to maintain diplomatic relations with other sovereignties, if they had never been mentioned in the Constitution, would have vested in the Federal Government as necessary concomitants of nationality. * * * The power to acquire territory by discovery and occupation (Jones v. United States, 137 U. S., 202, 212), the power to expel undesirable aliens (Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 705 et seq.), the power to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense (Altman & Co. v. United States, 224 U. S. 583, 600, 601; Crandall, Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement, 2d ed., p. 102 and note 1), none of which is expressly affirmed by the Constitution, nevertheless exists as inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality. This the Court recognized, and in each of the cases cited found the warrant for its conclusions not in the provisions of the Constitution, but in the law of nations."

Briefly, in the Law of Nations (2d ed. 1936, 86, 38–39), after reviewing the original theory of sovereignty and indicating the efforts of civilization to adapt the old theory to new conditions, said:

"Still another device for retaining the doctrine of sovereignty while adapting it to modern conditions has been to attribute sovereignty to the personified state itself; and this is the usage still current in the literature of international law. But this has only added to the confusion. We may properly speak of states as 'independent' in the sense to be explained later; but it is meaningless to say that they are 'sovereign,' that is to say, superior, when we are speaking of their relations to one another * * *. The theory of sovereignty * * * is not only inconsistent with the subjection of states to any kind of law, but it is in fact an impossible theory for a world which contains more states than one."

The competency of the United States Government to do all that it takes to defend its people from military aggression would have existed without the Constitution. The Constitution necessarily recognized the obligation arising out of the power, because the Constitution was setting up a Federal Republic, in which there might have arisen a conflict of responsibilities and powers as between the federation and the several States united in it. The several States did not lose their individuality, although they accepted the condition that they could not make a treaty, and could not make a compact without the consent of Congress. Nothing was added by the Constitution to the power of the United States Government to establish security against war and the fear of war. The operation of the law of necessity among nations throughout all history had established the power to protect and preserve the government and its people.

This power does not mean conversely the power to destroy the government or to tyrannize the people.

Philemon Bliss, former Member of Congress, professor of law in the State University of Missouri, author of various legal works, in his book on Sovereignty, particularly as related to secession, states (at p. 146): "The State (Federal) is necessarily immortal. It may be crushed by power, may commit suicide by surrender; but its existence can contemplate no limitation as to time; it cannot be legally dependent upon the will of another society; if so, it is not a state, but a dependent province."

This thought appears in Lincoln's first inaugural address:

"I hold that, in contemplation of universal law and of the Constitution, the union of these States is perpetual. Perpetuity is implied, if not expressed, in the fundamental law of all government. * * * Continue to execute all the expressed provisions of our National Constitution and the Union will endure forever, it being impossible to destroy it, except by some action not provided for in the instrument itself."

The argument that the United States would impair its sovereignty by joining a cooperative organization is a naked assertion. It is refuted by actual legal relations of nations from time to time throughout history. Moreover, it is contradicted by existing treaties to which the United States is a party, and by unions, and agreements, not having the status of treaties.

An example of the conditioning of sovereignty, and the surrender of a degree of nationalism in uniting to secure peace, was the organization, in the nineteenth century, of the Great Powers, consisting of Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. This organization exercised superintendence, over a limited area, of European affairs. Ultimately Italy was permitted to join. Among the current treaties in which the United States of America now participates, and by virtue of which our nationalism is conditioned, there are those setting up the following so-called permanent international commissions, and other organizations:

Permanent Court of Arbitration.
International Institute of Agriculture.
International Office of Public Health.
International Labor Organization.
International Boundary Commissions.
International Fisheries Commissions.
Permanent International Association of Navigation Congresses.
Permanent Commissions of Investigation and Conciliation.
Permanent Commissions of Inquiry provided for by treaties for the advancement of peace, and treaties of conciliation.

There exist numerous agreements not having the dignity of treaties, but which condition the nationality of each of the parties thereto, such as,

International Office of Public Health.
The Pan American Union.
International Sugar Council.
Wheat Advisory Committee.
Committee of Experts on the Codification of International Law.
Permanent Committee of Jurists on Civil and Commercial Laws.
Inter-American Committee of Experts on Nature Protection and Wildlife Preservation.
Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee.
Pan-American Resources Commission.
Inter-American Commission on Tropical Agriculture.
Inter-American Coffee Board.
Congress of the Postal Union.

Progress toward a judicial system has been made through the Permanent Court of International Justice, through procedure under the 1929 Treaty of Inter-American Arbitration, through special claims tribunals, including the Mixed Arbitral, and the Mixed Claims Commissions, established after the First World War under the .reaties of 1919, 1920, and 1921.

The most recent exercise of external sovereignty by the United States consists in the joint resolution authorizing the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, approved March 28, 1944. This is an example of cooperative organization established, not by treaty, but by a method of exercising powers which are inherent in our National Government as an entity of international law. Such benevolent organizations are worthy evidence that sovereignty is not lost in its exercise in external relations.

The so-called nationalists who doubt the legality of cooperative organization and fear the creation of the implements of security, lack realism. Both Houses of the United States Congress unanimously recognized the validity, and the probable utility, of conditioning sovereignty for security by passing a joint resolution which was signed by President Taft June 25, 1910, providing for the appointment of a committee of five members "to consider the expediency of utilizing existing international agencies for the purpose of limiting the armament of the nations of the world by international agreement, and of constituting the combined navies of the world an international force, for the preservation of universal peace," etc.

The adoption, in this Seventy-eighth Congress, of the Fulbright resolution by the House, the Connally resolution by the Senate, as well as the Foreign Policy Declaration by the Republican Post-War Advisory Council at Mackinac, evidence the faith of our people in the feasibility of a cooperative organization in which each nation can legally condition its sovereignty without in any material degree impairing its political power or dignity, and without injuriously affecting its internal sovereignty.

When the isolationists assert "but such cooperation has not and should not involve surrender of the sovereign right of the American people to dictate the policies of this Nation, or impair its freedom and independence, by joining any international police organization controlled by foreign nations" (Senator WHEELER as quoted in the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, April 3, 1944), they are dealing with policy. They are not interposing a sound obstacle to the making of agreements and treaties which would implement the security of the several nations parties thereto.

The answer to the assertion is that the organization, and the other implementation of security will be of such character that it will not impair the freedom and independence of any of these countries. but will guarantee such freedom and independence by the application of justice, the administration of law, and the maintenance of peace, which could not exist for long without security.

Once we recognize that, in any international organization for the promotion of peace, the limitations on each state's independent policing of international peace will be designed to affect all states alike, it will be seen that no one of them will find itself at any peculiar disadvantage in respect of freedom and independence.

Dr. Edward S. Corwin, in his new book, the Constitution and World Organization, gives a striking answer to the isolationists in the following statement:

"When total war is the price of total sovereignty, the price is too high."

The savagery of Hitler and Tojo having been suppressed by united sacrifice and superior force, something commanding reverence must arise. Reverence for law must grow under the moral forces that redeem nations. But this requires known laws to live by. A primary need for security is the establishment of an international code of fundamental rules of conduct among nations. Reason, justice, the divine law within, must dictate such a code. Something more than agreement on such laws is required.

The report of the Committee on Post-war International Judicial Organization of this Section of International and Comparative Law of the American Bar Association, made the 15th day of last month, pointed out that:

"If injustice and violence are to be supplanted by a reign of law in international society, the members of the family of nations must provide orderly processes whereby any suitor or claimant, right or wrong, may have his day in court before an impartial judicial body."

A tribunal or tribunals must be created for the just application of the laws, and there must be ability to enforce such laws. So far as they apply to aggression, adequate military power is indispensable for security through their operation. In the present stage of civilization self-discipline alone is inadequate. Military power will be especially required if the laws have not been codified nor the peaceful habits of nations yet formed.

I am firmly persuaded that peace cannot be established by negotiation alone. The attainment of peace must be fostered by peoples who are free and equally independent. That is to say, the beginning and development of peace depend upon the establishment and the prevalence of security. Therefore our aim ought to be the extension of the unity that now exists among the so-called United Nations to include the political and judicial fields. It seems to me that a minimum requirement is a council, or a similar body, a judicial system, and a military organization which need not be more integrated than through a joint chiefs of staff.

Thus we could give practical application in international relations of a code that shall be based upon the Golden Rule—the sovereignty of God, without which peace can never endure, and with which it could ultimately be made invulnerable.

Address by Hon. Samuel D. Jackson, of Indiana, at Indiana Democratic Editorial Association Banquet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. JACKSON] in Indianapolis, on April 15, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, Judge Minton, and ladies and gentlemen, as had already been said, a few months ago, a dark cloud passed over Indiana—death intervened—and a few days later I found myself thrust into the midst of things, the Representative of the people of this great Commonwealth in the Senate of the United States.

High honor comes to the tryst wreathed in smiles but with her always she brings responsibility, who wears a grave and sobering countenance. Mine to exercise was a one ninety-sixth part of the power of the highest legislative body in this country, the most powerful nation on this earth, and in the midst of the most devastating war known to man.

But that is not all. The first quarter of this year has been crowded with legislation as varied in its interests, as profound in its importance, and as far reaching in its significance as can be found in any single chapter of the history of the Republic, and I dare say the remainder of this brief tenure will see developments as critical to the United States of America and to the civilization of the world as may be expected in any similar period in the future.

That others were deserving of selection for this vacancy, on a basis of availability and merit, will not be seriously disputed in any well-informed quarter of Hoosierdom. The grace with which such persons accepted the Governor's solution of this difficult problem was a comfort to him, I know, and from my point of view, I have learned that true nobility is as much a part of our modern life as it was of the olden days of chivalry.

The kindness and generosity with which all of you responded to my appointment will abide with me—an anchor to windward. And if I should fail you in any respect, it will not be for any lack of your original faith in me nor any stint in your expressed good wishes.

In the long years gone by, as I have sat as a regular, and I may confess a persistent, guest at these recurring functions, sitting where you sit now, listening to the leaders of the party speaking as they have done so often and so well, I have always known with an unfailing certainty just what great words of statecraft would have issued from my mouth if mine had been the opportunity at the time instead of theirs.

But now that I am here to talk to you, it all seems quite different. I am too full of gratitude, too much the captive of my own emotions, to do more than make a fragmentary report of what I have experienced, and venture a few rudimentary suggestions to this host of patriotic Americans bound together by the ancient ties of the party of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

When I sat down to sketch the few brief notes for my remarks on this occasion, I was tempted to deal with interesting highlights, intriguing backstage glimpses and the downright amusing personal experiences of a couple who have lived the story of "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," and to let it go at that.

But this I cannot do. I am surrounded by too great a cloud of witnesses. There are too many scalding tears. There are too many hopeful bodies of the young blasted into atoms or rolling with their ships in the bellies of the seven seas. There are too many mothers who would walk a flinty path half way round the earth just to smooth the pillow of her boy if only she could find him. The cruel torrents of this storm tear us so far asunder—and beyond our wills. There is so much work to be done. There is so much to be learned. There is so much that ought to be said, and it is so late.

One interesting matter, however, I must allude to. It is the custom to seat the newest Senators according to seniority, or rather lack of it, in the last row, farthest from the center aisle which separates the two parties in the Chamber. It has long been the custom for the new members to write their names in the bottom of the desk drawers to which they are assigned. When I went to write mine there I saw the signatures of others, some new, some old and faded, some neat, some almost illegible. There arose before my eyes like a dream, the figures of Indiana's great Senators of yesterday: Daniel W. Voorhees, Albert J. Beveridge, John W. Kern, Samuel M. Ralston, and Thomas Taggart.

High on this scroll is the name of United States Senator Frederick Van Nuys. It is not a joy to be the beneficiary of the misfortune of so fine and good a public servant as Fred Van Nuys. I found him respected and esteemed by leaders on both sides of the aisle, and beloved by all his colleagues. My mail brings daily testimony of the faith of our people in his unswerving fidelity, his indomitable courage, his independence, and his patriotism. I need not tell you, gentlemen, that he was a true friend of the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association. He was a close companion of many of its older members who, too, have slipped beyond the veil, where we feel this glorious night they mingle in happy communion (as I have heard Dale Crittenberger say so often at these meetings) "in that Valhalla where all good Democrats go when they die."

One of my first impressions was the genuine affection with which the Senate regarded another of its Members from Indiana. Distinguished Senators, friends of Indiana, who have campaigned for us here in Indiana so often, like BARKLEY, of Kentucky, TYDINGS, of Maryland, WAGNER, of New York, O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, and LUCAS, of Illinois, will never understand why Indiana failed to return "Shay" Minton to Washington in 1940. That was a dark day for the Senate and for the electorate of Indiana. His learned colleagues saw in him a strange mixture of the line-plunger and the statesman. They tell me they wept bitter tears and were unashamed that day when they watched him close his desk for the last time and disappear through the familiar swinging doors of that beloved Chamber.

The fact is, Indiana far outruns its reasonable quota of leaders furnished to the official life of Washington. Wherever I have been in the District and in whatever company, I have been proud to come from a State which has produced Claude Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture, Paul V. McNutt, War Manpower Commissioner, M. Clifford Townsend, former Assistant Director of Agriculture, Walter Myers, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and all the others there whose names are so well known to you all as exponents of the Hoosier democracy.

My mind, though, as you might suspect, turns again and again to another son of Indiana—modest and retiring, but the peer of Indiana's best—one might say facetiously, the man for whom after all that Senate seat is being warmed—Governor Henry F. Schricker. I fear my praises of him down there added little to his fame. Far outrunning me was his reputation for honesty, courage, common sense, and brilliant poise in the presence of adversity. Governor Schricker, the United States Senate awaits your coming with eager and open arms.

On my arrival in Washington I found administration leaders engaged in a valiant fight to procure for the men and women in our armed forces a simple, direct, and constitutionally sound method of voting for President, Vice President, Senators, and Congressmen. In that struggle the opposition of the reactionary minority was not founded upon a conviction of the unsoundness of the bill, but upon the fear that the soldier, by means of the unified Federal ballot, might find too free an opportunity to vote for the man he wanted as commander in chief.

Mr. HOLMAN, the distinguished Senator from Oregon, spokesman for the opposition, declared in the debate, on the floor, and it is in the RECORD, that if only Roosevelt would withdraw himself from the race, they would pass the Federal ballot law in thirty minutes. At every turn of its tortuous journey, I cast your vote for the Green-Lucas bill.

It is all over now, but the Old Guard leadership can never escape the fact that it was willing to and did adopt as its own, poll tax, registration, white supremacy principles, long since outmoded and repudiated by the Congress and the people, in order to deny to our absent hero voters the chance of a simple, easy, and direct Federal ballot. This should be remembered by all lovers of justice when our present senior Senator comes back in 1946 for a renewal of his commission.

No Senator with fewer than two votes on each question could satisfy everyone all the time. Just prior to my appointment, I had been indulging the hope with reference to the older of my two soldier sons, now a combat casualty replacement infantryman out in the Pacific, that somehow I might help to lighten his tasks. I suppose every parent, without challenge to his patriotism, has a right to hope, and to help to save his boy or girl from the heavier burden, the greatest sacrifice. It is so natural to do so. Yet after I took my oath of office, I realized my own parental ambitions were in violent collision with a higher duty—to my State—to that flag. So I could turn not a hand, but only commit his safety to the Almighty. I love my party, too, and when my loyalty to it comes into irreconcilable conflict with the paramount obligation, I pray I may always have strength enough to reach the same conclusion and render the same kind of verdict.

We are in an election year, sad and disturbing as that fact may be. But such things are necessary and of the very essence of the democracy for which we wage war.

I look around me here tonight and see President Smith and the president-elect, Fred Bays, State chairman, Mrs. Bingham, State chairwoman, Frank McHale, national committeeman, and Mrs. Ralston, national committeewoman, and all these other party leaders. A party needs harmony more than money, enthusiasm more than resources. I know our party under the leadership of Bob Hannegan is in safe hands here at home. And I have faith in the press as represented by the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association. With what compelling power the copybook maxims come back across the years. A free press is a requisite to a free people. On the anvil of public discussion, the spark of truth is struck. By the truth do we live and prevail. Gentlemen, for your forthrightness, fearlessness, insight, and persistence, we who are your guests are profoundly appreciative.

Five weeks ago tonight, in this very room, the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio, ROBERT A. TAFT, opened the political campaign in Indiana by delivering a speech to the Indiana Republican Editorial Association banquet. It was one of those "How long" speeches. Stripped of its false assumptions of fact, the Senator's speech included this question, in substance, "How long should we keep the Democratic Party in Washington?" There is an answer to that question.

How long? Until the escutcheons of this Government shall have been cleansed of the debauchery of the administration of Warren G. Harding.

How long? Until the economic and financial structures of this Republic shall have been healed of the rampant and unchecked pirating during the do-nothing administration of Calvin Coolidge.

How long? Until the last farmer, businessman, and worker shall have been made whole of the devastation wrought by the unfortunate and unsung administration of Herbert Hoover, the great engineer.

How long? Until that permanent peace promised to the heroes of World War No. 1 shall have been kept in spirit and in truth.

How long? Until all these high ends can be reached or until the people have lost their faith in the possibility of their accomplishment, for there is not a mustard seed of hope for their achievement in the capacities of Mr. Dewey.

One of the most spectacular events ever to occur on the floor of the Senate was Senator Barkley's now-famous address. He played a single dramatic role with the United States Congress as his theater, the whole civilized world as his audience. This was a part of nothing more than a political incident, concluded in a few hours. Yet within that time this event, because its implications were adverse to the President of the United States, skyrocketed Axis morale.

If this passing occurrence could accomplish that result, it is frightening to speculate the damage to the Allied effort if the party in power should be removed completely and with finality now in the midst of the conflict. No political speculation, not even Senator TAFT'S, can escape this overwhelming factor.

They say a change of administration would not impair the war effort, but already we have a forecast of the tragic cost involved in changing the war-time administration.

We were impressed with Mr. Willkie's spectacular withdrawal from the Presidential contest. The results of the Wisconsin primary have been construed, at least by a part of the press, as a repudiation of Mr. Willkie's firm international policies, and a victory for the tenets of isolationism. That was only 10 days ago. Already, encouraged by this turn of political events, scheming men urge a general slackening of the European war effort, and most flagrant of all, a Congressman from our own state openly advocates the abandonment of the war against the Axis. Think of it. What do you think that does to the mercury in the Nazi morale thermometer?

Yes, a change would play into the hands of the Nazi propagandists—with deathly result. That the Axis powers despair of survival is assured. They are fighting through 1944 in the hope that there will be a political upset in the United States next November, sufficient to remove the present administration from power. The Nazis hope they may get something less than unconditional surrender from some other administration.

A change would mean, at least, interruption. It would mean, inevitably, some change of plan—perhaps in the grand strategy itself. It would mean a change of surgeons in the midst of the operation. The sharp scalpel, the delicate hemostat, the deadly anesthesia, would pass from trained hands and cool heads to what hands and what heads, no one knows. Who would select the successors of General "Ike" Eisenhower, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, and Admiral Nimitz, and on what basis?

This war is not being fought by the members of any one political party. When a Jap sniper draws a bead on a Marine in an island jungle, he can't see a campaign button. War and partisan politics cannot mix.

Recognizing this fact President Roosevelt gave many of the most important war posts to prominent Republicans. Mr. Henry Stimson, Secretary of State under President Hoover, and Secretary of War under President Taft, was made Secretary of War. Col. Frank Knox, who had been the Republican candidate for Vice President in 1936, was made Secretary of the Navy. Judge Robert Patterson, a Republican, was made Under Secretary of War, and placed in charge of the entire procurement program for the Army, and a long list of Republican industrialists and businessmen have been placed in key war positions, clothed with ample powers.

From a pacific nation in 1940 we have become the strongest military power on earth in 1944. The United States of America has accomplished more in 3½ years than the combined military and naval achievements of the Japs in half a century, and the Nazis in a decade.

This is the result of Democrats and Republicans having peeled off their partisan coats, and going to work in their American shirt sleeves. But it has been achieved under Democratic leadership. If the American electorate is to act upon the principal that a political party is to be rewarded for its leadership, then no justification appears to support a change in 1944.

What about the writing of the peace? At the peace table Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek will be grasping each for his own post-war advantage. The people want our representative to have an equal chance—to be big enough to hold his own. If anyone in this country can mention the name of one man who gives promise of doing this job for the American people more effectively than Franklin D. Roosevelt, the whole country will be indebted to him. In him is to be found a combination of knowledge and fervor rising to the heights of the growing soul of America, and matching the sublimity of our prayers for a just and durable peace. He knows the men with whom we shall have to deal. He knows the forces which will be brought into play. He has an enthusiasm for the field. The welfare of the United States—and in fact the welfare of the world—are at stake in the planning of the peace, and the best is none too good for the United States of America.

Is our party to be removed at the cost of losing the services of this great world statesman, just to place in power another political party? Some there are like Job who lament the fact that this man and this need meet on the threshold of a fourth term instead of that of a first or second, but of such unexpected combinations of fact is the grim business of history.

One thing is sure—the people of the United States do not want Gerald L. K. Smith, or anybody like him, representing us at the peace table when this war is over.

Some say that a change of administration will not affect the peace prospects either, but let us recall clear historical proof to the contrary.

The election of 1918 went against President Wilson following his request for a Democratic Congress. This was the first and irretrievable step in the defeat of the treaty, the ratification of which, through the League of Nations, had potentialities sufficient to have prevented World War II. The change of world outlook and policy effected by the psychological ultimates of that simple political fact ruined the peace prospects in 1920. If we change administrations, we change policy, and we may expect to see our dreams come tumbling down upon us, the wreckage of what might have been the cathedral of a just and durable peace.

Is it of the very essence of this world and man's nature that he is doomed to an everlasting status of recurring wars? I do not believe it. We have mustered strength enough to win a war; we must muster wisdom enough to capture peace.

Here, let me say, Governor Schricker rose to lofty heights of statesmanship in his message to the special session of the general assembly. The seed fell upon barren ground. Those who have tried unsuccessfully heretofore to guillotine the office of governor betrayed the voters in two respects. They refused to recognize the Federal ballot for the soldier and they refused to keep the polls open on next election day from 6 to 8. In time of war, when every war-production hour is precious to victory, either war industries will be compelled to curtail production or workers will be disfranchised. As I have said with regard to the loss of peace, so I say to labor. If you change the administration at Washington, you will lose for half a century your legitimate gains for the last 12 years.

Sitting in the Senate Chamber, I sometimes realize I can look down upon the very spot where the best prospect for peace this old world ever had, was killed. There are the bloodstains from the sacrifice. It was a sacrifice to the gods of partisan greed; and that by unhallowed hands. One can feel the chill of the four horsemen of the apocalypse, riding out of nowhere, and dashing again back through the dark recesses of that same Chamber screaming like frustrated vampires, in search of that, which, found, would give them liberation and rest.

Unprinted in the Senate record, but none the less real, are the voices from Flanders fields, moaning that the torch they threw their statesmen was doused in the filthy vats of party hate. The Lodges and the Watsons were not above striking down peace hopes for a partisan gain. Their modern prototypes are not above the same murderous blow for the same unholy cause. I pray the United States Senate may be redeemed of this assassination, and that right early—that from that sepulcher where she now lies slain, peace may rise, resurrected in the sunrise of man's new day—that they who lingered longest in her defense be the first to greet her on the morn.

Our administration must hold the winning of the war first before its eyes like the saint the cross in the presence of temptation. The war must come first, the peace second, and the reconversion third. These concepts must never lose that order, neither among themselves, nor in their relationship to less essential concerns.

America will win this war no matter who is elected. It is a question as to who can win it quickest and with least loss of life.

Our party spokesman must simplify the message. The voters are weary of their labors and their excitements. Their minds are upon their sons and daughters far from home. They have no stomach for fine-spun political theories nor sophisticated approaches. They are too tired and too busy. The message must be made crystal clear, simple, and brief. It must be made to be easy to listen to. We must resolutely, fearlessly, consistently, and universally advance three propositions—that our leadership is best for the continuation of the direction of the war effort; that we are best equipped to represent the American people at the peace table with Messrs. Churchill, Stalin, and Chang Kai-shek; that this administration is best to bring to full fruition that restoration which must follow the return of 10,000,000 veterans.

Over and above all this, we must remember that the people have a distaste for facing the disagreeable aspects of a political campaign in the midst of war. They are in no humor to be pushed around nor oversold like yokels gaping before a circus barker. Our men at arms will brook no needless partisan politics while there is a war to be won. This is a danger signal for any political party that bickers.

We shall win in 1944 because the peculiar circumstances of the case compel it. But let me hasten to warn that no Democrat must seek in these circumstances any narrow partisan gratification. This year we fight for America, not for party. Every worker should be touched with the livid fire of high conviction that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the most valuable individual public servant in the world today, and that to retain his party in power until the job is done is a noble cause.

This campaign must be pitched to the tone of the American faith that the Atlantic Charter is a monument to liberty and the "four freedoms," a vehicle of human hope. Let us walk humbly before the people, remembering that America's greatest crisis is at hand during this year, this campaign, and at this election.

Without any malice toward those who disagree with us, let us welcome men and women of all parties to share in this American cause. In the simplest everyday life of the worker, the farmer, and the housewife, there is no dearth of inspiration to this noble and patriotic effort. Stimuli are all about us. Sometimes I ride a crowded streetcar from my hotel to Capitol Hill. In an advertisement I see two manikin-like faces, man and woman, solemn, resigned, patient, with beseeching eyes turned toward Heaven. The legend reads, "With all of us doing our part to the best of our ability, may the spirit and strength of the American people carry on in 1944."

Address by Representative Coffee of Washington, to Federation of Citizens' Associations, District of Columbia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by Hon. JOHN M. COFFEE, a Representative in Congress from the State of Washington and chairman of the District of Columbia Appropriations Subcommittee of the House of Representatives, to the thirty-fourth anniversary dinner of the Federation of Citizens' Association of the District of Columbia, at the American Legion Hall, Washington, D. C., Saturday evening, April 22, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Even in peacetime there is a considerable amount of business transacted, as you know, on Capitol Hill, but I am confident that it would be difficult for you to comprehend the manifold duties and responsibilities placed upon Members of Congress during wartime. Notwithstanding that heavy burden, however, I am persuaded that all Members of Congress are very vitally interested in District of Columbia affairs. They realize that this is the Nation's Capital, and that this city is a city set apart for all of our people.

I have been profoundly interested in the history of this District and in the determination of the Continental Congress and the Congress of the United States to locate a city where the Congress would not be harassed by the failure of a State government or a local government to afford facilities and adequate protection for its Members. The District of Columbia has a very interesting political background.

The present form of commission government was established in 1874, and under it three Commissioners, two of whom are appointed by the President for 3 years subject to confirmation by the United States Senate, and one detailed by the War Department of the United States Corps of Engineers, are the principal municipal officers.

Under the government existing prior to 1874, the town of Alexandria, the county of Alexandria, the town of Georgetown, the county of Washington, and the city of Washington had their fair share of both political and financial scandals, but since 1874 the District government has been practically free of all such scandals.

It is important for us to consider this item when we are thinking in terms of forms of government. This city has had a constant growth, and today more than 800,000 live within the area we are now considering. A large number of this group are Federal employees who maintain their voting privileges, but that other and larger group obey laws they have no part in making, pay taxes they have no part in voting for, and are governed by individuals whom other people have voted for and sent to this city. The records will disclose that many thousands of your young men are now on the far-flung battle fronts ready to fight, to bleed, and perhaps to die for the preservation of this democracy—men free-born, fine citizens in every respect who have never had the privilege of casting a vote for any local or public official.

It would certainly appear to me that even though the Congress may jealously want to hold its exclusive jurisdiction over the affairs of the District of Columbia, it could not in justice further withhold from your citizens some limited voting representation in Congress and among the electors for President and Vice President.

We of the Appropriations Committee feel a deep sense of appreciation of the very keen interest your associations are manifesting in District affairs. We have found your recommendations to be of very great value, for we know that you desire a high standard of service for this community, and a high degree of efficiency on the part of those who are employed to render the service. The budget which we will consider determines the city's "community standard of living," and even though you are presently without a vote, it is certainly altogether proper for you to help to determine the standard.

During World War I, the annual District Budget approximated $18,000,000. Today that amount would not go far. The budget that we are called upon to consider today approximates 67 millions. I am advised that the total value of all taxable real estate in the District is in excess of $1,300,000,000. At a tax rate of $1.75, this produces a revenue of 22 millions, more than the annual budget of 1917.

There are about 160,000 separate parcels and lots in this District, which apparently are steadily increasing in value. The tangible personal property tax, the income tax, the corporation tax, the gasoline tax, the automobile tax, and the more than 32,000 licenses issued annually give us the revenue for appropriating purposes. The appropriations by Congress from this revenue, plus the Federal payment, are apportioned among the various departments and agencies of the District government for the benefit of this city. Our problem is to allocate these funds wisely, so that one department will not suffer at the expense of another.

It is frequently said that we should bear the responsibilities for certain failures because we failed to appropriate sufficient funds for a certain department or agency. However, you must bear in mind that we can only appropriate to the extent of revenue availability. If you desire expanded programs, then you must be prepared to meet a larger tax burden. Personally, I think it ony fair that those who live in the city, and who pay taxes, should be the ones whose expressions should receive the most consideration.

The Federal Government owns approximately 41 percent of the total land of the District of Columbia, exclusive of streets and alleys. It also has title to all the original streets and alleys lying within the boundaries of the original city of Washington, which generally speaking, is that area lying between Florida Avenue and the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers. In addition to tax exemption, the Federal Government is furnished water without charge, and is not assessed for special improvements, such as curb and gutter, sidewalk, alley paving, sewer and water mains.

For all of this the Federal Government pays to the municipal government $6,000,000 annually. You think that this amount should be increased, and for your information I might advise you that there are a number on Capitol Hill who feel the same way about it.

You have a vast and complicated business organization in this municipal government with its 70 departments, divisions, and agencies, and when you consider that the residents of this city paid $73,576,233 in Federal income taxes in 1942, an amount which exceeded the payment of each of 28 States, you can appreciate the fact that any material changes made should be based on well-studied long-range planning, because we are constantly growing numerically and financially.

Members of my committee and I have visited District institutions, and we have knowledge of some of the pressing needs, and I want to assure the citizens of this community that we will do all in our power to make this the most efficient and the best municipal government in the world. Your help and your advice is earnestly solicited.

At the beginning of hostilities, we were somewhat disturbed about how the war would affect local financial problems. It was thought that government reductions in the sale of gasoline and appliances of all sorts would materially affect income and although there has been a set-back in some items, the local financial outlook is quite satisfactory.

This year, for the first time in 13 years, it is quite possible that you will be free of debt. It may be that we will find some funds to invest in Federal securities for Capital improvements at a later date. We want to be in a sound condition to go ahead when the war needs are met and manpower is available.

The Budget problem is an all-year one, and just as soon as testimony is finished for 1945, estimating will begin for 1946. We are glad to give our time and attention to District affairs, for after all Washington is our home.

Montgomery Ward Seizure—Excerpts From Address by Leon Henderson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an excerpt from a radio address delivered by Mr. Leon Henderson on Saturday, April 29.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I said last week that Montgomery Ward would be taken over by the Government unless Sewell Avery obeyed the War Labor Board order. I was not quite prepared, however, for the picture of the week this would produce: That of Sewell Avery being carted bodily from his plant by soldiers. I don't know why I should have been surprised because Mr. Avery has a long record of opposition to the Government, and it was just a matter of time until a violent clash occurred. I was on the Government side myself in several instances.

I recall very vividly during N. R. A. when Montgomery Ward served notice on me that they were preparing to violate the law. I had some trouble later with illegal catalog prices that were higher than O. P. A. ceiling prices. In both cases Montgomery Ward was the only company in the industry to openly defy the authority of law.

* * * * *

There are questions of the rights of private companies and they are present to a degree warranting observation by Congress and the courts. But I wish these issues, if they had to arise, could have come up clean of Sewell Avery's belligerence. The very fact that most all other companies in the United States have found it possible to get along with their Government in these difficult times and have subordinated strong feelings is some proof that Montgomery Ward is an especially difficult customer.

The Government could not dodge the Montgomery Ward case without abject abdication. Montgomery Ward refused to extend the life of its old labor contract, claiming that the union did not have a majority. As a matter of fact, under National Labor Relations Board rulings the employer is not entitled to raise the question of whether a union has a majority for bargaining purposes unless there are two unions claiming jurisdiction. After the National Labor Relations Board certifies a union as a bargaining agency, that union is the bargaining agency until there is a new election requested by workers.

Because the Montgomery Ward case had been so disagreeable, a new election was ordered even though there was no other union, and the workers had not asked for it. As the Washington Star points out, all that Montgomery Ward had to do was continue the old contract as directed by the War Labor Board and wait to see what the new election showed. From one standpoint Sewell Avery's contention that the union does not represent a majority is a most curious shift. Last year, when the maintenance of membership was the issue, he fought the W. L. B.'s ruling because he claimed it would result in a closed shop. After a year he has turned completely around and now claims that the union is all washed up.

The matter is of more importance than whether one company can defy the Government. If Montgomery Ward got away with refusal to renew a contract on the claim that a certified union no longer had a majority, then war production and civilian production would be interrupted. Many unions, for example, the mine workers, will not continue work if there is no contract. In the interest of stable relations, with other companies watching the result, the Government had to meet Montgomery Ward head-on.

Unless new disputes arise with Montgomery Ward, the Government should be able to relinquish control of the plant as soon as the new elections are held and let the courts decide points of law.

Competitive Bidding in Issuance and Sale of Railroad Securities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter addressed by me to the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission dealing with the private sale of railroad securities with commissions to bankers.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 28, 1944.

Hon. WILLIAM J. PATTERSON,
Chairman, Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PATTERSON: Two cases now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission emphatically demonstrate the imperative need for the immediate adoption of competitive bidding in the issuance and sale of all new railroad securities.

One case is the proposal of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad to sell, privately, to insurance companies, $30,000,000 of collateral trust bonds and to pay the New York investment banking firm of Morgan Stanley & Co. the outrageous fee of $75,000 for alleged advice and assistance to the railroad on the sale.

The other case is the proposal of the Pennsylvania Railroad to make a private sale of $35,000,000 of its Pennsylvania Co. subsidiary's notes to a group of insurance companies and banks, and to pay the New York investment banking company, Kuhn Loeb & Co., the outrageous sum of $87,500 for alleged assistance on the sale.

These roads have their own financial experts in their employ. They have telephones. By using the telephone for a few hours they could have sold these gilt-edged securities to the people who are now buying them, without making a gift of the stockholders' money to these banking houses. The railroads' legal and financial experts could have carried this transaction through without any aid from these people.

In the currently proposed Pennsylvania financing, the Equitable Life has agreed to purchase $10,000,000 of notes and this same insurance company is to be the purchaser of $14,000,000 of the proposed Burlington bonds. The only difference this time is that Morgan Stanley and Kuhn Loeb have prevailed on the railroad officials to cut them in on the business.

Had there been a competitive bidding requirement in effect when the Pennsylvania and Burlington officials first contemplated this financing, the question of these scandalous fees would never have arisen, and Kuhn Loeb and Morgan Stanley would have been in the business as prospective bidders on a fair and equal footing with all others, or not at all.

As it is, the Interstate Commerce Commission has only one honest course open to it—that is to disallow the proposed payments to Morgan Stanley and Kuhn Loeb, and to adopt a competitive bidding requirement so that no railroad or banking house may ever again have the effrontery to suggest this reckless dissipation of railroad stockholders' money in needless and exorbitant banker fees.

The financing transactions of American railroads by these banking houses and their control has undoubtedly had a great deal to do and been responsible for the sordid history of railroad financing.

Yours sincerely,

HENRIK SHIPSTEAD.

Payment in Kind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], who is unavoidably absent today, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Payment in Kind," from the Capital Journal of Salem, Oreg., of April 27, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAYMENT IN KIND

For political services rendered in the past, President Roosevelt has again rewarded the C. I. O. with a political favor, although he has been compelled to prostitute the exercise of his war powers to do so. For in directing the Army to seize and turn over to the Secretary of Commerce for operation the Chicago mail-order plant and retail store of Montgomery Ward & Co., the Chief Executive has clearly exceeded the authority conferred upon him by the Constitution or the Emergency War Powers Act.

The authority under which the President professes to be acting in this instance empowers him to take over and operate in the name of the Government any business or industry essential to the efficient prosecution of the war which is being either grossly mismanaged, or which is failing to render normal and satisfactory service.

Neither of these shortcomings can be aptly or truthfully attributed to Ward's, nor can the seized properties by any stretch of the imagination be construed as essential to the war effort. At least its employees, as such, are not favored for deferment under selective-service rules and regulations. So far as its essentiality to the winning of the war is concerned, Ward's is just another private retail business enterprise, struggling along as best it can under the handicaps of labor and merchandise shortages incident to the times, but plagued with more than its share of interference by bumptious bureaucrats. If it can be seized because, as President Roosevelt has charged, labor disputes and strikes interfere with the distribution of essential goods, then any business in the country which has labor trouble can be similarly taken over by the Government.

Granting for the sake of argument that Ward's is a war-essential business, why should the President assess all of the blame for interference with distribution upon the company and none upon the striking employees?

The answer is obvious. Ward's had the courage—in the interests of its independent employees—to defy the administration's sacred cow of organized labor as represented by the War Labor Board in refusing to recognize the C. I. O. as the bargaining agency of its employees until an election had been held to determine whether the union was choice of a majority of the employees as their bargaining agency. The company also refused to be a party to a contract making a maintenance-of-union-membership clause retroactive, which would have subjected employees who had voluntarily quit the union since December 8, 1943, to discharge.

Five months have elapsed since the company proposed an election or card check to determine whether the C. I. O. was the bargaining choice of a majority of the employees without any action on the proposal by the union or the W. L. B. Meanwhile the union members remained on strike until a few days ago, when they were ordered back to work to pave the way for the President's arbitrary action. The only interruption in the company's service to its customers, however, was occasioned by action of the Post Office Department in support of the strike in withdrawing 70 postal clerks from the mail-order house, where they had been maintained for 30 years, and in refusing to deliver incoming prepaid parcels to Ward's.

Such flagrant bias toward labor and such arbitrary abuse of administrative and executive authority as have marked the entire history of the Montgomery Ward case are without precedent even in the annals of the New Deal. Political motives alone can explain them.

Marine Pvt. Carlyle W. Vorachek

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Hardy North Dakotan Survives Bomber Crash, 11 Days on Raft," dealing with Marine Pvt. Carlyle W. (Mike) Vorachek, of Garrison, N. D., published in the Minneapolis Tribune, of February 19, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARDY NORTH DAKOTAN SURVIVES BOMBER CRASH, 11 DAYS ON RAFT

SOUTH PACIFIC HEADQUARTERS.—Marine Pvt. Carlyle W. (Mike) Vorachek, 19, Garrison, N. Dak., turret gunner on a torpedo bomber which was downed January 29, 3 miles off Rabaul, New Britain Island, spent 11 days in a liferaft in South Pacific waters and returned to his squadron following his discharge from the hospital.

A dispatch from Sgt. Dan Bailey, Atlanta, Ga., a marine correspondent on Bougainville, said Vorachek lost 26 pounds and was severely sunburned but otherwise was well.

Vorachek's plane crashed into the water, possibly killing the radioman and the pilot.

Vorachek himself did not know how he survived.

He extracted the liferaft from the wreckage and found only 6 cans of water and 6 cans of pemmican.

He rowed the whole afternoon in an effort to get away from New Britain. That night a storm overturned the raft but Vorachek had his food and water lashed down.

The pemmican proved a total loss for every time Vorachek ate it he became violently thirsty. Having no tackle, he had to content himself with watching sharks and other fish which swam alongside his raft.

On his ninth day afloat he ate a raw turtle which he caught barehanded.

Vorachek said that on seven occasions patrols flew over without seeing him. Eventually the current carried him within a few miles of Buka and at noon on February 10, a marine fighter sighted him. A few hours later a Navy flying boat picked him up.

He was taken to the hospital where he spent 3 days eating all they had to offer. Vorachek has now rejoined his squadron.

Isolation and Appeasement or a New League of Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED GOSSETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, problem No. 1 in the mind of every honest American is to win the war as quickly as possible with the smallest possible loss of American lives. When this is done, problem No. 1 unquestionably will become the winning of the peace.

Wars may be inevitable, but certainly we would be stupid and depraved if we did not use every honorable means to avoid and minimize the evils of international conflict. Only chains and slavery can be worse than war. At the end of this conflict, as at the end of the last one, people will instinctively cry from anguished hearts, "It must never happen again."

The highways and byways leading directly and indirectly to peace and war have never been clearly marked. It is evident, however, that our usual roads of travel have led always into war.

In efforts to avoid war men have tried many things. First they built great walls against hostile foes. Almost from the beginning we have had offensive and defensive alliances between races. Secret treaties and balances of power in myriad forms have been tried for centuries. The greatest leagues to enforce peace were the Holy Alliance of 1815 and the League of Nations of 1919. Both expressed high principles and noble purposes, yet both failed from lack of worthy leadership. It is said the League was born of American ideals and destroyed by American politics. In his last public address on Armistice Day 1923, Woodrow Wilson, speaking of America's repudiation of the League and of her withdrawal into sullen and selfish isolation, made the ominous prediction:

> This must always be a source of deep mortification to us, and we shall inevitably be forced by the moral obligations of freedom and honor to retrieve that fatal error and assume once more the role of courage, self-respect, and helpfulness which every true American must wish to regard as our natural part in the affairs of the world.

Not relying upon the League for security, between World War No. 1 and No. 2, the nations of the earth entered into hundreds of treaties and alliances. In lieu of adherence to the League, America sponsored and concluded two major world agreements. The first was the Washington Naval Limitations Agreement of 1922, as a result of which we sank a number of completed and near-completed ships while other adherents sank blueprints only. The second was the Briand-Kellogg Peace Pact of 1928 in which the nations renounced war as an instrument of national policy and agreed to submit their differences to arbitration. In addition to these agreements we sought to protect ourselves with extensive neutrality acts. Armament limitations agreements, arbitration agreements, and neutrality legislation gave us a false sense of security. We aggravated these mistakes by adopting tragic and fallacious policies of isolation and appeasement. The democracies practiced appeasement when Japan entered Manchuria in 1931. Appeasement was tried on Mussolini when he entered Ethiopia in 1935. As a final inglorious act of appeasement Czechoslovakia was thrown to the Nazi dogs in 1938. To the appeasers and to the isolationists we cite all of human history, both sacred and profane. Friendship and respect cannot be bought by appeasement—they are not subject to sale. Isolation, too, is a myth and a delusion.

What are the alternatives to these discredited policies? What are the antidotes for these past mistakes?

First, henceforth, and forever, America must remain the strongest Nation in the world. Twice within 25 years barbaric aggressors have thought first that they could bluff us, or second that they could whip us. We must make sure that potential enemies do not again fall into this error.

Aside from military strength, thousands of post-war plans and proposals are now being offered. Today every religious and patriotic society in America has passed resolutions on the subject. Most of our leading citizens have given public expression to their hopes and aspirations. Among specific proposals have been those for hemispheric alliances; the creation of zones of influence, dominated by great powers, such as Great Britain in Europe, Russia in Asia, and America in the Western Hemisphere; an alliance of the English-speaking peoples; a union between Great Britain and America; a four-power pact or alliance between Britain, America, Russia, and China; a perpetuation of the United Nations as a world security organization; and others.

Notwithstanding disagreement on specific proposals, our societies, our organizations, and our Government now urge some form of post-war collaboration. Both branches of the Congress, the Secretary of State, and the President of the United States have gone on record in this matter. The House adopted the Fulbright resolution by a vote of 360 to 29. The Senate passed the Connally resolution by a vote of 85 to 5. Both resolutions were positive declarations favoring American participation in some form of world organization for the prevention of war and the preservation of peace. Upon his return from the Moscow Conference Secretary of State Cordell Hull said:

> As the provisions of the Four Nation Declaration are carried into effect, there will no longer be need for spheres of influence, for alliances, for balances of power, or any other of the special arrangements through which in the unhappy past the nations strove to safeguard their security or promote their interests.

Thus the long shadow of Woodrow Wilson falls across our continent. The spirit of the idealist, who they said lived 100 years ahead of his time, seems to walk again in the land. In all of the welter of confusion and debate a long finger seems to point back to the ashes of the League.

Notwithstanding this overwhelming sentiment in public and private life for Amercian participation in some world association for the preservation of peace, there is grave danger that history may again repeat itself. When once the war is over many good Americans, sick of foreign folk and foreign ways and foreign places, will simply want to relax and forget it. America may again succumb to the sincere and insincere cries of those who say we can live within our borders and unto ourselves. The appeasers and the isolationists will have fertile soil in which to plant their seeds of false security. Bitterness and resentment over both domestic and foreign politics and policies will tend to confuse and divide us. The tempting line of least resistance will be to do nothing.

To all of these people, and to those who will again attempt to write the peace, that solemn poem written by Alfred Noyes at the end of World War No. 1 is more than ever in point:

They have no pact to sign—our peaceful dead;
Pacts are for trembling hands and heads grown gray;
Ten million graves record what youth has said,
And cannot now unsay.

They have no pact to sign—our quiet dead,
Whose eyes in that eternal sleep are drowned;
Age doubts, and wakes, and asks if night be fled,
But youth sleeps sound.

They have no pact to sign—our faithful dead;
Theirs is a deeper pledge, unseen, unheard,
Sealed in the dark, unwritten, sealed in red,
And they will keep their word.

They have no pact to sign—our noble dead;
But if, O God, if we, should sign in vain,
With dreadful eyes out of each narrow bed
Our dead will rise again.

The Fourth Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 2 (legislative day of Wednesday, April 12), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. J. Franklin Carter before the Cleveland City Club at Cleveland, Ohio, April 29.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Eighty years—three full generations of American life—have passed since this country has held a Presidential election in time of war. Such an election is the acid test of national character and the key to national destiny. What the American people decide next November not only will determine their future, but may decide the future of the whole world.

The world is suffering from a tremendous economic, and social, and racial upheaval. The upheaval is so vast that in the realm of politics it can only be called a political earthquake. Now there are no rules on how to behave in an earthquake, and every man reacts to the shock according to his own nature. Some throw the china out the window and gently carry the bed pillows downstairs. Others get panic-stricken or turn into gibbering idiots. Still others turn out and help fight the fires and rescue the injured. It is on them that the safety of the community depends. Yet no one can say in advance which group will keep calm and be helpful and which will go temporarily crazy. So with the political earthquake which this country is going to experience this summer.

Therefore it is only fair to assume that none of the rules of the grand old game of politics as played in peacetime America will necessarily hold true in 1944. The election of 1864 is our only historical parallel, and as in geometry, so in politics the important thing about parallels is that they never meet. All that we know is that Lincoln, who was triumphantly and overwhelmingly reelected in November, believed in August that he might be defeated by his opponent—and Lincoln was, among other things, a very shrewd politician. In any case, it is safe for us to assume that the election of 1944 will not follow any convenient pattern and that the advance publicity of this—the greatest show on earth—will give little idea of what will happen under the Big Tent.

To begin with, I think that most Americans assume that the two candidates will be President Roosevelt—nominated for an unprecedented fourth term—and Governor Dewey, of New York, who seems to be far ahead in the race for the Republican nomination. It is still too early to pick the Vice Presidential nominees with any assurance. Dewey's running mate might be Governor Bricker, of Ohio, Governor Warren, of California, or any one of a whole stable of political dark horses. Mr. Roosevelt might repeat with HENRY WALLACE or—as some have dared to suggest—might team up with Wendell L. Willkie, or he might go still further afield or stay still closer to home.

The reasons for Governor Dewey's availability are obvious. He is young, able, and has made a good record as prosecutor of gangsters in New York City. He has carried the traditionally Democratic State of New York—President Roosevelt's home State—for the first time since 1920. And he is an able and resourceful politician with strong backing and the ability to get votes.

In the case of President Roosevelt, it seems pretty clear that, whatever his personal wishes might be, he is now the prisoner of the events which he has helped to direct and of the social and political forces which he has mobilized. He is no more free to lay aside his leadership of those forces or his association with those events than the engineer of a locomotive going downgrade at high speed is free to take his hand off the throttle and announce that he is going to take a snooze in the caboose. Not only is President Roosevelt the prisoner of his party but that party in turn is the prisoner of the same forces which called it into being and which gave it a special mandate in 1940 to defend America against our foreign enemies.

Let us move, then, from candidates to parties and consider the picture of American politics in 1944. Both parties are split rather seriously along lines of conviction and interest. The conservative southern Democrats are opposed to the New Deal Democrats. The isolationist Republicans are opposed to the Willkie Republicans. I will not elaborate on this point, except to say that here is a possibility of rather wide and sweeping changes in the final line-up of the electorate. For a time, it seemed possible that the Harry Byrd and Harry Woodring Democrats would go Republican. It is still uncertain whether the Willkie Republicans will vote Democratic.

Both parties and both candidates labor under serious liabilities. Both, in turn, can count on rather impressive assets. Let's take a look at the balance sheet and see what a preaudit will suggest.

Governor Dewey has in his favor the widespread impatience if not war-weariness of the American people. Rationing, manpower, selective service, taxes, and the numerous regulations by which the Congress has tried to adjust the country to the needs of total war—all these have created resentment, especially as the usual number of inevitable mistakes have been made as a result of trying to deal with novel problems by inexperienced officials.

Also in favor of the Republicans is the fact that the older group of voters—especially the farmers and businessmen—tend to support the G. O. P. The chief elements of Roosevelt's traditional strength—the younger people and labor—are largely deprived of an effective vote this year. That is to say, the Army and Navy, under the so-called Soldier's Voting Act, will not vote in proportion to the number of young men and women in the armed forces. The migration of labor into war industries has robbed many workers of their regular voting residence and has planted them in new communities with whose political issues and personalities the war workers are unfamiliar. This set of facts gives to the Republican Party a real windfall which they lacked in earlier elections.

On the other side of the Republican ledger we can set down some of the liabilities.

First, it can be taken for granted that every pro-Nazi in America will vote Republican this year and that every isolationist will vote Republican this year, and that all the forces of sedition and defeatism—in their hatred of Roosevelt—will vote Republican this year.

Second, it is open to doubt that the parents and wives of fighting Americans will—despite their age and property—vote Republican en masse. Most informal checks on the political sentiments of our armed forces suggest that the servicemen are overwhelmingly pro-Roosevelt. To the extent to which the wives and parents of fighting Americans consider themselves trustees for their men in the armed forces, they will tend to vote for Roosevelt.

Third, Governor Dewey will have the support of the same financial and industrial groups which have opposed rather indiscriminately the entire course of events in America for the last 12 years. Many Americans automatically vote for anyone whom these men oppose.

There are other items on both sides of the Republican ledger but these are enough to chew on.

You will notice that I have not said anything about human rights as against property rights. That issue is out, because property rights are the human rights—salted down—of the older generation, while human rights are the younger generation's bid for property rights. Generally speaking, the Republican Party has become property-minded to the extent that it represents the older generation while the Democratic Party has renewed itself in the name of human rights by seeking to promote the property rights of the younger group of Americans. Most of these distinctions, however, are being wiped out by the war itself, which tends to sacrifice the human rights of the young and the property rights of the old. Putting it bluntly, we do not count the cost in money when our sons go out to defend us with their lives and would shrink from no sacrifice to insure their safe return.

Now let's take a look at President Roosevelt's assets and liabilities.

On the debit side of the Roosevelt ledger is the fact that he has served three terms. Both he and his administration, though refreshed with some new blood, are getting old and the country is thoroughly used to them and is beginning to wonder whether a change would be helpful.

Another thing is the fact that the Roosevelt administration has been compelled to ask the people to accept sacrifices and to forgive mistakes. In a political system which has hitherto functioned by granting favors and passing the gravy, this is very disturbing.

Finally, there is the question of a fourth term—16 consecutive years in the White House. Make no mistake about it. We have paid a high price for the third term and will pay still more for a fourth term. There are men and groups of men—ambitious, powerful, and aggressive men in both parties—who are kept within bounds only if they believe that the way to the White House is open to their ambitions. To close our political system at the top for 16 years is to invite bitterness and worse in our public life. Here it can be said that while we may not get what we pay for, we shall surely pay for what we get. The price of the fourth term will certainly be high in terms of bitterness, partisanship, and organized obstruction of our political processes. Some go so far as to suggest that Roosevelt may play the role not only of Abraham Lincoln but of Andrew Johnson in the 4 years that lie ahead, if he is reelected next November.

Another force which is working against Roosevelt is the tendency of foreign groups—allies as well as enemies—to play politics with our electorate in order to put the heat on the Roosevelt administration for their own national purposes. Since this is a very delicate matter for public discussion in time of war, I shall only suggest that we be on guard against any attempt by any foreign government to play politics with our national decision this year. It will be difficult enough for Americans to act wisely in this unprecedented crisis, without the added distraction of special appeals to hyphenates or to ideological prejudice.

Turning to the assets of President Roosevelt's position, they are easy to enumerate: His personal popularity, his record, and, quite naturally, the inadvisability of changing horses in the middle of the stream.

Popularity is, perhaps, not quite the word to describe the broad trust and general affection in which the President is held, not only in this country but throughout the world (excepting, of course, the Axis world). In foreign policy, this is a very important factor which we ought to weigh well in the coming period of diplomatic negotiation and world readjustment. It is not a quality which he can pass on to his successor. The same, of course, is still more true of internal affairs. The people of this country, by and large, like President Roosevelt and, even when they do not agree with his policies, they trust his purposes and his motives. No doubt there are many exceptions, but we are not discussing the extreme partisans, but the average men and women who do the working, the fighting, and the voting.

I have heard serious and responsible men say, in private conversation, that if the Republicans are elected this year, there will be a revolution here within 4 years. I do not agree with them, for reasons which I will outline, but it is worth noting that such extreme prophecies are evidence of the fact that, with the possible exception of HENRY WALLACE, President Roosevelt is the only Presidential possibility of 1944 who will not have to start from scratch in convincing the mass of the people of his concern for the common man and woman.

I do not believe that there is serious possibility of revolution because 1944 finds the forces of corporate property really divided on the matter of national policy. The big business interests of oil, rubber, motors, and chemicals tend to support Dewey and a policy of economic nationalism. The big business interests of steel, rails, utilities, and finance tend to support Roosevelt's policy of international cooperation. Unless all of these great economic corporate forces are vehemently lined up on one side, there is little chance that the politics of this country will go to extremes.

President Roosevelt's record is, of course, largely responsible for his personal popularity, his grip on the imagination and loyalties of the American people. It is a good record. Period. Admitting all possible mistakes, blunders, errors of judgment, and failures, it is still a good record. Period.

The banks were failing. President Roosevelt restored them and introduced needed reforms into the stock exchanges and business systems.

Labor was given the right of collective bargaining, social security, and protection against sweat-shop methods. Whatever the subsequent excesses, the status of labor is more satisfactory to labor and a better guaranty against social catastrophe than the old system of bread lines, riots, selling apples, and Chicago massacres.

The farmers have been given stability and security. The wave of evictions and foreclosures was halted and agriculture is again a profitable as well as a respectable way of life.

Needed public works were instituted. T. V. A., Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and Boulder Dams are vital to our war effort. President Roosevelt was blocked on some of his plans, but perhaps it would have been better to have the St. Lawrence power and waterway project as a pistol aimed at the heart of Hitler's Europe. Certainly, American lives would have been saved and American tankers protected, if we had built the Florida ship canal.

As a war leader, President Roosevelt has found and held important allies, with whose help he has kept the war far away from America. None of our great cities has even suffered a single bombing attack. The war is being fought 3,000, 5,000, 8,000, 12,000 miles away from our borders. The fact that we are free to hold an election this year, is due to the sound political and military strategy adopted by the President. The fact is that President Roosevelt is, in the opinion of the mass of Americans, doing a pretty good job as Commander in Chief of our armed forces. His record is, I repeat, the most important asset in the President's possession.

This brings up the issue of not changing horses while crossing the stream.

Here, it seems to me, President Roosevelt is the beneficiary of the fear that the Republican Party may attempt to change streams as well as horses. The Republican candidate—if elected—would owe his victory to, among others, the support of isolationists and pro-Axis elements, hate-Roosevelt men, and the like. His victory could be interpreted as a mandate to change policies. Otherwise, why change Presidents? Why change parties? The pressure inside the party would be intense to alter many of the details and emphases of national policy and, above all, to have a thorough house cleaning, to get rid of Democrats and put in Republicans in all the jobs. Whatever else that meant, it would tend to paralyze the American Government for 6 months or a year, while a bunch of greenhorns were finding out about their new jobs. Wartime is not a good time to introduce a year's delay in our national functioning. That, at any rate, is the essence of the don't-change-horses argument.

Now let's lift up our eyes to the hills a little. What are the things which this election should change, if America is to survive? I can set two of them right now.

First. We ought to do something about bureaucracy. I know the official definition of a bureaucrat is a Democrat who is working for the Government. The bureaucrats who need reform are not those usually attacked. The military and naval bureaucrats are far more dangerous. They are officers and gentlemen and they are honest, patriotic Americans. But they have got set in their ways and have repeatedly blocked necessary developments. I will mention only one point which has recently achieved publicity—the parachute situation. Our Air Forces, until recently, insisted on a parachute which had three points of release for the harness and repeatedly refused to adopt the single-point release used by every other air force in the world. Lives were lost, and our Air Force in England practically went on strike before the Army would change this device. There are many similar situations throughout the procurement end of our armed forces due to stubborn or short-sighted bureaucrats in the uniform of the Army and the Navy.

Another thing which we must conquer is the tendency to engage in a parody of post-war planning. Here again I'll illustrate what I mean by reference to recent newspaper stories. According to these stories, the Army and War Production Board were anxious to release materials for the manufacture of civilian automobiles and suggested that certain motor companies which had finished their war contracts should start making civilian automobiles which were needed as replacements on the home front. According to the newspapers, this proposal met with strong opposition from the motor companies which were still busy on war contracts. They felt that it would be fairer to deprive the public of any new automobiles at all until all the motor companies were in a position to compete for the post-war market for automobiles.

This type of post-war planning is too much along the line of planned scarcity to make much sense. The sooner we get away from it the better off we shall be in the post-war period.

My personal belief is that the sooner we base our planning of all kinds—for war and peace—on acceptance of technological rather than purely financial or political controls the better off we shall be. In this, the most highly technological war in history, it is remarkable that not one single policy-making position in the war administration is held by a man who has technical training or experience. The same, I hasten to add, is generally true of banking establishments and big industry. When the box office tries to write the plays we don't get good theater, and when the lawyers or the bankers try to run industry or Government we don't get full technical performance. Since the dynamics of both the Hitler system and the Soviet Union are founded on giving free play to technologists—provided, of course, they are party members in good standing—I think that we could achieve staggering results if we, with our free institutions, gave free play to our technologists, regardless of race, color, creed, or political affiliation.

I think that the record of American industry in this war proves the point. In two short years we not only caught up with but outstripped nations which had been organizing their industries for war for whole generations. Our industrial contribution to the victory of the United Nations is one of the marvels of economic history. It shows what we can do when we free industry from financial inhibitions and use the profit motive to unleash full production. For we have done this by scrapping all considerations of financial prudence and using industry on the basis of its capacity to produce rather than its record of past earnings.

Here, it seems to me, is the most hopeful thing which can come out of the war for America. My concept of liberalism is inseparable from human inventiveness. To release the human mind and human energies for discovery and production is what liberalism must accomplish if liberalism is to be anything more than a polite topic for parlor conversation. To restrict human energy, to suppress inventions and to bottle up new processes and production is my id a of reaction. The war has showed what we can do, once we are given the green light. The election of 1944 should decide that, whatever else may happen, America will never return to the kind of normalcy in which production was sacrificed to prices, profits, or property.

As I said at the opening of these remarks, we are going through a political earthquake in this country. I have tried to discuss these political issues calmly and reasonably, because now is almost the deadline which divides reason from passion in an election year. Before the votes are counted, heaven only knows what extremes we may have been driven to by our traditional forms of partisanship. For my own part, I shall try to remember not to throw the grandfather clock out the window and shall also try not to get too excited when I hear others announce that the end of the world has come. I hope, however, that we can do better than that and that during the months which lie ahead all of us—those who believe that I am on the level and those who disagree with any word I utter—can work together and hold this country together. For these are stormy days and unless we keep our heads and tempers here at home, we may find ourselves facing a far worse disaster than that of the victory of the other fellow in this year's presidential campaign.

Soviet Activity in Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED E. BUSBEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, to include an article from the April 1944 issue of The Sign, a national Catholic magazine published by Passionist Missions, Inc., entitled "Soviet Activity in Poland." I wish to say the author of this article, under the pen name of Ann Su Cardwell, is in reality Margaret Super, former Warsaw correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, and the wife of Paul Super, who for 19 years was head of the Y. M. C. A. in Poland.

SOVIET ACTIVITY IN POLAND

(By Ann Su Cardwell)

At present we are supposed to have only one occupant—the Germans; but a second is preparing to occupy—preparing with the help of its Communist crews." Thus wrote one of the editors of a Polish underground paper in the summer of 1943. The use of the word "supposed" was intentional, for in reality eastern Poland was even then feeling the weight of the second occupant's hand, and the fingers of that hand were rapidly pushing themselves into the life of every part of Poland. All of this was and is under cover, of course, for the time has not yet arrived when the Soviet Government is willing to let its work be known.

The activities carried on by agents from the U. S. S. R. in Poland at the direction of Moscow are of two kinds, political and military. The work of each group is clearly outlined and in charge of men trained for that particular purpose. Their number reaches into the tens of thousands. In no country except the Soviet Union itself has there ever been such propaganda strength massed to work for communism.

Too much emphasis cannot be placed upon one of the chief characteristics o all these Bolshevist efforts; that is the camouflaged hand. Soviet political agents were instructed to creep into genuine national patriotic Polish organizations and gradually transform them into tools for the propagation of Soviet doctrine. Since no Polish patriotic institutions or organizations are permitted by the Germans, those existing are of necessity underground, and Poles have so guarded the entry to them that wolves in sheep's clothing seldom have been able to slip in.

But failure here did not deter; it only necessitated other methods. The agents proceeded to set up groups of their own with names similar to those of the genuine Polish groups—names so similar that it is the easiest thing in the world to confuse one with the other. For example, long before the Comintern was dissolved by order of the executive committee of that organization, the Polish Communist Party got orders to disband. One of the leading and most highly respected political parties in Poland, both of pre-war and present times, is that of the Socialists. In Polish it goes by the name of P. P. S. What the political agents from Moscow did—acting as always on instructions—was to dissolve the Communist Party in Poland and announce the formation of a Polish Workers' Party, the P. P. R. The intention here is perfectly clear. It was expected that through confusion of P. P. S. and P. P. R. working people and peasants, who are utterly opposed to communism and the "protection" of the U. S. S. R., would be inveigled into the Bolshevik-sponsored party. For the P. P. R. is nothing but the Communist Party under another name.

With the P. P. R. as their organization, these political workers from the U. S. S. R., dropped by parachute on Polish territory, have established "cells" all over Poland. Their task is to undermine the morale of the Poles, to draw them into the P. P. R., to create anarchy, thus permitting communism to take over at the time of the German collapse. To accomplish this objective the agents have unlimited funds at their disposal. Printed matter in the form of newspapers, leaflets, periodicals, and placards is distributed in enormous quantities, and Polish citizens drawn into corporation receive handsome sums. Few succumb to the munificent offers, but it is understandable that when loved ones are starving and food can be had if there is money for the black market, the temptation is great for those who do not understand the real nature of these publications masquerading as Polish.

For many months, at least a half dozen regular papers of this sort have been appearing in Warsaw itself, right under the noses of the Germans. There is the Tribune of Liberty, the Guardsman, the Peasant's Tribune, the Polish Railroader, the Tramway Worker, the Fighting Youth, the Voice of Warsaw, and a daily radio bulletin—all of them Communist propaganda. The names of these papers indicate the groups to which they are directed, but special attention should be called to the effort through Fighting Youth—which is distributed among the school children as well as youth forced into labor by the Germans—to get hold of Polish young people.

These papers are circulated not only in Warsaw but throughout the country. As for their contents, they are filled with articles denouncing the legal Polish Government in London, with editorials aimed at stirring up discord among Poles, with calls for sabotage that will aid the Red armies, and for strikes of various workers' groups such as telephone operators, with never-ceasing demands for rising of the Poles against the Germans. The Poles do not read these papers. They refer to them contemptuously as dirty red rags.

Another method employed by the Soviet agents is the use of proclamations and manifestoes. One such addressed not long ago to members of all political parties in Poland called for the introduction of the Communist order in that country, the cession of the eastern provinces to the U. S. S. R., and asserted that the future of Poland depended upon its close association with the Soviet Union. Strange as it may seem, though addressed to all Polish political parties, the proclamation vehemently denounces the work and methods of all of them.

Help in the political field is given from the U. S. S. R. itself, where a Communist radio station masking under the name of the Polish patriot Kosciusko broadcasts several times daily to Poland news that is exactly contrary to that broadcast in Polish from London and in addition supplies propaganda and comment from the Communist angle. In Moscow, too, is the so-called "Union of Polish Patriots," a handful of former Polish citizens who are not all Polish in nationality. They are now Soviet citizens. Wanda Wasilewska, their leader, has, I am informed, passport number one of the "Western Ukraine," and has the title and wears the uniform of a colonel in the Red Army. The Polish patriots are nothing but the tool of the Soviet Government, which expects to set them up as a puppet government in Poland that would "ask for admission" into the Soviet Union as the seventeenth Soviet republic.

Among the White Ruthenians there is a struggle between the Soviet agents and the Germans to win the support of the priests of the Orthodox faith. Leaflets are circulated among them carrying instructions from the head of the Orthodox Church in the U. S. S. R. as to what the local priests are to do. From all that can be learned, neither the Bolsheviks nor the Germans are meeting with any success. To the Ukrainians the Soviets are saying that after Stalian defeats the Hitelerites he will clear out the Poles and make all of southeastern Poland part of an independent Ukraine. In other papers they pose as mediators between the Poles and Ukrainians—a hypocrisy that deceives nobody.

Recent trends in the activities of the political agents indicate that they have received orders to prepare all their organizations for participation in actual fighting.

Hitherto there has been nothing of this. All reference to use of arms was confined to insistence upon an armed rising of the Poles against the Germans. Just previous to this change, a number of Red Army officers was sent to Warsaw to increase agitation for Polish uprisings, and prices on the clandestine arms market—which has existed since the beginning of the German occupation of Poland—soared because of the extensive purchases made by the P. P. R.

Poles are not moved by these demands for a premature uprising, as they well understand that any attempt of the Poles to free themselves from German control before the British and Americans are in a position to get aid to them would only end in the butchery of all Poles taking part and mass executions of the rest as punishment. Instead of following the advice of these agents and their tools who term themselves "Polish patriots," the Poles ask where those same "patriots" were when millions of Polish citizens in eastern Poland were suffering deportation, imprisonment, execution, to say nothing of loss of property and all things belonging to western culture and civilization, during the 22 months they were under the control of Stalin, "the protector of the world of labor."

One of the more recent political moves of the Soviets in Poland was the naming of a "National Council," again hiding behind a recognized, respected Polish body, the Council of National Unity. This false council whose formation was announced by P. P. R., will in time appoint a "temporary government" and establish relations with the Soviet Union and others of the United Nations, according to statements issued. It has already "appointed" a puppet commander in chief of all the Polish armed forces to "replace" the actual commander in chief. General Sosnkowski, idol of all Polish soldiers but bitterly attacked by Soviet writers and speakers. It has also ordered the reorganization of the Bolshevik guerrillas, the Partisans, in Poland, whose name henceforth is to be not the People's Guard but the People's Army. Everything is being changed over to a national basis.

All of this activity is being carried on by one of the United Nations—the U. S. S. R.—on the territory of another member of the United Nations—Poland, the first to stand against the common enemy, Germany. There is a legal Polish Government, and it has authorized representatives in Poland with a fully organized Government underground, ready to come into the open and take over whenever the order to do so is given by the Polish Government in London. There is an underground army in Poland, officially the Home Army, with a commander responsible only to the Polish Commander in Chief, General Sosnkowski. Of this army we shall speak further on. The point to note now is that the Soviet political agents are endeavoring to clothe the false regime they are setting up with the truly Polish authority of the legal Polish Government and Commander in Chief. The next step will be the recognition of these false bodies and leaders as the real ones by the Soviet Government, which will occur when Stalin deems that the hour has struck.

Before we leave the political agents, one more word. They are everywhere spreading anti-British and anti-American propaganda. The Poles are told that they must beware of what the Americans and British tell them, that salvation will never come to Poland from the "capitalist" countries, that there is no hope for Poland except from the U. S. S. R. This is nothing new. Authentic reports of such propaganda carried on both in eastern Europe and the U. S. S. R. have been coming out ever since the war began. Such propaganda was entirely unaffected by the German attack on Russia which made the latter one of the "democratic" countries lined up with the "capitalists."

Now about the partisans, of which so much appears in the daily press. They are integral parts of the Red Army. Small detachments of Red Army soldiers were left in the forests of eastern Poland to serve as guerrillas and later as centers around which partisan groups could be organized. These have been augmented by numbers dropped by parachute by the Russians, and continue to be so augmented. In this manner, too, arrive arms and equipment, and by this means groups most readily are established in central Poland.

The headquarters of these troops are in the forests and marshes of northern and eastern Poland, in the forests and mountains of the central and southern sections. The bands are most numerous in the eastern and northern parts of the country, where a single group may consist of several thousand men. In southeastern Poland the groups are smaller, but they have established themselves in every county. The commanders and higher officers are Red Army officers. The soldiers are of various nationalities—Soviet soldiers who have escaped from German prisoner-of-war camps, among them men of Mongolian race; deserters from the Axis armies on the Eastern front; members of the lawless local element, especially Ukrainian youth who have been the object of intensive propaganda under both German and Soviet occupation; Gypsies; and finally, Polish citizens forcibly recruited by the partisans for membership in the various groups.

In eastern Poland, where the Germans have controlled the towns but never the countryside, partisan bands have boldly gone in and carried on recruiting, even having qualified doctors who give the necessary physical examinations. In one area they did this with a German garrison in a town less than 4 miles distant. In cases where the inhabitants resist compulsory induction into these bands, they are shot, sometimes 20 or 30 at a time. Another form of recruiting is to spread a report that the Polish Government has ordered an uprising but that the reactionary representatives refuse to publish the order. Then they send secret orders to young men to report at a given spot in a forest at a fixed time when they will be taken into the home army. On arrival, the rercuit hears a fine patriotic address, takes the oath of allegiance, and then finds himself listening to Communist political teaching. Too late he realizes what has happened, and although many escape, getting away is difficult, and then the youth must reestablish himself in the eyes of loyal Poles.

Many of the partisan units wear the Polish colors and the Polish emblem, the White Eagle. Such say that they are detachments of General Berling's army, General Berling being the commander of the Polish divisions organized under compulsion in the U. S. S. R. by the Polish patriots. The divisions are made up of men from among the deported Polish citizens who, through the break-down of Polish-Soviet relations, were never permitted by Stalin to leave the Soviet Union. They had no choice. They had only orders.

The Partisans are splendidly armed and equipped with everything of the very newest type. They have automatic pistols, machine guns, antiaircraft and antitank guns, and in some cases tanks. One detachment, numbering several thousand men, that passed through southeastern Poland apparently en route to Moldavia, consisted of cavalry, artillery, and infantry.

These bands do not seek to engage the Germans. Quite the contrary. They raid and pillage the homes of Polish country folk, whether manor house or cottage, the homes of the intellectual classes and of the clergy. They rob homes of everything useful, even compelling people to give up wearing apparel. They burn stores of grain and stacks of hay, although they know—or because they know—that increases danger of starvation for the Poles. They learn delivery dates for grain and livestock quotas, and then appear and take these for themselves. Thus in one town where there was a German force of about 100, some 300 Partisans entered and, informing the Germans that they would not be troubled if they stayed out of the way, visited all the stores and went off with all the textile and leather stocks in the town. The next day they returned and drove off all the hogs that the farmers had delivered in accordance with the quota order. On neither occasion did the Germans offer resistance, nor did they do anything later.

The common German reaction to such raids takes the form of reprisals on the innocent Polish people of the neighborhood where the raid occurs. There is no attempt by the Germans to discover and punish the Bolshevik raiders. Instead, a punitive expedition is sent out which deports or executes the unfortunate villagers and burns their homes to the ground. Provocation of these reprisals is part of the Partisan assignment. Thus the Poles suffer twice, one day at the hands of the bandits, the next at the hands of the legal government, while the silent man in the Kremlin wears his enigmatic smile.

Although the Partisans do not engage in anti-German activities, except in sabotaging communication to the eastern front, for which there is a specially trained band of experts from the U. S. S. R., they take credit to themselves before the world for such action carried on by the regular home army, mentioned earlier. In fact, what the Partisans do is all to the disadvantage of the Polish people. It cannot help Poles to have stores of food destroyed. It does not help when the Partisans burn landmarks of Polish culture, like the manor house that was the Soplicowo in Pan Tadeusz, that epic beloved of all Poles and which played so vital a part in the life of the Polish people during the long years after the Eighteenth Century partitions of their country when there was no Poland on the map but only in Polish hearts. It does not help to have the lawless element of the Ukrainian people supplied with weapons and encouraged to hideous mass murder of Polish women and children and of Ukrainians who will have nothing to do with such outrages.

Along with their raiding and recruiting for their People's Army, the Bolsheviks are bold enough to hold meetings which they compel people of the neighborhood to attend. On these occasions the Polish Government is violently atacked, "capitalist" states come in for their share, and the Soviet Government is extolled. At one such meeting the speakers promised that huge Red Armies would soon occupy all the countries now under German control and even Germany itself; and the session closed with the declaration, forced from the assembled audience, that the eastern provinces of Poland belong to the Soviet Union.

The people of Poland are not deceived by this termite work under the guise of Polish patriotism. They know that a real friend does not enter one's house and take over, depriving the owner of all his rights of decision. They know that the Polish Home Army is trained and disciplined, waiting eagerly for the day when it will be ordered by its beloved commander in chief to go into action. They know who in Poland is fighting the Germans in every possible way, and they know that it is not the Partisans.

They know much more than that. When the Soviet agents talk about the necessity of Poland's having the protection of the U. S. S. R., they understand fully what that signifies, for from September 17, 1939, to the latter part of June 1941, all eastern Poland was under that protection. What did it mean? Destruction of everything in the social, educational, cultural, and economic realms that the Poles had been able to achieve in 20 years of independence; the extermination of all things Polish; vast property destruction; the cruel torture and execution of thousands of Polish citizens, and deportation of more than 1,500,000 others to the depths of Asiatic Russia, where they suffered horrors passing all description and hundreds of thousands of them have perished; pauperization of those who escaped this fate and remained under the oppressors' domination in eastern Poland, where every sphere of life underwent complete sovietization.

Such protection holds no charm for men and women who value freedom more than life itself, who declared at the outset of this war that it was not a war of Hitler and his crew against Poland, but a war of anti-Christian against Christian forces. The fact that Hitler may be on the way out and that the standard of the anti-Christian element may pass from his hand to Stalin's in no wise changes the character of the struggle.

But what will be the fate of the Polish citizens unfortunate enough to be on territory now gradually being taken over from the retreating Germans by the Red Armies? It can only be surmised from the procedures of the Soviet authorities during the period when they were in control of eastern Poland after the treacherous Soviet stabbing of Poland in 1939, at which time I was in that area.

We Must Be on Guard Against Germany's Key Figure for Post-War Plans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am asking consent to include with my remarks herewith an article from Barron's Weekly which appears in the current issue of Reader's Digest. The article is by Dr. Max Immanuel, former official of the German Reichsbank, who resignad that position when Hitler came to power, was retained as economic consultant by a number of American corporations, came to this country in 1938, has been head consultant of the Board of Economic Warfare, and is now an American citizen.

Dr. Immanuel's article entitled "Beware Schacht" is therefore written from the point of view of a man who knows from his own intimate experience what we have to fear from the crafty operations of this German financier.

In connection with Dr. Immanuel's article I refer the House to previous speeches of my own on the subject of the Bank for International Settlements:

BEWARE SCHACHT!

(By Dr. Max Immanuel)

(Condensed from Barron's)

The German to beware of when the war ends in a tall, roosterish financier and jack-of-all-political-trades named Dr. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht. Hitler and the High Command will be given short shrift by the Allies, Schacht might be accepted—although he is the most untrustworthy German of them all.

Germany even now is feverishly preparing an economic and political offensive to begin the moment war is over. It will be a powerful effort to retain the booty taken from conquered Europe, to evade penalties, to get money for reconstruction—in a word, to obtain the conditions essential to preparation for a third world war. Dr. Schacht is intimately associated with all this activity.

The German radio recently has been reporting Schacht to be in disfavor with the Nazis. This is the beginning of a build-up for Schacht as a post-war negotiator. It will enable him to pop up with the air of a man who has opposed the Nazis all the time, and therefore is worthy of assuming the task of reconstructing Germany along democratic lines.

I know how Schacht operates and what he thinks deep in his heart. For 10 years I was associated with him when he was president of the Reichsbank. We saw each other daily. He had a favorite sermon which he often preached to me: "Forget your idealism. Get rich, then seek political power—and don't let anything stand in your way."

Schacht is a booby trap which, if accepted at face value, will ultimately explode and blow America's post-war dreams into oblivion. One big reason why he is dangerous is that he knows the United States and has a good reputation here. His father brought him here when he was a small child, and he lived in Brooklyn during his boyhood. The elder Schacht, a great admirer of the United States, added Horace Greeley to the youngster's name.

The family returned to Germany when Schacht was 12, but he has been a frequent visitor to the United States and speaks fluent English, sparking it with colloquialisms. In 1931-32 he made a tour of the country on behalf of Hitler, who was then about to seize power. From lecture platforms in all the principal cities he told his listeners that Der Fuehrer was a stanch believer in capitalism, a liberal, and all in all a pretty nice fellow. To friends in New York he said, "A man is rising in Germany who is greater than Napoleon, as great as Jesus Christ." To a lecture audience in Town Hall he promised the most peace-loving government in Germany's history.

A man of infinite charm and shrewd to the point of genius, Schacht made many friends here, particularly in financial and big-business circles. Many of them, I regret to say, still believe in him.

Lately he has been traveling frequently to and from Switzerland. (The fact that he is permitted to move freely is proof of his favorable relations with the Nazi Party.) In Basel not long ago he talked with an important figure in American banking. Other discussions by Schacht's agents have been taking place in Lisbon, Madrid, and Buenos Aires.

Recently Schacht proposed that German industry be taken over after the war by a commission of British, American, and German industrialists. In return, Germany would be permitted to choose its own government and keep its industrial plant.

This proposal aroused no enthusiasm, so Schacht followed it with another. This I have in private cables from a source in London which is not to be doubted. It offers to soften German resistance in the west to permit British and American armies to get to Berlin before the Russians. There is more than one good reason for believing this report. The Russians have no illusions about Dr. Schacht and might promptly liquidate him.

The real peace offensive, however, will begin when the war ends. The Nazi leaders will be either in hiding or in prison, the generals without power. Then my old friend Schacht, brushing the swastikas from his lapel and beaming with cordiality, will begin the task of beating the Allies out of their victory.

After the German inflation that followed the last war, bankers everywhere, with supreme faith in the industry of the German people, hurried to lend the country money. Millions in loans from small American, British, and Latin-American investors went to the Reich. It was this money—little of it ever repaid—that built the German roads and gave the country the finest industrial plant in Europe.

Later Schacht refused point-blank to pay interest on the bonds the foreigners had purchased. This forced down the price of the bonds, and Schacht then bought them in at a fraction of their cost.

Schacht also tricked and maneuvered until he had wrecked the Dawes and Young plans for Germany's payment of war reparations. This led to the Hoover moratorium suspending all reparations payments. They were never resumed. Then Schacht fought and wheedled until the moratorium was extended to private loans—this at a time when the Reich was well able to pay. After these achievements, the way was clear for the coming of Hitler and another war.

Most of these operations Schacht accomplished as president of the Reichsbank under the Weimar Republic. He resigned that post as soon as he decided that Hitler was coming into power. Then he lashed out in a series of brutal attacks on his old associates. When the Nazis marched in, the men of the republic fled or were seized, imprisoned, or killed. These men were Schacht's former comrades; they had given him a leg up when he needed it. Now he gave them no thought; he merely stepped across the line and joined the new government.

Because Hitler badly needed a front man—one who would look good to international finance and big business—he made Schacht the economic dictator of the Third Reich. Schacht lent the brown-shirted hoodlums of the Munich Bierstube an aura of respectability which helped greatly in establishing the new government.

Schacht today, at 67, is a homely, somewhat ludicrous individual. About 6 feet 3 inches tall, with Clark Gable ears and a G. I. haircut, he wears spotted, baggy clothes and, invariably, a gleaming white celluloid collar about 4 inches high. The collar is his trademark. Gustav Stresemann, former foreign minister, used to say it was the only clean thing about him.

In his personal relations, Schacht's manner varies with the people with whom he is dealing. To subordinates he is harsh and implacable, and to his opponents he is often intolerably rude. But to those he needs he can be a man of great charm. In the movie, Mission to Moscow, Schacht is depicted as an earnest and upright fellow who would do anything he could to accommodate you.

In the summer of 1939 he visited France and Britain and there he warned the chancelleries of the imminence of war and whispered "in strictest confidence" the details of the Nazi military machine. It was Schacht's contribution to the war of nerves which Hitler hoped would be sufficient to keep those two countries out of war.

The paradox of Schacht's career is that, although his gift of betrayal was known to many people, he yet continued to occupy high office. Marshal Goering summed it up neatly when he described Schacht as "unloved, unwanted, indispensable." He was hated and distrusted within the Nazi party, particularly by Goebbels and Himmler, and was never elected a member—although Hitler finally gave him an honorary membership. Schacht in private used to refer to his party pin as his lifesaving badge.

Schacht's first job was record clerk in a large Berlin bank. He advanced with such speed that early in the First World War he was appointed an aide to the civil governor of occupied Belgium. He made a good thing out of his job until his chiefs discovered that he had been throwing business, which should have been divided equaly among all German banks, exclusively to his former employers.

Later, Schacht used his high office as head of the Reichsbank to make a fortune gambling secretly on the stock exchange in Switzerland. He also became the secret backer of several manufacturing enterprises, and then used his influence to have their products bought by government agencies.

The story of Schacht's economic manipulations that made possible the rebirth of the German war machine is too complex to describe in detail. However, it might be noted that it was Schacht who centralized all exporting and developed the system of barter by which Germany was able to obtain war-essential minerals and oil in return for cheap toys and cameras.

He also invented the blocked mark and a whole series of tricky currencies. A country receiving payment in these money found that they could be spent only in Germany or for German goods, that they had no value elsewhere.

Schacht once made a "plunder survey" of the Balkans, listing everything seizable in production or financial wealth. The report appalled even the hardened Nazis, who pointed out that he had not left so much as a ton of provisions for the needs of local populations. "Oh, God, do they have to eat?" exclaimed Schacht.

By 1937 the German Army was an ominous fact, and Schacht's groundwork was done. He ostensibly retired to raise pigs in the seclusion of his estate.

Every trustworthy source is agreed that, when the war is over, whoever rules Germany will find Schacht at his elbow—or hanging from his neck.

Just as he softened the consequences of defeat after the last war and then made possible the rise of Hitler, so he will come forward to do the same trick again. Inordinately ambitious and supremely self-confident, he sees in the end of this war a new opportunity to gratify his desire to become the one all-powerful man of the Reich.

C. A. A. Instructors Say Army Is Trying To Put Them on the Shelf

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include an article from the Sunday Star concerning a situation which I believe every Member of the House should be interested in correcting:

Civilian instructors in the Army's soon-to-be abandoned air-training program are complaining to the Ramspeck Civil Service Investigating Committee in the House that they are being brushed off by boards named to inquire into their further usefulness in the war effort, it was learned authoritatively yesterday.

Meanwhile, the committee's investigators are completing a report which will be highly critical of the Army Air Forces' plan to train 2,500 women ferry pilots at a time when thousands of male airmen with, in many cases, thousands of hours of flight time, are begging for assignment. It will be submitted to Chairman RAMSPECK, probably within the next few days, and he and his committee then will determine whether to transmit it to the House.

An inquiry by the committee has confirmed press reports that 48 members of the Women's Air Service Pilots, with only civilian status, are undergoing training for commissions at the air base at Orlando, Fla. The course given them will last nearly 7 months, which approximates the 9-months course given male candidates for commissions in the Army Air Forces, the committee found.

BILL STILL BEFORE COMMITTEE

Although the Costello bill now pending in Congress would authorize the commissioning of the WASPS into the Air Forces, it is still before the House Rules Committee, and some leaders on Capitol Hill doubt that it will ever pass. In training these women for commissions before passage of the measure, a congressional source said today, the Air Forces appear to have jumped the gun.

As a result of widespread complaints by pilots in the Civil Aeronautics Authority's war training service program, who hold that they are being shelved, the War Department set up boards of inquiry to look into their usefulness as candidates for regular combat pilots, ferry pilots, and other duties.

ONE INQUIRY CITED

A report received in Washington from a squadron commander at one of the training schools gives the following account of the inquiry that was allegedly conducted there:

"On Saturday, April 15, 1944," the report said, "the instructors of this school engaged in the flight training of aviation cadets for the Army Air Forces were favored with a visit by a so-called Flying Instructor Board.

"The opening words of the speaker for this Board were in part: 'Since curtailment of the primary training program so many telegrams and letters have been received by your Senators and Congressmen as to your disposition that they are on the Army's neck, and we have to do something to get them off.'

"The things that followed were most humiliating and embarrassing. After a brief explanation we were handed a contract, called instructor interview form, to sign. It asked what we wanted to do if we were qualified. We were not given time to think it over, and were required to make our choice in pencil and make our signature in ink. They told us it was only a survey and not a contract."

THREE CHOICES PROVIDED

The report then quoted the form submitted to the men. It provided that they might apply for (a) discharge from the Enlisted Reserve Corps; (b) continuance in the Enlisted Reserve Corps for training and duty with the Air Transport Command; (c) call to active duty with the Army Air Forces.

The form, as quoted in the report, concluded:

"I further understand that if I choose major option B and am assigned thereto, and am at any point found not qualified for such training or duty I therefore and with due consideration of the above-named major options, elect the following dispositions or forms of duty on training as my preference in the order named * * *.

"And I accept and desire whichever one of the above three preferences is approved for me under existing regulations, and will perform to the best of my ability. Signature * * *."

The pilot making the report said that he considered the form "a binding contract."

QUALIFICATIONS ARE RIGID

The report pointed out that to qualify for training as an Army Transport Service pilot the applicant must have at least 6 months' service in an Army contract or war-training service school, be between 18 and 35, and have flown 1,000 hours as a pilot, 200 of which must have been in aircraft of over 200 horsepower. By contrast, WASP applicants are required to have 35 hours.

"If these qualifications are met," it continued, "we then get transition training, but we are told the Air Transport Command is full and running over, so they go on to say in the instructor interview form: 'If the individual fails to complete satisfactorily the above-mentioned training or is discharged from his employment with the Air Transport Command for other reasons, his name will be submitted by the Air Transport Command to higher headquarters for call to active duty in the Army Air Forces in an enlisted capacity.'

"Here they again have ample opportunity to give us the boot."

Inquiry made by the Ramspeck committee at another school, it was understood, was met with the reply that a major—constituting the board—had called to interview pilots. He said before leaving, it was reported, that only one of the group of 14 instructor-pilots had a chance to qualify for the Army Transport Service. At still another school where inquiry was made, the officer conducting the survey was quoted as saying that only one man might qualify, and he was a candidate for glider service.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WNBF on April 29, 1944:

Dear friends of the triple cities and my congressional district, at least 2,000,000 American fighting men will want to own their own farms at the close of this war. But they are going to face plenty of obstacles before they realize this ambition unless they get more cooperation than is now in sight.

One of the greatest accomplishments of the Lincoln administration during the War between the States was the formulation of a far-sighted post-war plan for the returning soldiers. Later Congress adopted this plan and called it the homestead law.

Under its provisions the new lands of the West were opened up for settlement and agriculture. Every soldier had priority for a plot and thousands of them flocked westward to take advantage of it.

The Homestead Act saved many a patriotic American from the misery and poverty of the city and gave him the chance he had prayed for—that of owning and working his own farm. Instead of a burden to society, he became a self-respecting, independent, freedom-loving farmer, who could reap what he sowed and live in the knowledge and security of his own industry and on the stability of his own farm.

I hope the Congress will turn back the pages of history and examine the homestead laws. Many people do not realize that today our Government is still the greatest landlord. There are more than 2,000,000 acres that ought to be given back to private hands. These great tracts should be made available to returning heroes of World War No. 2.

Every soldier who yearns to get back to the farm, who desires to possess his own land should have the chance to do so. As for me, I believe America has grown great because the soldiers of all our past wars were encouraged to make their own way and to till the soil. I believe we can well afford to encourage them after this war to do the same thing.

Would it not be a source of pride to the American people to be able to say to their young men who return from the war, we have kept the faith, we have a program ready for you, the way of peace is open for all men and nations. You must travel that road, and we are causing your journey to be easier by the preparations we have made. Go forth and may success be yours, my son.

No, dear friends, we must not fail our soldier boys. Let us not give rise to the sad spectacle which eighteenth century England faced at the time of her great social revolution when the little farms of her people were transformed overnight into great estates and sheep ranches as result of the vast migration from farm to factory, spelling doom to England's small landowners and independent farmers.

Let us heed the warning of a poet of the period:

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey
Where wealth accumulates and men decay
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
A breath can make them, as a breath has made
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride
When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

"A time there was, ere England's grief began
When every rood of ground maintained its man
For him light labor spread her wholesome store
Just gave what life required, but gave no more
His best companions, innocence and health
And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.

"But times are altered, trade's oppressive train
Has entered in and dispossessed the swain."

Abuse of O. P. A. Power by Chester Bowles Destroys Strawberry Growers' Rights and Property

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, if you are a grower of strawberries or other perishable crops on which an O. P. A. ceiling price has been fixed, you cannot appeal to any court, nor can you help yourself according to former American laws and customs in any manner, no matter how discriminatory, how illegal, or how confiscatory Chester Bowles' regulation is. As far as your property rights are concerned you are an absolute prisoner of one Chester Bowles.

Here is how it operates—you cannot use the courts but O. P. A. can.

Chester Bowles put a discriminatory price ceiling on Louisiana strawberries and considering the crop failure of more than 50 percent this season it was absolutely confiscatory.

First the growers appealed to Chester Bowles, who refused to listen. Next the appeal went to Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, and then to Fred Vinson, Economic Stabilizer. No aid was forthcoming.

Next 15 Senators and over 30 Congressmen received a sugar-coated answer of no when they appealed to Bowles.

Next the Louisiana growers appealed to President Roosevelt under section 3 of the Price Control Act, asking that Mr. Roosevelt's secretary, Hon. Stephen Early, instruct Chester Bowles to withhold action until the President could return to Washington and pass on this appeal. Bowles refused to withhold action.

Next a suit was submitted to a State court judge in Louisiana. He insisted he could take no jurisdiction even though he thought the farmers should have a restraining order.

Next a suit asking for a restraining order was presented to the judge of the United States District Court of Louisiana. This judge also stated that even his court had no jurisdiction, showing the case of Lockerty against Phillips to the attorneys.

Next a suit was filed in the United States Supreme Court on behalf of the Governor of Louisiana, the State of Louisiana, and the growers. This highest Court denied jurisdiction.

The only court left was the Emergency Court of Appeals, which is most misleading by its name, since the law provides it can issue no restraining orders or injunctions, and by the time this court could have acted several months would have elapsed since this season's last Louisiana strawberries were picked and eaten.

Therefore, the strawberry grower is out in the cold with no court to appeal to to hear his appeal for justice and nothing to stop his property from being taken without due process of law.

But look what the O. P. A. can do: If the O. P. A. says any farmer, individual, or corporation is not treating the O. P. A. fairly, the O. P. A. can go into any State court, any Federal court, and can end up in the United States Supreme Court.

If an individual mistreats or violates an O. P. A. order, he goes to jail or is sued for triple damages.

If Chester Bowles or an O. P. A. subordinate mistreats the farmer, a group of people, or an individual, or violates the Constitution or other laws with a confiscatory regulation, Mr. Bowles just says, "I'm awfully sorry; the O. P. A. just made a mistake or just handled that situation crudely." No court action, no triple damages, no jail term for him, and no money out of his pockets.

What is the remedy? It is easy. Congress should take out of the O. P. A. Act the provisions that prevent an American from going to court in the good old American way. I am submitting to the committees in both the House and the Senate this proposal. If the committees fail to act on this, then when the O. P. A. Act comes before Congress within the next 2 weeks it should be thus amended from the floor. When that is done Mr. Chester Bowles will lose his dictator powers which he has so wrongfully abused and all Americans will then have an opportunity to have their day in court and their opportunity to seek justice according to the Constitution.

The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, among its other provisions, expressly forbids the Administrator of Price Control to do anything that will destroy the price or marketing system. This prohibition is in the following language:

(h) The powers granted in this section shall not be used or made to operate to compel changes in the business practices, cost practices or methods, or means or aids to distribution, established in any industry, except to prevent circumvention or evasion of any regulation, order, price schedule, or requirement under this act.

On the 13th day of April, Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, promulgated a regulation fixing a ceiling price on Louisiana strawberries. This ceiling price took effect at 12:01 a. m. April 27, at the height of the Louisiana strawberry season, which opens about the 1st of March and closes about the 1st of June. The effect of this regulation was to destroy at a single stroke the entire price and marketing system that Louisiana growers have worked out over a period of 25 years. This system is delicately balanced and is conditioned on speed and efficiency, the result being that the growers get a sound price for their berries and the final consumer receives the berries while they are still fresh without any great spread between the consumer price and the price the producer receives.

Despite the fact that the order which Mr. Bowles has put into effect is in direct violation of the statute, which creates the position that he now holds, there is no remedy against him. I have just had a disappointing and highly relevant experience in this connection, which forces me to the conclusion that the fault lies in the Congress not having enacted a statute that permits an irresponsible bureaucrat to take private property without due process of law in violation of the Constitution of the United States and at the same time deprives the citizens whose property has been taken of any effectual remedy before the courts. The bureaucrat himself is primarily to blame, but we have had enough experience with some bureaucrats to expect of them the abuse and misuse of any power that is given to them. We ought to know by this time that the only protection the people have against them is in the Congress and the courts and that unless the Congress and the courts provide such protection such men as Bowles will destroy the remnants of freedom we still have.

It is boiled down to this. The Price Control Act provides an Emergency Court of Appeals and provides expressly that no other court shall have jurisdiction of matters arising under the act. In other words, unless the strawberry growers can get relief from the Emergency Court of Appeals they cannot get it anywhere. The trouble with the Emergency Court of Appeals is that the statute provides that it may not issue a temporary injunction, or any kind of an injunction. It takes a minimum of 3 months to do anything before that court. The Louisiana strawberry season ends the 1st of June. Hence if the strawberry growers went before the Emergency Court of Appeals the season would be gone and the marketing system destroyed and Louisiana strawberry growers would be robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars that rightfully belong to them before they could get the proceeding well under way, and it is questionable whether or not the marketing system can again be built up once it is destroyed. The damage is permanent and irreparable.

Realizing this situation, I first took the case before the United States district court in Louisiana in an effort to get the court to enjoin the unlawful thing that Bowles has done under the general equity powers of the Federal courts. The judge pointed out to me that he was expressly forbidden by the Price Control Act to do anything about the matter. I had to admit to him that was the language of the act.

Thereupon, acting upon authority of the Governor of Louisiana and in the name of the Governor of Louisiana, I filed an original action before the Supreme Court of the United States under the theory that the State of Louisiana, in accordance with the provisions of the third article of the Constitution of the United States, had a right to appeal directly to the Supreme Court in protection of its citizens. The Supreme Court gave the matter careful consideration. It ruled that it did not have jurisdiction of the case. This ruling appears to be based on the provisions of the Price Control Act and is to the effect that the people of Louisiana, even though the State acts on their behalf, have no remedy for the wrong that has been done them except through the Emergency Court of Appeals provided by the statute.

I had hoped that the Supreme Court might hold otherwise, though I had realized from the beginning that the chances were against us. After all, the Supreme Court itself is bound by the statute, if the statute is constitutional, and this statute has been held constitutional. The thing we complained about was not that the statute itself was unconstitutional, but that the thing which Bowles did was directly forbidden by the statute. In other words, we said that Bowles' conduct was illegal and unconstitutional. The Supreme Court says that our remedy for such unlawful conduct is before the Emergency Court of Appeals and that no other court in the land, not even the Supreme Court, can give us any relief.

Now I come back to the proposition that if the people are going to be protected against the high-handed, arbitrary, and unlawful acts of such bureaucrats as Chester Bowles, the Congress itself must see to it that they are given a remedy before the courts that will be a practical remedy instead of a remedy that cannot possibly be put into effect until after they have been robbed of their property and their rights. What good does it do to get a favorable decision from the Emergency Court of Appeals if our crops have spoiled or have been sold at half their value and the whole system upon which our industry is founded has been destroyed. It is too late to do anything for the Louisiana strawberry growers this year, or for the strawberry growers in Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, Maryland, or any other State, but it is not too late to safeguard them against such outrages another year, or to protect other farmers who are raising highly perishable crops that have to be sent to market under a delicately balanced and highly efficient system. The time has come for the Congress to amend the Price Control Act so as to take from Bowles or any other bureaucrat power to destroy the value of farm crops and to do irreparable damage to farm-marketing systems as he has done in this case.

The following is the complaint which I prepared and filed in the Supreme Court of the United States, which sets out in detail the injustice on the part of Mr. Bowles and the O. P. A.:

[In the Supreme Court of the United States. Sam H. Jones, Governor of the State of Louisiana ex rel. the State of Louisiana; Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union, Inc.; Louisiana Strawberry & Selling Agency, Inc.; Ascension Farmers' Cooperative Association, Inc.; Wiltz Hoover; v. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration. Original action No. —]

COMPLAINT FOR RESTRAINING ORDER, TEMPORARY INJUNCTION AND PERMANENT INJUNCTION

The complaint of Sam H. Jones, Governor of the State of Louisiana, acting on behalf of the State of Louisiana and of the other plaintiffs named in the caption hereto, respectfully shows to this honorable Court as follows:

1. That Sam H. Jones is an officer of the State of Louisiana duly qualified and acting as Governor of the State of Louisiana, and files this action on behalf of the State of Louisiana as an original action in the Supreme Court of the United States under article III, section 2, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States.

2. The Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union, Inc., a corporation organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the State of Louisiana, created and acting as a farmers' cooperative protective association with a membership of substantially every strawberry grower in Louisiana, is authorized under the law of Louisiana and plaintiff's charter to represent the aforesaid strawberry growers in court. The Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union, Inc., acts in this connection on its own behalf and on behalf of all others in similar situations with it too numerous to mention.

3. Louisiana Strawberry and Selling Agency, Inc., is a corporation organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the State of Louisiana, created and acting as a selling agency, having in its membership 10 strawberry growers and 7 member strawberry associations consisting of approximately 4,000 strawberry growers and handling and selling at public auction 40 percent of the entire Louisiana strawberry crop.

4. Ascension Farmers' Cooperative Association, Inc., a corporation organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the State of Louisiana, created and acting on behalf of approximately 450 growers for the purpose of supplying on a cooperative basis fertilizer, crates, and advances as crop loans to its members and loading and handling its members' strawberries for sale through the Louisiana Strawberry and Selling Agency, Inc., at public auction. Ascension Farmers' Cooperative Association, Inc., acts in this connection on its own behalf and on behalf of all others in similar situation with it.

5. Wiltz Hoover, a citizen and a resident of the Parish of Tangipahoa, State of Louisiana, who is a farmer and grower of Louisiana strawberries, having shipped from March 15, 1944, to date approximately 350 crates of strawberries and having still on hand for shipment and sale between date of filing this suit and June 1, 1944, approximately 275 crates of strawberries not yet picked. Wiltz Hoover acts in this connection on his own behalf and on behalf of all others in similar situation with him too numerous to mention.

6. Defendant Chester Bowles is the duly qualified and acting Administrator of the Office of Price Administration of the United States Government appointed under the Price Control Act of 1942, as amended.

7. Jurisdiction of this honorable court is based on article 3, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States, the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and section 264 of the Judicial Code of the United States, being title 28, United States Code, paragraph 378.

8. That the State of Louisiana by its Governor acts herein in protection of the welfare and property of its citizens, no less than 50,000 of whom are directly affected by the subject matter of this suit, and on behalf of the general welfare of the entire State; it being the contention of the State of Louisiana in this action that the arbitrary, discriminatory, capricious, unlawful, and unconstitutional action of defendant Bowles herein complained of endangers the health, prosperity, welfare, and property of its inhabitants.

9. That pretending to act under authority of the Price Control Act of 1942 as amended, but in fact acting contrary to the provisions of same, the defendant Chester Bowles on or about the 13th day of April 1944, promulgated an order fixing the ceiling price on strawberries produced in the State of Louisiana, which State has within its borders the largest and most important strawberry-producing area in the world, at $4.70 per crate for 24 pints on sales by any strawberry grower up to and including the first day of May 1944, and thereafter fixing the ceiling price at $3.95 per crate for 24 pints. That said order is contrary to and in disregard of the Price Control Act of 1942 as amended and is further in violation of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States in that it directly deprives 50,000 citizens of the State of Louisiana of their property without due process of law, thereby directly affecting the welfare of the entire State of Louisiana. Unless said Chester Bowles is restrained and enjoined from enforcing said illegal and unconstitutional order plaintiffs and all classes of people by them represented will suffer immediate and irreparable damage as is more fully hereinafter set forth in this complaint and in the affidavits hereto attached, herein referred to, and hereby made a part hereof.

10. Since 1918 strawberry growers have built up a unique business practice in the method of marketing Louisiana strawberry crops which has enabled the farmer and the middlemen to receive a fair and equitable distribution of the receipts from these crops and the illegal, arbitrary and highly discriminatory order or regulation issued by the said Chester Bowles will totally destroy the strawberry industry in Louisiana or cripple it to such an extent that it will never completely recover.

11. This order directly adversely affects plaintiffs and the lives and economic well-being of 50,000 citizens of Louisiana.

12. The marketing methods which have taken the strawberry farmers 25 years to perfect operates as follows:

a. The strawberry growing area of Louisiana, which is the largest strawberry producing district in the world, covers approximately five parishes surrounding the city of Hammond, La.

b. When the season opens the farmers throughout this area begin to bring in their strawberries daily. They take them to any one of approximately 12 shipping points in this area and turn them over to an association whether private or cooperative. Plaintiff, Ascension Farmers' Cooperative Association, Inc., is one of such associations.

c. There are approximately 25 such associations operating throughout this strawberry district.

d. These strawberries are loaded into refrigerated cars immediately. The farmer is given a receipt for whatever number of crates or fractions of crates of berries he brings to market and his berries are loaded on the same car with scores of other farmers' berries.

e. This mingling of various farmers' berries is possible because Louisiana strawberries are shipped in one grade or classification and the carload is sold as a unit as will be explained hereinafter.

f. As these associations complete the loading of a car it is picked up by an express train and started northward with its destination unknown until that night when the berries are sold at public auction while they are traveling northward in the express train.

g. Each night during the season three public auctions are held in Hammond, La., for the sale of the strawberries beginning at 8 o'clock. Plaintiff, Louisiana Strawberry and Selling Agency, Inc., operates one of these auctions.

h. The above-mentioned association which collects and loads strawberries for the farmers brings the bills of lading for their cars that are then in transit to any one of the auctions they select. The auctioneers then put these cars up for sale to the highest bidder. This can be done because all Louisiana berries are shipped under one grade or class.

i. After the cars have been sold the buyer obtains authority from the association that loaded that car to divert the said car to whatever destination he desires.

j. By this method carloads of strawberries flying northward on express trains can be sold at public auction and still be delivered to any destination that the buyer may desire.

k. After the association is paid for the cars sold he calls in the farmers and pays them according to receipts given at the time they delivered their berries. Thus the farmer who may have only 1 crate and 2 pints of berries to sell can get the benefit of a sale by public auction which is attended every season by some 40 or 50 buyers representing fruit dealers throughout the United States.

l. If a maximum or ceiling price of $4.70 and $3.95 to the growers as above described is placed in effect as the Office of Price Administration announced it will be on April 27, 1944, then this entire marketing system, built up over a period of 25 years, will be destroyed.

m. That the entire strawberry industry of the State of Louisana is dependent upon this system of distribution. The ceiling price fixed by the defendant Bowles complained of in this suit will effectively destroy said system in that it will prevent the smooth and steady movement of berries from the fields to the markets and further prevent a small farmer to have buyers from the biggest produce houses in the United States bid against each other for his crate or two of strawberries at the said public auction. With the short crop and unreasonably low and discriminatory ceiling price as fixed by the Office of Price Administration, all of the strawberries will be sold at the ceiling price and therefore there will be no bidding at the auctions.

n. The buyers who are now in Hammond, La., will no longer bid against each other for said strawberries, but will proceed to comb the countryside in an effort to get the largest portion of the crop they can at the ceiling price. The auctions will thereby be forced to close down.

o. With the ceiling prices so fixed, the incentive to buyers for paying black market prices to individual farmers is self-evident.

p. The operation of the marketing system above described, which is unique, and the only marketing system of its kind in the United States, constitutes business practices, cost practices, and methods and means, and aids distribution established in the strawberry industry, which are essential to the industry in that said system permits a highly perishable product to be set in motion on the evening of the same day that it is harvested to markets scattered throughout the United States in such fashion that the product may be diverted in transit from at least five distinct points several hundred miles distant to some 40 or more advantageous markets scattered throughout the United States, thereby assuring the best price to the producer and the most economical delivery to the consumer.

13. Fifty thousand Louisiana strawberry people are shipping and marketing their strawberries on a large commercial scale in the above described manner. The strawberry season usually begins in March or April and ends sometime in the month of May depending on weather conditions. The current season started on approximately March 14, 1944, and from present indications will end about June 1, 1944 (depending on weather conditions). Therefore the present time constitutes the height of the shipping season. Among the many reasons why the defendant should be restrained from attempting to enforce the aforesaid price ceiling order or regulation on strawberries are set forth, to wit:

(a) The said order or regulation is capricious, arbitrary, and discriminatory in view of the fact that the regulation or order totally disregards the fact that Louisiana strawberry growers suffered a crop failure amounting to at least 50 percent caused by excessive frosts and rain.

(b) The Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, gives to the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration power to fix ceiling prices only in such cases as will affect the over-all economic stability of United States currency and in the instant case Louisiana strawberry farmers, if no ceiling is placed on the prices, will not receive more than $3,780,000 for the entire crop as compared with a yearly average from 1930 through 1940 of some $5,000,000 and therefore, when the Louisiana strawberry farmer will receive 20 percent less than he received during a 10-year average, his receipts could not possibly affect stability of United States currency.

(c) The Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, prohibits and forbids defendant from fixing a maximum ceiling price on any commodity until after the Secretary of Agriculture has determined and published: (1) a parity price for such commodity taking into consideration grade, location, and so forth, and (2) the highest price received by the grower during the period from January 1, 1942, to September 15, 1942. The act further forbids the fixing of a maximum price that is below either one of the above two published prices and plaintiffs aver that the Secretary of Agriculture never has determined and published the aforesaid prices as required by the act.

(d) The said Price Control Act forbids the use of any provisions of the act for the purpose of compelling any changes in an industry, business practices or method of distribution except to prevent evasions of the law. Defendant has been shown that the ceiling he has placed on strawberries will not only change the business practices and methods of distribution but will destroy the present method of distribution built up over a period of years and which is beneficial to the growers, distributors and the strawberry industry at large.

(e) Defendant by the aforesaid order or regulation has grossly discriminated against plaintiffs herein in that he totally disregarded the fact that it costs more than twice as much to produce the same amount of Louisiana strawberries as it does to produce the berries grown in most other States of the United States. For a period of 25 years Louisiana growers have been developing a high grade of strawberries, unlike other States, and have gone to great expense and labor each season to cull and carefully grade and hand pack their berries which are sold in packages bearing well established brands or labels. Because of the development and packing of a fine strawberry, a pint of Louisiana strawberries generally sells on an equivalent market for the same price as a quart of berries from any other State of the Union, yet the defendant in his price ceiling order or regulation allows the growers in States other than Louisiana 100 percent more than the Louisiana grower can receive which is a gross, arbitrary and capricious discrimination against plaintiffs.

14. That the order of the defendant Bowles herein complained of is further capricious and discriminatory in that the Florida strawberry season opened on or about the 15th day of December 1943, and was completed about the 1st of April 1944, without a ceiling price. Further the price of Florida strawberries in the present season averaged less than 5 cents per pint box more than it averaged over last year's season and this increase was not due to any inflationary action, but was the natural result of decreased acreage. The Louisiana season during the present year opened on or about March 14 and will close on or about June 1, 1944, depending upon weather conditions. Thus the ceiling price herein complained of goes into effect in the middle of the Louisiana season. Therefore the placing of a ceiling price on Louisiana's strawberries now is an act of gross discrimination against the farmers in Louisiana.

15. In Louisiana for the period from 1930 to 1940, including railway express and truck movements, an average of 3,000 cars per season have been shipped from this State with an average seasonal return to growers of approximately $5,000,000 (these facts are based on Department of Agriculture statistics and figures). The Department of Agriculture's estimate for this season is 900 cars, and plaintiffs aver on information and belief, that the crop will be smaller than this estimate. At the highest possible average price that could be received from the entire season the return to Louisiana growers would not exceed $3,780,000, which would be distributed to 50,000 individuals and therefore could not possibly have any effect on the stability of United States currency. On the other hand, the ceiling price fixed by defendant will seriously reduce the income to the growers and others directly affected and more particularly the plaintiffs herein, and will cause widespread suffering, loss, and irreparable injury to plaintiffs and thousands of others in Louisiana.

16. The shortage of the Louisiana crop is shown by the fact that in normal years at the height of the strawberry season 100 to 150 cars are shipped per day from Louisiana. The current season has been at its height since about the 15th of April. The United States Department of Agriculture reports show that from April 16 to the date of filing this suit the shipments from Louisiana have averaged less than 10 cars per day.

Further opinions among growers, shippers, agriculture experts, and those on the scene in Louisiana, are practically unanimous that the strawberry crop failure this season will run from 50 percent to 66⅔ percent, therefore plaintiffs aver that there will be a crop failure in excess of 50 percent in Louisiana strawberries this season.

This factor has been arbitrarily disregarded by defendant in establishing aforesaid ceiling price which discriminates against plaintiffs and Louisiana strawberry growers, all contrary to the law and intention of the lawmakers who enacted the Price Control Act of 1942 as amended.

17. As another example of discrimination against plaintiffs and those they represent is shown by the fact that the Office of Price Administration acting through defendant has withheld or withdrawn the ceiling prices to growers fixed on new potatoes due to the fact that there was a partial crop failure and shortage of yield in Florida, not, however, as drastic and severe as the crop failure and shortage of yield in the Louisiana strawberry industry.

18. Louisiana strawberries have been selling during the current season for prices ranging from $8.35 to $6.03 average daily prices per crate of 24 pints. The price per crate so far this season has averaged approximately $7.15 as shown by the War Food Administration reports and the order or regulation complained of fixes the price at $4.70 until May 1, when it is then fixed at $3.95 for the balance of the season. This drastic, arbitrary and capricious action will take plaintiff's property without due process of law if it is enforced and plaintiffs will suffer irreparable injury unless this honorable court immediately issues a restraining order and after a proper hearing issues a temporary and permanent injunction against the enforcement of the aforesaid order or regulation.

19. That the damage with which the plaintiffs are threatened in this case is immediate, great and irreparable in that their whole system of marketing their strawberry crop, built up over a 25-year period and delicately balanced and implemented as hereinabove set out, faces immediate destruction at the height of their production season for 1944, that the plaintiffs have no remedy except in the Supreme Court of the United States.

20. That the remedy generally provided in said Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, does not afford adequate relief to plaintiffs in this situation, since said act provides for only two remedies, first a protest direct to the Administrator which has been made and arbitrarily refused by said defendant Bowles and, second, an appeal to the Emergency Court of Appeals which does not provide any remedy to plaintiffs as hereinafter set forth. If plaintiffs should follow only such procedure it would be impossible for them to raise and preserve their objections to the violation of the statute itself and of the violation of their constitutional rights by the defendant Bowles therein complained of in such manner as to protect themselves against the gross and irreparable damage that will come upon them by reason of the arbitrary, capricious, and unlawful act of said defendant Bowles, except for the immediate intervention of this honorable court by granting a restraining order pending hearing for preliminary injunction.

21. That in this connection plaintiffs have exhausted their administrative remedy by protest to the defendant Bowles, which protest was arbitrarily denied by said defendant Bowles.

22. That plaintiffs have no remedy before the Emergency Court of Appeals as set up by said Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, in that said statute expressly prohibits said Emergency Court of Appeals from issuing restraining orders or temporary injunctions or interlocutory decrees and provides for such periods of time and procedure before said court that the Louisiana strawberry season of 1944 would be completely ended and irreparable damages herein complained of would have occurred, including the destruction of the plaintiffs' marketing system and the unlawful taking of their property without due process of law.

23. Therefore plaintiffs have no remedy in any administrative procedure or before any court save before the Supreme Court of the United States in the exercise of its general powers in an original action brought by the State of Louisiana joined herein by the other plaintiffs as representative of the several classes whose welfare and property are threatened with destruction, save for the immediate intervention of this Honorable Court.

24. The order herein complained of went into effect at 12:01 a. m., central war time, April 27, 1944, and except for the intervention of this Court by the issuance of a temporary restraining order, the plaintiffs' marketing system as herein set forth which abruptly stopped with the closing of the auction April 27, 1944, at 8 p. m., central war time, has broken down, and thereby plaintiffs and all whom they represent are being deprived of their property rights without due process of law and the general welfare of the State of Louisiana is being irreparably damaged.

Wherefore, these premises considered, plaintiffs pray:

1. That a temporary restraining order issue herein forthwith for a period not to exceed 10 days, and that after due proceedings be had, a temporary injunction issue herein.

2. That upon final hearing a permanent injunction issue herein restraining Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and anyone acting for him from enforcing or attempting to enforce an order or regulation fixing the ceiling price on strawberries in Louisiana at $4.70 per crate of 24 pints for the period running from April 27 to May 1, 1944, and $3.95 per crate of 24 pints thereafter, or from enforcing or attempting to enforce any order or regulation that is discriminatory, illegal, arbitrary, or capricious in such manner as to destroy business practices, cost practices, and methods and means or aids of distribution established in the Louisiana strawberry industry or to deprive the people of the State of Louisiana of their property, welfare, and prosperity without due process of law.

3. And for such other and further relief as to the Court may seem right and proper.

JAMES H. MORRISON,
Hammond, La.
VERNON B. LOWREY,
Washington, D. C.
DAMERON C. MCCANN,
New Orleans, La.
Attorneys for plaintiffs.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Tangipahoa:

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared William Fletcher, who being by me personally known and duly sworn, did depose and say:

He is the president of the Louisiana Strawberry & Selling Agency, Inc. He avers that he has read the petition filed on behalf of the Louisiana Strawberry & Selling Agency, Inc., against Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and all the allegations of fact contained therein are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

Further, that if a price ceiling of $4.70 per 24-pint crate is enforced through May 1 and thereafter $3.95 per crate, the strawberry-auction companies will be forced to close and go out of business and the farmers and growers of strawberries in Louisiana will sustain huge and irreparable losses and damages more particularly because of the shortage of the crop which will prevent them from recovering the sums that they have invested in the production of this season's strawberry crop.

WILLIAM FLETCHER.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 25th day of April 1944.

EARL SPENCER,
Notary Public.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Tangipahoa:

Before me, the undersigned authority personally came and appeared R. M. Singletary, who being by me personally known and duly sworn, did depose and say:

He is the president of the Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union, Inc. He avers that he has read the petition filed on behalf of the Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union, Inc., against Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and all the allegations of fact contained therein are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

Further that if a price ceiling of $4.70 per 24-pint crate is enforced through May 1 and thereafter $3.95 per crate, the strawberry auction companies will be forced to close and go out of business and the farmers and growers of strawberries in Louisiana will sustain huge and irreparable losses and damages, more particularly because of the shortage of the crop which will prevent them from recovering the sums that they have invested in the production of this season's strawberry crop.

R. M. SINGLETARY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 25th day of April 1944.

EARL SPENCER,
Notary Public.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Tangipahoa:

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared Wiltz Hoover, who being by me personally known and duly sworn, did depose and say:

He is a citizen and a resident of the Parish of Tangipahoa, State of Louisiana, and a farmer and grower of Louisiana strawberries. That he has shipped from March 15, 1944, to date, approximately 350 crates of strawberries and that he has still on hand for shipment and sale between this date and June 1, 1944, approximately 275 crates of strawberries not yet picked. He avers that he has read the petition filed by him against Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and all the allegations of fact contained therein are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

Further, that if a price ceiling of $4.70 per 24 pint crate is enforced through May 1 and thereafter $3.95 per crate, the strawberry auction companies will be forced to close and go out of business and the farmers and growers of strawberries in Louisiana, including affiant, will sustain huge and irreparable losses and damages more particular because of the shortage of the crop which will prevent them from recovering the sums they have invested in the production of this season's strawberry crop.

WILTZ HOOVER.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 25th day of April 1944.

EARL SPENCER,
Notary Public.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Tangipahoa:

Before me, the undersigned authority personally came and appeared Oreal Gautreau, who being by me personally known and duly sworn, did depose and say:

He is the president of the Ascension Farmers' Cooperative Association, Inc. He avers that he has read the petition filed on behalf of the Ascension Farmers' Cooperative Association, Inc., against Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and all the allegations of fact contained therein are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, information and belief.

Further, that if a price ceiling of $4.70 per 24-pint crate is enforced through May 1 and thereafter $3.95 per crate the strawberry auction companies will be forced to close and go out of business and the farmers and growers of strawberries in Louisiana will sustain huge and irreparable losses and damages more particular because of the shortage of the crop which will prevent them from recovering the sums that they have invested in the production of this season's strawberry crop.

OREAL GAUTREAU.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 25th day of April 1944.

EARL SPENCER,
Notary Public.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Before me, the undersigned authority, personally came and appeared JAMES H. MORRISON, who, being by me personally known and duly sworn, did depose and say:

That he has investigated and studied all the facts alleged in the complaint and they are true and correct to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief.

Further, surveys of the Louisiana strawberry crop made by numerous experts, including Harry D. Wilson, commissioner of agriculture for the State of Louisiana, show that there has been at least a 50-percent crop failure this season. A telegram from Harry D. Wilson so stating is attached hereto. Your affiant personally called the attention of Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, to this fact and he totally disregarded it and refused to make any alteration in the maximum ceiling price on strawberries after he learned that there had been a 50-percent crop failure due to excessive rains and freezes.

Further, affiant obtained from the United States Department of Agriculture, now operating under the Office of War Food Administration, figures showing that for the period from 1930 to 1940 an average of approximately 3,000 cars of strawberries were shipped from Louisiana each season, which brought a gross return of some $5,000,000, and under an estimate of 900 cars for this season which the said Chester Bowles said was a proper estimate. The highest possible return without any ceiling price would not exceed $3,780,000 for the entire 1944 crop.

Further, your affiant personally called on the Administrator of the Office of War Food Administration and on Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, to produce and show the publication of the parity price on Louisiana strawberries established for grade and location as required by the Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, and for the publication of the highest price received during the period of January 1, 1942, to September 15, 1942, as required by said act before any maximum price or ceiling can be placed on Louisiana strawberries and neither the Office of War Food Administration nor said Chester Bowles could produce any such public prices as required by law.

Thereupon, as provided by the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, subsequent to his promulgation of ceiling prices on Louisiana strawberries under date of April 13, 1944, affiant first asked for a hearing in which to submit data, information, and written briefs in protest of said ceiling prices. On or about the 20th day of April at the approximate hour of 5 p. m., in the office of defendant, Chester Bowles, affiant personally on behalf of the plaintiffs and all they represent, presented said data, information, and briefs protesting said ceiling prices. At the conclusion, after approximately 2 hours, the said defendant, Chester Bowles, arbitrarily refused to change the said ceiling prices and thereby turned down the protest as made on behalf of plaintiff and all they represent by your affiant. Affiant was acting in accordance with the Price Control Act of 1942 as amended.

Further, the cost of producing the same quantity of Louisiana berries is approximately twice the cost of producing strawberries in most of the other States. For a period of over 25 years Louisiana growers have been developing a high grade of strawberries, unlike other States, and have gone to great expense and labor each season to cull and carefully grade and hand-pick their strawberries that are sold in packages bearing well-established brands or labels and have thus built up a large demand for Louisiana strawberries throughout the United States. Because of the development in packing of a fine strawberry, a pint of Louisiana strawberries generally sells under similar conditions on equivalent markets for approximately the same price as a quart of strawberries from other States of the Union, as is shown by a copy of a W. F. A. report dated April 24, 1944, showing the St. Louis market in particular, which is attached hereto and made a part hereof. This fact was called to the attention of said Chester Bowles, who informed your affiant that he would investigate these facts, and, if established, the ceiling price would be altered to take this into consideration. Thereafter and before any reasonable check could be made by him, he announced that he would not alter the price ceiling fixed on Louisiana strawberries and totally disregarded this important factor which constitutes a gross, arbitrary, and capricious discrimination against the plaintiffs in the instant suit and against all Louisiana strawberry growers.

Further, that the directive, regulation, and orders, etc., for said ceiling price on strawberries as issued by said Chester Bowles is not attached hereto because said Bowles refused to provide your affiant with a copy of same. Your affiant made every possible effort and a personal request of Chester Bowles to secure said documents, but defendant Bowles steadfastly refused to give same to your affiant, who requested same in the capacity of a Congressman. Affiant further explained that no bureau or department had ever refused similar documents where the welfare and property rights of his constituents were affected substantially. Notwithstanding all of these pleas and requests, affiant was further denied a copy of said documents and was able only by a hurried glimpse to read part of said documents, part of which were on a carbon sheet which was illegible, while being watched by defendant Bowles' subordinate. Affiant was further told by defendant Bowles that he could not copy said documents.

Further, that if a price ceiling of $4.70 per 24-pint crate is enforced through May 1 and thereafter $3.95 per crate, the strawberry auction companies will be forced to close and go out of business and the whole system of marketing and distributing Louisiana strawberries built up over a 25-year period and delicately balanced will be destroyed and, therefore, the farmers and growers of strawberries in Louisiana will sustain huge and irreparable losses and damages more particularly because of the shortage of the crop, which will prevent them from recovering the sums that they have invested in the production of this season's strawberry crop.

JAMES H. MORRISON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of April 1944.

TRUMAN WARD,
Notary Public.

General Accounting Office Criticisms of Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the annual report of the General Accounting Office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, there is on pages 78 to 81, both inclusive, a list of alleged irregularities and criticisms of the accounts and proceedings of the United States Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration. It is salutary that supposed irregularities and criticisms shall be subjected to the pitiless light of publicity even though at the time they are given public attention corrections have been made and remedies put into effect. Those against whom charges are preferred are entitled to have their views as to the charges also given publicity, and, therefore, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter to me from Admiral Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administrator setting forth the facts and circumstances about these so-called irregular practices in so far as they can be presented within reasonable compass.

The charges in the annual report and the answers submitted herewith have been referred by me to the general counsel of the committee in charge of the investigations being conducted by the committee with instructions to cover the charges and answers very fully and bring his conclusions to the attention of the chairman of the committee and the committee for further study where necessary.

The letter of Admiral Land, Chairman of the Commission, and War Shipping Administrator, referred to above, follows:

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, April 13, 1944.

The Honorable SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND,
Chairman, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE BLAND: In the Comptroller General's annual report to Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, reference is made to examinations by his office of accounts and records of approximately 60 ship construction and repair yards performing work for the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration.

He referred to certain "irregular practices" which have been disclosed as a result of these examinations and, while most of these charges are rather general in their character and in some cases broad generalizations from limited or separate instances, it is our desire to set forth within reasonable compass the facts and circumstances about them, insofar as we can, in view of their general nature.

Under date of January 8, 1943, in transmitting to me a copy of a report from one of his field representatives dated September 2, 1942, the Comptroller General stated:

"In order that the United States Maritime Commission may be currently advised of certain field investigations by representatives of this office and at the same time to permit the expeditious handling of the reports with respect thereto, it is deemed advisable to furnish you copies of such reports for your information and appropriate action.

"It is, of course, understood that the comments contained in the reports may not represent the views of the office; however, they may serve as a possible basis for immediate action by the Commission when necessary and at the same time expedite final disposition of the matters involved."

It has been our endeavor at all times to promptly follow through our investigations of all such reports that the Comptroller

General has referred to us on the basis of his statement referred to above.

In a number of cases, the reports of the Comptroller General's field representatives have not been forwarded to the Commission for some considerable time after they were prepared, giving but little opportunity, if necessary, to take immediate corrective action. It has been observed that, in many instances, the reports of the Comptroller General's field representatives referred to disallowances already noted by our own field auditors, and on which appropriate action had been taken.

The various reports that the Comptroller General has referred to this office from time to time, in retrospect bring up the question of the discretionary powers vested in the Maritime Commission by Congress in the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, and in the War Shipping Administrator by virtue of Executive Order No. 9054, of February 7, 1942, as amended by Executive Order No. 9244, of September 16, 1942; and in Executive Order No. 9350, of June 10, 1943.

Congress anticipated that the operations of the Maritime Commission would call for different methods of procedure and accounting from those usually applicable to Government operations. Section 207 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, provided that the activities of the Commission should be carried on in the same manner as a private corporation and the Comptroller General is required to audit the Commission's financial transactions according to approved commercial practices as provided in the Act of March 20, 1922; provided, that it shall be recognized that, because of the business activities authorized by the act, the accounting officers shall allow credit for all expenditures shown to be necessary because of the nature of such authorized activities, notwithstanding any existing statutory provision to the contrary.

The Commission has endeavored at all times to maintain the highest degree of efficiency and honesty in its dealing with the many contractors to whom it has awarded contracts from time to time.

The Committee on Banking and Currency in House Report No. 846, November 8, 1943, drew the attention of the House of Representatives of the fundamental difference between the usual governmental types of audit and the commercial types.

In the Comptroller General's report to Congress covering the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, he does not take into account the fact that adjustments, corrections, or retractions had been made subsequent to the close of the fiscal year and prior to his report, and unfortunately this is apparently the basis for what we consider an entirely unjustified statement therein, i. e.

"Examination of such accounts and records discloses the existence of many irregular practices some of which were due in no small part to the failure of the Commission to insure proper instructions and to exercise the degree of administrative control ordinarily required in the handling of Government business and the expenditure of public funds."

In the absence of particulars, this appears to be an unwarranted generalization. The Maritime Commission has maintained full control of the activities carried on under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, and other statutes and Executive orders, has handled the expenditure of public funds appropriated for its use with the utmost care, and has issued proper instructions to all contractors working under its control. There have been and are bound to be occasions where instructions given to cover certain operations, have subsequently proven inadequate, due to the change in operations arising from a rapidly fluctuating war-production program. As fast as the new developments have arisen, however, new instructions have been issued in order to maintain proper administrative control.

In the Comptroller General's Annual Report to Congress, he listed certain generalized charges which are set forth below with our comments thereon.

Charge 1. "Failure to account properly for receipts from revenue-producing activities such as housing, cafeterias, transportation facilities, etc."

This charge we believe grows out of a complete misinterpretation by the Comptroller General's field staff of the character of the Commission's contracts and the relations between the Commission's prime contractor and his subcontractor, and overlooks certain provisions of the Merchant Marine Act with respect to the Commission's revolving construction fund.

The charge originally made was that the Commission was deliberately utilizing for its ship construction program, funds which should have been covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and therefore defeating the will of Congress as expressed through its appropriations.

This matter was the subject of correspondence between the Comptroller General and our office during 1942 and 1943. In his communication of October 26, 1943, the Comptroller General departed from his original position, and then agreed with our view, that the Commission had the option of having these funds deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the revolving construction fund, and there to be available for expenditure by the Commission or that where the Commission deemed it advisable and more practicable from an administrative standpoint, it was in order for the Commission to approve of the application, by the contractor, of the receipts from the subcontractor operating the facilities in reduction of the reimbursable costs of the construction work involved.

This understanding was reached subsequent to the expiration of fiscal year 1943, and possibly the time lapse before the Comptroller General made his report to Congress was not sufficient to allow the correction on this point.

Charge 2: "Abnormal increases in salaries of officials and employees of contractors operating under Government contracts."

To a very large extent all pay rates are governed by stabilization rules. Salaries which are not covered by stabilization rules, however, are subjected to extremely careful scrutiny on the part of the Commission's staff, and administrative salaries, in particular, are passed upon for the Commission after a thorough analysis of comparative rates in different shipyards, with due regard to the degree of responsibility involved in the different positions, the magnitude of the management operation, and the complexity of the task. Not only are individual salaries thus controlled, but the relation between the size of the administrative salary roll and the operation as a whole is also subject to control.

There have been numerous instances where a contractor has found it advisable to pay a higher rate to an individual than the approved rate. In such instances the difference is borne solely by the contractor and is disallowed by the Commission's auditor in cost. This applies both in the case of the reimbursement forms of contract and fixed-price contracts subject to recapture of excessive profits.

On the other hand, there are instances where rapid progress has been made by individuals who have assumed successive degrees of responsibility in various shipyards. It would have been utterly impossible to have manned the administrative staffs of these shipyards without advances in responsibilities and corresponding advances in salaries.

We believe that our plan of control is both reasonable and proper, and is based on sound policy and objectives. In no case can the salaries and bonuses combined exceed $25,000 for any one person, insofar as being reimbursable under the contract, and this maximum is graded downward, dependent upon the office, its duties, and the size of the yard.

Charge 3: "Reimbursement of improper expenditures, such as for lectures on human engineering, excessive rentals, bonuses to officials and employees, and the cost of yard publications."

On April 26, 1943, the Comptroller General was advised in a communication from this office that the reimbursements heretofore made by the Commission to three shipyards on the Gulf coast for the expenditures made by them covering the cost of human-engineering lectures had been subsequently disallowed, and that the amounts that had been reimbursed to the contractors had been deducted on subsequent vouchers presented for payment. He was further advised prior to the end of the fiscal year 1943 that two other yards which had expended their funds for this purpose had not and would not obtain reimbursement for this expenditure from the Commission.

It is an accepted practice in industrial plants to spend considerable effort and time on matters affecting working conditions, health, and sanitation for employees to insure the best results for all concerned and while the theory back of the "human engineering" lectures appears to have been of considerable merit, the Commission auditors immediately raised the question of the excessive cost and its value when going over the accounts of a contractor, and noted it for disallowance. This particular item was pointed out to the General Accounting Office auditor by the Commission auditor in the field as evidence of the disallowances he was noting.

In connection with the charge of reimbursement of payment of improper bonuses to officials and employees we surmise, in the absence of direct reference, that this refers to payments that were made to officials and employees of a yard now devoted to naval work. The reimbursements in this particular case were subsequently adjusted on the basis of the control plan referred to in connection with the second charge and in no case did the final adjustment represent any exception from that plan.

Most of the shipbuilding contractors building ships for the Commission as well as hundreds of other business concerns, large and small, put out publications at regular intervals devoted to upbuilding the morale of their employees. Experience has shown that properly edited publications of this nature are of very considerable benefit.

Meetings have been held on numerous occasions with the editors of the yard publications of most of the shipbuilding contractors handling Commission construction in order to produce efficient and economical handling of these publications. The necessity of keeping the reimbursable costs of these publications down to a reasonable figure has been repeatedly stressed by the Commission and its representatives.

Our regional directors of construction and our regional auditors check these costs, and the publications are constantly under review here in Washington.

Charge 4: "Assignment of contractors' employees for duty in Commission offices thereby circumventing administrative salary limitations as well as placing such employees in the position of checking their employer."

There were several instances in the past, on the Pacific coast and in some of the Gulf yards, where in setting up the original Commission's staff in different shipyards and where personnel was not available, the Commission auditor made use of employees of the contractors to prevent serious interruption in essential work. It was not possible at the time to promptly hire the necessary employees. Many of these employees have since been taken into direct Commission employment, and the entire situation in this respect was cleared up by July 1, 1943.

Charge 5: "Payments for land in excess of the appraised value thereof."

The Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration attempt to secure the most reliable appraisals possible of land which they contemplate acquiring for war purposes. Only after most careful consideration of the public interest have any payments been made by the Commission or War Shipping Administration in excess of appraisals secured by them, and we feel sure you will find that the prices paid are below the value claimed by the landowners. It is quite certain that an overwhelming majority of such cases are in the nature of settlements in condemnation proceedings and are made with the advice and consent of the Attorney General acting through the Lands Division of the Department of Justice.

Charge 6: "Excessive purchase of steel."

The Maritime Commission has not at any time made excessive purchase of steel. What it has done is to make the most effective use of the steel allotted to merchant shipbuilding. On lump-sum contracts the contractor purchases the steel and other materials direct, while on the other contracts where the contractor is paid a fixed fee for his services, the Commission purchases the steel and other materials.

The use of steel in Maritime Commission shipyards is controlled through allotment by the War Production Board and it is a very well-known fact that the shipbuilding program of the Maritime Commission has been limited by the amount of steel made available for that purpose. Steel supply and flow have been fully and currently investigated by the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and by the Senate National Defense Committee.

In one case a yard constructing vessels on a lump-sum basis did purchase considerable steel, but all of it was used for the vessels under construction at that yard on the lump-sum basis. There have been cases where some of the faster producing yards have needed a faster flow of steel than some of the other yards, but all steel which was sent to the different yards has been used, and where in a case a yard reported a shortage of steel and we were able to temporarily borrow it from another, this was done. Steel allocations and control has had and is receiving most careful management supervision.

Charge 7: "Excessive rentals on equipment under rental-purchase agreements and the release thereof when only small amounts remained to be paid in order to acquire title."

In carrying out their responsibility of establishing the necessary shipbuilding facilities and getting the largest number of vessels completed and in service in the shortest possible time the contractors have found it necessary at times to rent different types of equipment for specific work. This equipment, in many cases, while useful on certain specific jobs, was not readily useful elsewhere, and in many cases the same type of equipment was being used at the same time in different localities.

In all of its contracts the Maritime Commission either provides that where the work involves the use of rented equipment the contractor shall provide for the title passing to the Government under the rental purchase agreement plan or put such rental on a formula basis.

In many cases, however, it could be clearly shown that it would have been inadvisable from a business standpoint to acquire the equipment after the particular job for which it was rented had been accomplished. There would have been no advantage to the Government in acquiring title to worn-out equipment and its purchase would have resulted in forcing many small-business men out of business by depriving them of their equipment.

The Maritime Commission employed an experienced man to work out and establish a procedure in this respect and our entire operations have been carried out in a manner which we believe was both equitable to the owners of the property and to the Government.

Charge 8. "Purchases of automobiles without regard to statutory limitations as to amounts paid."

This charge apparently refers primarily to the acquisition of automobiles of different types by the shipbuilding contractor for use in the construction of the facilities at the shipyard, or in the operation of the yard. If originally charged to a Commission facilities contract the charges were subsequently disallowed by the Commission auditor because of the statutory limitations. The automobiles, therefore, are the property of, and were actually bought at the expense of, the contractors themselves.

There have been a few instances where a large car has been purchased by a contractor, and subsequent events have shown that without this large car being available, two smaller cars would have been necessary to do the work performed by the one large one, with a corresponding increase in use of gasoline, oil, and wear on at least four more tires.

Our regional directors of construction in every case have the responsibility of refusing to approve reimbursement for automobiles purchased at a price in excess of the statutory limitations. It is our belief that this authority has been properly exercised.

Charge 9: "Excessive cost of telephone service and the personal use thereof."

In handling the very large volume of business in connection with the construction and operation commercially of a vast fleet of vessels, there is no question but what there has been a very heavy use of the telephone.

With some 80 different yards either constructing ships for the Commission or repairing vessels for the War Shipping Administration, and with over 2,000 individual contractors furnishing supplies for a program which called for the most efficient use of time, the most important element in our war effort, outside of the human life, it has been necessary to use the telephone far more than would have been the case if the construction and operation programs were being handled on a normal basis. The widespread scope of the construction and operational programs, and the necessity of keeping up the steady flow of materials for building and repairing ships requires constant contact not only with the contractors, but a vast number of subcontractors.

Constant attention has been given to the use of the phone for personal use, and it is not our belief that there has been any particular abuse of our regulations, which allow for the personal use of the phone only in unusual cases.

Charge 10: "Inadequate safeguard of Government property."

Through the medium of Executive orders, the President designated the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War as the authorities to safeguard the shipyards and other plants handling Government contracts, against sabotage or any other danger. The Commission cooperates very thoroughly with both the Navy and the Army in their work. The protection given by the armed services is very thorough and we receive from them from time to time complete reports on surveys that they are making which are very carefully checked here, with our men in the yards and with the contractors as well.

Charge 11: "Failure to transmit all contracts to the General Accounting Office as required by law."

We have no knowledge of any case where there has been a deliberate failure to transmit copies of contracts to the General Accounting Office. There may have been instances where through some oversight there has been a delay, but we cannot account otherwise for this particular charge. The only exception that appears possible concerns those instances where communications have been received from the Comptroller General's Office asking for copies of contracts which were actually in that office but in the hands of someone other than the one asking for it.

Charge 12: "Failure to maintain adequate inventories of steel, equipment, and other supplies received at the various shipyards or to maintain proper record of transfer of such material between shipyards."

There have been instances called to the attention of the Maritime Commission by the Comptroller General where at the start of the operations at some shipyards there seems to have been a lack of proper records and inventories.

This subject, particularly where it involved transferring materials between shipyards, constitutes one of the most difficult paper problems the Commission's staff has had to face. It would have been entirely possible to have kept meticulously accurate records for the movement of every item, but only at the expense of production, and a considerable increase in personnel. The answer to this charge, as is the case with most of the others, is the output of ships. Many of the transfers were of an emergency character and had to be carried out under conditions that did not permit of the same attention being given to recording such movements as would have been possible in peacetime. Adequate physical control was maintained, but of necessity, the paper work lagged behind. This has been a matter of constant attention, and the situation is being brought as nearly up to date as has been found possible.

Charge 13: "The use of a cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost form of contract in violation of law."

Charge 14: "Excessive over-all or composite hourly billing rates for ship repairs due, in part to the inclusion of direct charges also in overhead, thereby duplicating amounts upon which the composite billing rate was based to the extent of such inclusion."

These two charges presumably relate to an interpretation placed by the Comptroller General upon the type of contract used by both the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission in connection with ship repairs. The general counsel of the Commission, at the time the form of ship repair contract referred to was adopted, was of the opinion that they did not constitute a cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost contract and is still of that opinion. Both the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission, even before we became directly involved in the war, and when it became apparent that there would be a large volume of emergency ship repairs, entered into negotiations with the ship repair industry with a view to effecting contractual arrangements which would preclude the high rate of profit, which had previously obtained generally in the ship repair industry, and which under peace conditions was perhaps necessary for the survival of a repair company because of the sporadic character of their work.

While the Navy Department and the Maritime Commission found it impractical to bring about a drastic change in the methods of billing for time and material, which had been in general vogue for many years in the ship repair industry, they were able, prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor to bring about an understanding to the effect that the profit would be limited to 10 percent, and that the rates charged would from time to time be subject to such revision as would bring about that result.

Later, in 1943, with the country at war, it was possible to make a further revision in the form of contract, which revision is understood to meet the views of the Comptroller General.

This subject was discussed between the legal staff of the War Shipping Administration and the General Accounting Office both in conference and by correspondence. The Comptroller General's office was advised some months before making his report to Congress that the new forms of repair contracts would be put into effect on May 1, June 1, and July 1, 1943.

It is our belief that if we had endeavored to follow the views of the Comptroller General on repair contracts, at the time when the submarine warfare was at its height, it would have so interfered with the prompt repair of the damaged ships that reached our ports it might have resulted in the serious prolongation, or even the possible loss of the battle of the Atlantic, for the time being.

When the story can be fully told of the accomplishments of our repair yards, their tremendous expansion, and the courage and imagination with which they accomplished, in record time, tasks of the most difficult character in putting damaged ships back into service, it will be a dramatic one.

The three special reports referred to in the Comptroller General's Annual Report cover items that have been satisfactorily disposed of as follows:

The Waterman Steamship case was satisfactorily disposed of by the Comptroller General's recent letter to that effect.

The Baltimore Mail case has been covered by congressional committee report and in substance, the basis of the charges in the President Roosevelt report are, we believe, disposed of by the findings in the Baltimore Mail case.

These cases, as well as the references of the Comptroller General to charter rates, and insurance values all have a certain relationship to the question of just compensation. It is our belief that by following the rules laid down by the Special Board on Just Compensation, the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration in handling these cases will be acting in accordance with the law and the best interest of the Government.

In respect to the reasonableness of the Red Sea charter rates, our records show that it was through a communication addressed to the Comptroller General on September 30, 1942, that his attention was first called to this subject, and his suggestions invited as how to best handle the situation. It is our understanding that the subcommittee of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, which investigated this situation, following our calling the matter to the attention of the chairman of the committee, is about ready to make its report.

Hindsight is often much better than foresight, but the Maritime Commission in handling these Red Sea charters for the British War Ministry, was pressed for prompt action. It approved what it believed, at that particular time, to be the most equitable rates for all concerned, inview of the then-known conditions.

Subsequently, when actual experience indicated the rates were too high, we brought about one reduction. When later figures clearly indicated that the returns to the operators were excessive, an endeavor was made to get these operators to make a voluntary refund on the charter payments. We regret that only two of the operators saw fit to follow this suggestion. The matter is before our Price Adjustment Board at present for disposition in accordance with the law.

In connection with the operations of our field auditors, there have been numerous instances where they have disallowed reimbursement of items which the contractor has presented for consideration. There have been other instances where they have discovered irregularities, have recorded them in their regular reports, or have called attention to them in special reports to this office. In all such cases, the subject matter has been given prompt consideration and appropriate action taken. These auditors have been very conscientious in their work, and have by their actions, saved the Government a large sum on the accounts they have checked.

We believe a careful check of the reports, which the Comptroller General has filed with us from time to time, will show that where actual irregularities have been called to our attention, we have taken prompt steps to correct them. There have been instances where his reports have been received by us, subsequent to final action having been taken by us, based upon the information developed by our own auditors. There have been other cases where the questions raised in the Comptroller General's reports have required careful study and have led to many questions as to their accuracy.

Sincerely yours,

E. S. LAND,
Chairman, United States Maritime Commission, War Shipping Administrator.

The Price of Beef

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, subsides are of no benefit to the cattle feeder or livestock producer. Every day there are hundreds of our cattle feeders being forced out of business. Millions of dollars are being paid to the packers which are of no benefit to the cattlemen. The price of beef should be increased 5 cents a pound to the consumer, which would have little effect on the cost of living, or the cost of live cattle could be increased at least $2 per hundredweight.

It is a deplorable situation when the Federal Government pays millions in beef subsidies and the consumer is unable to secure beef and the cattle feeders go broke by the thousands.

No doubt the consumer who purchases beef feels that the present price of beef which seems high would warrant a profit to the producers. If cattle feeding were profitable thousands of our cattle feeders would not be closing up their operations. I can cite a large number of instances where the cattle feeder has disposed of his cattle and closed his operations at a very heavy loss. It is not my intention to mention names, but I am going to give specific instances of what has happened to two outstanding feeders in the livestock area. The names of these men and others are on file in my office.

One feeder writes me he has been feeding five to six hundred head of cattle for years and recently he closed out his feeding operations. When he marketed the last of his steers 2 weeks ago they brought him within 50 cents of the top market, and yet lost him $30 per head. The packer that bought his cattle got approximately $10 a head subsidy from the Government to help him take care of his loss, and no doubt he suffered a loss even after that. This cattle operator received nothing to help him out, so therefore he was forced to quit.

Another operator was forced to sell 330 head of cattle as he could not go on with them any longer. He writes me that he summered the cattle last summer, wintered them this winter, paid taxes on them twice, worked like a dog in the snow and mud, put in 16 hours every day, fed his own feed, and bought additional feed to carry through the winter. Finally, when he sold them he lost $10,000 plus his feed and labor.

In these days of New Deal financing, $10,000 may sound like a small amount of money, but it is disastrous to our cattle feeders. These feeders are in reality small factories in operation all over the Nation. The effect of their closing down will be seriously felt by the consumers as time goes on. Would it not be more practical to increase the price of beef a few cents per pound and let the consumer have beef for his table?

Maintenance of a Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, zero hour approaches in what will probably be the mightiest battle in the history of the world. All the power and striking force that can be amassed by the inventive genius and the brawn of men will hurl itself at the Nazi war machine in an effort to smash the enemies of freedom and the disturbers of the peace of the world.

We wait with anxious, prayerful hearts the outcome of this struggle. We know what dark days lie ahead. We know this venture means the loss of precious lives. We know that there will follow in its wake grief, despair, and heartaches. We pray for strength to do our part of this as well as the gallant lads over there will do theirs.

